START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

July 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-046

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholar-ship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14x

FILM STOCK:

REEL 46

Volume 82

BSO
Pops
1951 - 1952

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 82

BSO
Pops

1951 - 1952

NATIONAL
FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

FULL DUCK [illegible] MANILA PAPER
Without [illegible] Tablet [illegible] of Title

NUMBER	[illegible]	SIZE
10[illegible]	72 Leaves	12¾ × 10½
1037	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1038	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1[illegible]	90 Leaves	16 × 11¾
1[illegible]	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
104[illegible]	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

Ser 56

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
AUG 16 1951
56

3 Administrators Named for Estate of Koussevitsky

DEDHAM, Aug. 16—The widow of Serge Koussevitsky and two Boston trustees were today appointed special administrators of the estimated $250,000 estate of the late Boston Symphony conductor pending a contest of his will by a New York nephew.

Judge William J. Hickey Jr. of the Norfolk Probate Court named Olga Koussevitsky and Attys. Francis C. Welch and F. Murray Forbes.

Dr. Koussevitsky died June 4, 1951. In his will, filed June 15, 1951, he left the bulk of his estate to his third wife, Olga, with stipulations that upon her death most of the estate would go to two foundations to assist promising musicians and composers.

On July 24, a nephew, Fabian Sevitsky of New York city filed an appearance indicating a contest of the will. Judge Hickey therefore appointed the special administrators to handle the estate pending a hearing on the contest, probably this Fall.

Both Welch and Forbes were named trustees of the estate by Dr. Koussevitsky's will.

Sevitsky formerly conducted musical groups in Boston. He is now conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony.

He was not named in the will which was drawn May 15 of this year. He was named as an heir-at-law by the executors when they filed their petition to have the will allowed. The executors also named two other nephews, Joseph and Boris Koussevitsky, and a niece, Sophia, stating that the whereabouts of the latter three is unknown.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 281,218)
This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
AUG 22 1951

THE MUSIC BOX—

'Superb Music' Called Secret Of Boston 'Pops' Success

By IRVING KOLODIN
Music Editor, Saturday Review of Literature

NEW YORK, Aug. 22. — When Henry Lee Higginson died in 1919, the $1,000,000 endowment he left for the Boston Symphony Orchestra seemed an eternal guarantee that the good work of the institution he founded would go on, come good years or bad. Thirty years and a whole cycle of change have made that endowment merely a share of the money required to keep the enterprise solvent, but the good work goes on, in a style inimitably "Boston."

Nowhere in the land can one hear the lighter symphonic repertory played with the distinction that goes with the work of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops"; and when the orchestra moves outdoors for its Tanglewood weeks, it changes the color of its attire but not the sheen or brilliance of its music-making.

While other orchestras are looking with longing eyes on engagements in movie theaters or sighing for radio sponsors to lighten their load, they might occasionally ponder the simple formula of the Boston Symphony: good music superbly played. To judge from the 750,000 who endorsed it in the year just ended, it's pretty potent at the box office, too.

"Preposterous" Offer

Well known as he is for speaking his mind, Sir Thomas Beecham performed with rare virtuosity in this department during a recent exchange with the British Broadcasting Corp. It concerned the new edition of Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," which Mr. Beecham had prepared as his special contribution to the Festival of Britain, with American Soprano Roberta Peters in the title role. After a week in his native Liverpool, Mr. Beecham brought it to Convert Garden for a run, and the BBC made a proposition to broadcast it: compensation 200 pounds.

To this the baton baronet replied: "What you are pleased to call my 'arrangement' of 'The Bohemian Girl' has involved the thoughts of 25 years and continuous active labor in the dramatization and orchestration during the last five months. I therefore take pleasure in informing you that at no time in the course of a long career have I received such a preposterous, inadequate, thoughtlessly impudent and magnificently inept proposal or offer from anyone."

By Any Other Name

What's in a name? Plenty (Shakespeare to the contrary) when the name is Sadler's Wells. A prominent New York theater presently carries a large sign reading: "Opening in September, Jose Greco, direct from London's Sadler's Wells." What is intended by this association is evident enough.

You'd have to be well up on dance lore to know that Jose Greco is a Spanish dancer whose only association with the famous trademark is that he recently completed an engagement in the Sadler's Wells Theater. That would be like Dinah Shore hiring the Metropolitan for a pop concert and thereafter billing herself as "Direct from the Metropolitan.

[2]

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 12,897)
This Clipping From
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
SEP 20 1951

Lowell Institute's New Radio Station To Present Full Symphony Concerts

A new high-power non-commercial FM station, WGBH, for educational programs, will begin broadcasting Saturday, October 6, at 8:30 P. M., with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season, announces Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute.

The Boston Symphony has joined with the Lowell Institute and six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, M.I.T., Northeastern and Tufts College—as a member of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

ONLY ONE OF KIND

Mr. Lowell said:

"This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges, universities and other cultural institutions to offer a program of general education for all groups in the community." It has been made possible only by a combined co-operative community-wide effort through the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

"This united effort to extend our extraordinary educational and cultural resources to every home in the community by broadcasting, which began with the organization of the Council in 1946, has made possible the establishment of WGBH and the greatly increased schedule of educational programs it will present for every member of the family," Mr. Lowell noted.

SYMPHONY HALL CENTER

Station WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, will operate at 89.7 mc. in the FM band on Channel 209, with 20,000 watts effective radiated power. It will broadcast daily from 3 P. M. to 10:30 P. M.

During the Symphony season, broadcasting will begin at 2:15 P. M. on Fridays, and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the Symphony's performance.

"Boston has well-established stations, both AM and FM, in the field of commercial radio," Mr. Lowell stressed, adding that WGBH would not duplicate their offerings. "The establishment of the new station will make possible a selective broadcasting service with many new approaches in the three academic fields of the humanities, the social sciences and the natural sciences.

REGULAR COURSES

"WGBH will present to FM listeners, exclusively, numerous programs never before available in this area on a regular schedule. They will include regular courses recorded in the classrooms of Greater Boston's colleges and universities; forums on world affairs, with distinguished New England scholars and scientists; comprehensive interpretation of news and events by faculty specialists; full-length drama; broadcasts of important local musical and educational events, when and where they happen; educational programs from other colleges and universities throughout the country; and special features from the British Broadcasting Corp. Radiodiffusion Francaise, the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. and other international broadcasting services."

ON OTHER STATIONS

Mr. Lowell emphasized that "the Council will continue its policy to present programs over Boston's commercial AM, FM and TV stations which, by their generous co-operation in furnishing the colleges and universities with choice evening time on a sustaining basis, carry Council programs to wide audiences throughout New England."

Mr. Lowell announced that the general manager of Station WGBH will be Parker Wheatley, who has ben director of the Lowell Intsitute Co-operative Broadcasting Council since it was organized. Mr. Wheatley was Chief of the Radio Programs Section of the Armed Forces Radio Service during World War II. Earlier, he had been radio director of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., and previously was engaged in commercial broadcasting in Chicago.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 89,838)
This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
SEP 16 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM ARTISTS ENGAGED

Heifetz, Arrau, Primrose, Flagstad and Newcomers Signed

Boston, Sept. 15—Charles Munch announces his plans for the 71st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the third under his direction. He will return from his summer home in France to open the season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5.

The concerts will be the first in Symphony Hall since the death of Serge Koussevitzky last June and Mr. Munch will dedicate his opening program to the memory of his colleague, conducting Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

New Artists Signed

Soloists to appear through the season will include Jascha Heifetz and two violinists to be heard for the first time with this orchestra, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux. Mr. Grumiaux is about to make his first visit to America. The French pianist Monique de Bruchollerie will make her American debut with this orchestra.

Pianists known to these concerts are Claudio Arrau and Alexander Borovsky. There will be two cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova, and William Primrose, famous viola player, will return. A distinguished singer will be Kirsten Flagstad in a Wagner program. Guest conductors to appear in the course of the season will be Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham.

Music planned by Charles Munch for performances this season will be announced shortly. Choral works will include Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" which this orchestra has never performed, at the pair of concerts preceding Christmas; Bach's "Passion According to St. John," in Holy Week; Berlioz' "Damnaion of Faust" in April, and Beethoven's ninth symphony to close the season. A few tickets are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series only.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 5,978)
This Clipping From
MILFORD, MASS.
NEWS
SEP 19 1951

NEW FM STATION

BOSTON—A new high-powered non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, which will bring to the people of New England full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the cultural resources of Greater Boston colleges and universities, will begin broadcasting on Saturday, Oct. 6 at 8.30 p. m., with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st Season, it was announced by Ralph Lowell, Trustee of the Lowell Institute.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
NEW YORK
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

WICKFORD, R.I.
STANDARD
9/20/51

New FM Station Coming On Air From Boston Oct. 6

A new high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, which will bring to the people of New England full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the cultural resources of Greater Boston colleges and universities, will begin broadcasting on Saturday, October 6 at 8:30 p.m. with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st Season, it was announced tonight (September 19) by Ralph Lowell, Trustee of the Lowell Institute.

To inaugurate the new station, which will have the call letters WGBH, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has joined with the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College—which have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area.

The affiliation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Council in this new FM radio venture will make available to New England listeners full-length "live" scheduled performances of the Symphony Orchestra for the first time since 1926.

"This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges, universities and other cultural institutions to offer a program of general education for all groups in the community," Mr. Lowell stated. "It has been made possible only by a combined cooperative community-wide effort through the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council," he added.

Mr. Lowell pointed out that hundreds of faculty members of Greater Boston's colleges and universities, as well as representatives of other educational groups, social service agencies, business organizations and Boston's commercial AM, FM and TV stations have contributed to the Council's year-round educational program of the past five years.

"This united effort to extend our extraordinary educational and cultural resources to every home in the community by broadcasting, which began with the organization of the Council in 1946, has made possible the establishment of WGBH and the greatly increased schedule of educational programs it will present for every member of the family," Mr. Lowell noted.

Station WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, Mass., will operate at 89.7 mc. in the FM band on Channel 209 with 20,000 watts effective radiated power. It will broadcast daily from 3:00 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. During the Symphony season, broadcasting will begin at 2:15 p.m. on Fridays, and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the Symphony's performance.

"Boston has well-established stations, both AM and FM, in the field of commercial radio," Mr. Lowell stressed, adding that WGBH would not duplicate their offerings. "The establishment of the new station will make possible a selective broadcasting service with many new approaches in the three academic fields of the humanities, the social sciences and the natural sciences.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 125,983) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 16 1951

Charles Munch Will Begin 71st Boston Symphony Season Oct. 5

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Summer begins to fade, it fades quickly. In less than three weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have begun another season—its 71st—and we all shall be back to normal. For those of us who like music, life is never normal when the Boston Symphony isn't resident at Symphony Hall.

Conductor Charles Munch will fly back from France toward the end o next week, and immediately begin rehearsals for his opening program, which will be a memorial to Serge Koussevitzky, Oct. 5 and 6. The music for those occasions will be the Masonic Funeral Music of Mozart (which Mr. Munch used for the same purpose at Tanglewood in July), Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and the "Pathetic" Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Munch has shown many admirable characteristics during his two seasons as head of the Boston Symphony, and among them have been his interest in choral music and his mastery in presenting it, and his devotion to Berlioz. These characteristics will be fused next Dec. 21 and 22 when he will present for the first time complete by this orchestra, Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ."

Later Berlioz

"L'Enfance du Christ," an oratorio on the story of the Nativity, composed between 1850 and 1854, represents the later Berlioz. Now there is never too much of Berlioz, early or otherwise, in this city's concert activity, but of the later Berlioz nothing is heard locally. Except for a Cambridge performance, under Monteux in 1923, of the excerpt "The Repose of the Holy Family," the Boston Symphony has never presented "L'Enfance du Christ" before. It calls for orchestra, chorus and tenor solo.

Another Berlioz choral work, the somewhat earlier "La Damnation de Faust" (1846) will be done by Mr. Munch in April. This work, known mainly by the instrumental dances of the Sylphs and Will-o'-the-Wisps (now of Pops popularity) is not unknown here, for Serge Koussevitzky was interested in it for a few seasons some years ago.

According to his stated policy of alternating two of the Bach Passions at Easter, Mr. Munch will turn to the St. John Passion next Holy Week. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will close the season.

New Faces

Some new faces and names will be encountered among the soloists to be heard. One of them will be the French pianist Monique de Bruchollerie, who will make her American debut. What she will play has not yet been announced. There will be two new violinists, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux, the latter of whom has never visited this country.

Soloists we have heard before, and will welcome again, are pianists Claudio Arrau and Alexander Borovsky; Jascha Heifetz, violinist; cellists Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova; William Primrose, the viola player (and I hope he'll do Berlioz' "Harold in Italy"!) and soprano Kirsten Flagstad. Mme. Flagstad will be heard in Wagner, of course, and this will be the first Boston Symphony Wagner program with a vocal soloist in some years. Back in 1934 Serge Koussevitzky gave concert performances of the first act of "Die Walkuere" and the third act of "Siegfried," and expressed interest in presenting "Tristan und Isolde," at least in part, but never got around to it.

Two guest conductors are scheduled: Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham, each of whom will be welcome. Mr. Monteux made a deep impression upon his return to this orchestra after many years, last Winter, and especially with his superlative reading of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Sir Thomas has not been a Boston Symphony guest for many years, but his considerable virtues have been enjoyed here at performances by the Metropolitan Opera and the Royal Philharmonic.

Great Artist

It may confidently be expected that the coming season will be as rich in novelty, both of music and interpretation, as have been the two since Charles Munch succeeded Mr. Koussevitzky. Mr. Munch, it is not necessary but yet desirable to repeat, is a great artist, indeed a very great artist. His exceptional background of German and French qualities blended in his Alsatian ancestry and French career, make an unusual approach to music. He is not limited in the variety of music which he can perform with absolute mastery.

Perhaps we may expect a larger amount of native scores. It naturally takes a little time to become acquainted with the body of music composed in a country new to a conductor, and Mr. Munch became the artistic head of the Boston Symphony after only a relatively short experience in America. He wisely did not attempt too much in this respect during his first two seasons here.

Perhaps he may offer us some Sibelius. He stated privately last Spring to me that he had not conducted Sibelius in Europe, where the Finnish composer is not so generally liked as he is in England and the United States. But Mr. Munch did express high admiration for the beauty of such Sibelius works as the Second and Fifth Symphonies.

Ser. 56

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 36,412)
This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
SEP 18 1951

Boston Symphony to Open Season Oct. 5 With Munch

Charles Munch will return from his summer home in France in time to open the season of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 5. A memorial program for the late Serge Koussevitzky has been announced. It will include the Mozart "Masonic Funeral Music," the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" and the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony.

* * *

GUEST CONDUCTORS who will apear with the orchestra during its season include Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham.

Choral works to be included during the season will be the Berlioz "L'Enfance du Christ," to be given at a pair of concerts preceding Christmas; Bach's "Passion According to St. John" in Holy Week; the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" in April and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" to close the season.

Among the soloists to be heard with the orchestra are violinists Jascha Heifetz, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux; pianists Monique de Bruchollerie, Claudio Arrau and Alexander Borovsky; two 'cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova; violist William Primrose; and vocalist Kirsten Flagstad.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 16 1951

Symphony Announces This Season's Plans

Charles Munch has announced his plans for the 71st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be the third under his direction. He will return from his summer home in France to open the season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, October 5th.

The concerts will be the first in Symphony Hall since the death of Serge Koussevitzky last June and Mr. Munch will dedicate his opening program to the memory of his colleague, conducting Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. Soloists to appear through the season will include Jascha Heifetz and two violinists to be heard for the first time with this orchestra, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux. Mr. Grumiaux is about to make his first visit to America. The French pianist Monique de Bruchollerie will make her American debut with this orchestra. Pianists known to these concerts are Claudia Arrau and Alexander Borovsky. There will be two cellists—Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova. William Primrose, the famous viola player, will return. A distinguished singer will be Kirsten Flagstad in a Wagner program. Guest conductors to appear in the course of the season will be Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham.

Music planned by Charles Munch for performances this season will be announced shortly. Choral works will include Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" which this orchestra has never performed, at the pair of concerts preceding Christmas, Bach's Passion According to St. John, in Holy Week; Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" in April; and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to close the season.

At the time of this announcement, seats for the series in Boston and other cities are expected to be fully subscribed. For the concerts in Boston which include 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, nine Tuesday evening, and six Sunday afternoon concerts, a few tickets are still to be had for the Sunday Series only.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 33,978)
This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
SEP 20 1951

New Station To Air Symphony

BOSTON, Sept. 19—(AP)—A new high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting will go on the air Oct. 6, an official announced tonight.

Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, said Station WGBH will lead off with the Boston Symphony orchestra's first Saturday evening performance of its 71st season.

To inaugurate the new station, the Boston Symphony has joined with the Lowell Institute and six Greater Boston colleges and universities that joined the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting council in 1946.

The orchestra's affiliation with the council will make available to New England listeners full-length "live" scheduled performances of the Boston Symphony for the first time since 1926, Lowell said.

Also in the broadcasting council are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

Station WGBH will have studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton. It will operate at 89.7 MG. In the FM band on channel 209, with 20,000 watts effective radiated power.

It will broadcast daily from 3 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. during the symphony season, broadcasting will begin at 2:15 p.m. on Fridays, and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the symphony's performance.

Lowell called the new station the only one of its kind in the country in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges, universities and other cultural institutions to offer a program of general education.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 100,098)
This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE & POST
SEP 20 1951

Radio College Station to Open

BOSTON, Sept. 20 (UP) — A new radio station offering a "program of general education" will begin broadcasting here Oct. 6, it was announced.

The station will have the call letters WGBH and will feature full-length "live" broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the "cultural resources" of six Greater Boston colleges and universities, all of which collaborated to make the new station possible.

The colleges have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was founded in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in New England.

"This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges . . . to offer a program of general education for all groups," said Ralph Lowell, trustee of the institute.

"The establishment of the new station will make possible a selective broadcasting service with many new approaches in the three academic fields of the humanities, the social sciences and the natural sciences," he said.

The programs will include regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, courses recorded in the classrooms of the colleges, forums on world affairs featuring New England scholars and scientists and re-broadcasts of foreign programs of special interest.

Participating educational institutions are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

Station WGBH will have its studios in Symphony Hall and its transmitter in the Blue Hills. It will broadcast daily from 3 p. m. to 10.30 p. m. with slight time extensions on Fridays and Saturdays to handle the complete symphony broadcasts.

MUSIC

POST SEP 16/51

Plans for the New Season

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the correctness and tact that we have come to expect from him, Charles Munch is dedicating the opening Symphony Concerts, those of Oct. 5 and 6, to Serge Koussevitzky. As a whole or in part, the orchestra has honored the memory of its late conductor at the Pops and, variously and extensively, in Tanglewood. But Koussevitzky died, so to speak, between seasons, and the Symphony Concerts are something else again.

The opening number on this memorial program will be Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, that Mr. Munch restored to the orchestra's repertory at the first Shed concert at Tanglewood last July. After it will come Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and, quite as appropriately in another sense, Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The last-named work Koussevitzky made peculiarly his own, informing it with an eloquence that no other leader within the memory of most living concert-goers has equalled. It will be interesting to see what Munch and his men, fired by this particular circumstance, will do with the tragic score on this occasion. Two years ago Mr. Munch showed he had an effective way with this music, if it was not exactly Koussevitzky's.

Next Sunday, possibly, much more can be said about Mr. Munch's other intentions. Thus far only the three major choral works have been announced, and here the element of surprise is largely lacking. Last season Mr. Munch considered a performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," but finally settled for his Requiem Mass. The "dramatic legend" should fare better than did the "Grand Messe des Morts," since the instrumental and choral demands lie within the scope of the Symphony Concerts, not well outside them. Long a favorite piece with the Cecilia Society, the "Damnation" was done by the Symphony Orchestra only once, in 1934 under Koussevitzky.

We will have Berlioz again at the concerts preceding Christmas, by way of the mystical and tender "L'Enfance du Christ," which Jacques Barzun, Berlioz's latest biographer prefers to translate "The Infant Christ." Outside the charming trio for two flutes and harp and the tenor air, "The Repose of the Holy Family," sung at the Symphony Concerts in 1923 by Roland Hayes, Boston, so far as I am aware, does not know this remarkable piece; and when it is heard many will have to revise their estimate of Berlioz as primarily a purveyor of sensationalism in music. Finally, Mr. Munch as he has more than once declared, will repeat at the Concerts of Holy Week the "St. John" Passion of Bach. Last season it was "St. Matthew."

One other program has been announced in part, an all-Wagner list, featuring Kirsten Flagstad. That sort of thing used to be of frequent occurrence here in the old days, as it has always been in both New York and Philadelphia. Koussevitzky, who looked upon singers not so much as stars as accessories, frowned upon it.

Another example of Mr. Munch's correctness is his renewing of the invitation to Pierre Monteux to appear as guest conductor. Koussevitzky's immediate predecessor, whose signal service to the orchestra, was overshadowed by the brilliant career of the Russian, who owed to Monteux more than he was willing to admit, returned to us last year for one week. This season it will be two. The other guest conductor will be Sir Thomas Beecham.

A year ago, as head of his own band, the Royal Philharmonic, Sir Thomas proved that at 71 he was still at the summit of his remarkable powers. He had not conducted in Symphony Hall since 1928, when he made his only previous appearance as guest director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Clr. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

The Musician as Ambassador

Music is one international language beholden neither to frontiers nor to the bickerings of governments. It addresses itself to the human heart and mind directly; and its themes are as deep and various as the spirit to which it speaks. This gives point to the suggestion brought back from Europe (where he has been conducting concerts all Summer) by Mr. Eugene Ormandy. He feels that we are wasting a great opportunity by not sending our best orchestras on Summer concert tours abroad.

Mr. Ormandy names the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia and the New York Philharmonic Orchestras as three whose fame is world-wide, whose musicians a dozen countries eagerly desire to hear. The idea is worth attention. At an hour when the propaganda of hatred and division has been exalted by contending regimes all over the map, perhaps more emphasis upon the propaganda of beauty, creative artistry, and the things that unite men in understanding of their common destiny, would avail us better.

WHILE WITH MISCHAKOFF, we note that he is serving solo duty this evening in an unprecedented musical marathon—the 12 concerti grossi of Arcangelo Corelli at a single sitting in Carnegie Hall.

The American conductor Dean Eckerestein has chosen this earfilling way of making his New York debut with a collection of expert players from various orchestras. In addition to Mischakoff, soloists include Hugo Kolberg, former concertmaster of the Pittsburgh Symphony (previously concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic), and Laszolo Varga, new solo cellist of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

* * *

ANNOUNCEMENT that Kirsten Flagstad will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony this year in a Wagner program brings to mind that she began her concert "comeback" after the war in Boston—with only half a house of listeners interested enough to put in an appearance. With or without Mme. Flagstad's participation, an all Wagner program by the Boston Symphony is something of a novelty; we can't recall one in all of the late Serge Koussevitzky's time. Charles Munch, however, has other ideas on the subject, including a recording of the first act of "Walkuere." With Mme. Flagstad as Seiglinde maybe?

Also making a debut with the Boston Symphony this season, in January, will be Sir Thomas Beechman. The baronet of the baton will face quite a pair of orchestras in a brief period; his Boston engagement will be followed by one in Philadelphia.

(Copyright S. R. L.)

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Clr. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 23 1951

Charles Munch Will Begin 71st Symphony Season Oct. 5 With Koussevitzky Memorial

Charles Munch will open his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 5. Since conducting the Berkshire Festival he has been in the Swiss Alps and the French Riviera, accepting no engagements.

Mr. Munch will introduce a new Piano Concerto by Lukas Foss in November, the composer flying from Rome to play the solo part. Another Piano Concerto new to this orchestra will be that of the late Albert Roussel to be played by Alexander Borovsky.

Choral works will include Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" and "Damnation of Faust," Bach's Passion According to St. John and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soloists are to be the violinists Jascha Heifetz, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux who is to make his first American appearances. The French pianist, Monique de la Bruchollerie, will make her American debut with this orchestra. There will be the pianist Claudio Arrau and two cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova. William Primrose will perform the Viola Concerto by Bartok. Kirsten Flagstad will sing in a Wagner program.

Guest conductors will be Pierre Monteux, who will return to his former orchestra for the last two weeks of November, and Sir Thomas Beecham, who will conduct in the last week of January. In its third week, the orchestra will make its annual tour westward.

Mr. Munch will open the season with a memorial tribute to his colleague, Serge Koussevitzky, whose death occurred since the orchestra last met in Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch will conduct the "Masonic Funeral Music" of Mozart, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Clr. (D 5,020)
This Clipping From
LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN
SEP 21 1951

Colleges and Symphony Back New FM Station in Boston

BOSTON, Sept. 21—A powerful non-commercial FM radio station featuring "live" programs of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts and of cultural programs provided by Greater Boston universities and colleges will begin broadcasting here Oct. 6.

Ralph Lowell, trustee of Lowell Institute, announced that the station, WGBH, would present on its initial broadcast the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony's 71st season.

The orchestra is affiliated in the new venture with Lowell Institute and the six Boston universities and colleges that have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area. The participating schools are Harvard, Boston college, Boston university, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern university and Tufts college.

'Live' Broadcasts

Affiliation of the Boston Symphony with the council will make available to New England listeners complete "live" broadcasts of the orchestra's concerts for the first time since 1926.

Station WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall, will operate at 89.7 megacycles on the FM band on channel 209, with 20,000 watts effective radiated power. The broadcast hours will be from three to 10:30 p.m. During the symphony season, broadcasts will start at 2:15 p.m. on Fridays and on Saturdays will run until the close of the symphony program.

Educational Courses

Mr. Lowell said the programs would include "regular courses recorded in the classrooms of colleges and universities; forums on world affairs; . . . comprehensive interpretation of news and events by faculty specialists; full length drama; . . . educational programs from other colleges and universities throughout the country; and special features from the British Broadcasting Corporation, Radiodiffusion Francaise, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and other international broadcasting services."

Parker Wheatley, who has been director of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since its organization, will serve as general manager of the station. Mr. Wheatley said that the Boston Symphony programs would not be fed to any FM network reaching the New York area.

Tape recordings will be made of a number of educational programs for broadcast over New York's municipally owned station WNYC.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 20 1951

WGBH, Boston's New FM Station, on Air Oct. 6

A new high-power noncommercial FM station for educational broadcasting, which will bring to the people of New England full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the cultural resources of Greater Boston colleges and universities, will begin broadcasting Saturday, Oct. 6, at 8:30 with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season, it was announced last night by the Lowell Institute.

To inaugurate the new station, which will have the call letters WGBH, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has joined with the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College—which have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946, to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area.

"This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges, universities and other cultural institutions to offer a program of general education for all groups in the community," said Ralph Lowell, trustee of Lowell Institute.

Station WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, will operate at 89.7 mc. in the FM band on Channel 209, with 20,000 watts effective radiated power. It will broadcast daily from 3 p. m. to 10:30 p. m. During the Symphony season, broadcasting will begin at 2:15 p. m. on Fridays, and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the Symphony's performance.

Lowell announced that Parker Wheatley will be general manager of Station WGBH.

Lowell was elected president of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts earlier this year. He is president of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, formerly an overseer of Harvard University, a member of the corporations of Massachusetts Institute of Technology and of Northeastern University and a trustee of Boston University.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Clr. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 30 1951

Symphony at 2:15

The Friday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at 2:15 at Symphony Hall this season. This departure from the time-honored hour of 2:30 is made in an effort to accommodate those out-of-towners and others who have found it necessary to leave before the end of the concerts.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Clr. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 21 1951

Living Bread

Bread cast upon the waters does return. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dealing a most living bread to the hungry for nearly 71 years and it is now to spread its table even more amply. The Saturday night concerts are again, for the first time since 1926, to be broadcast complete from actual living performance by a powerful noncommercial FM radio station, WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall.

This is by affiliation with the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, which includes six colleges and universities of Greater Boston. Was it not Theodore Thomas who said "Popular music is familiar music, and to know is to enjoy"? Radio and recordings in the past quarter of a century have widened the audience for good music beyond all expectations and, in the long term, they have sent people into the concert halls. Those who loyally maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra by their tickets and by their generous contributions may have the satisfaction of its benefits being extended and the bases of its support being potentially broadened.

The wider issue is that an institution which pours such spiritual values into the great community seems thereby to attract the means to wider usefulness.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

MILTON, TRANSCRIPT
9/21/51

Blue Hills Transmitter To Power New FM Station

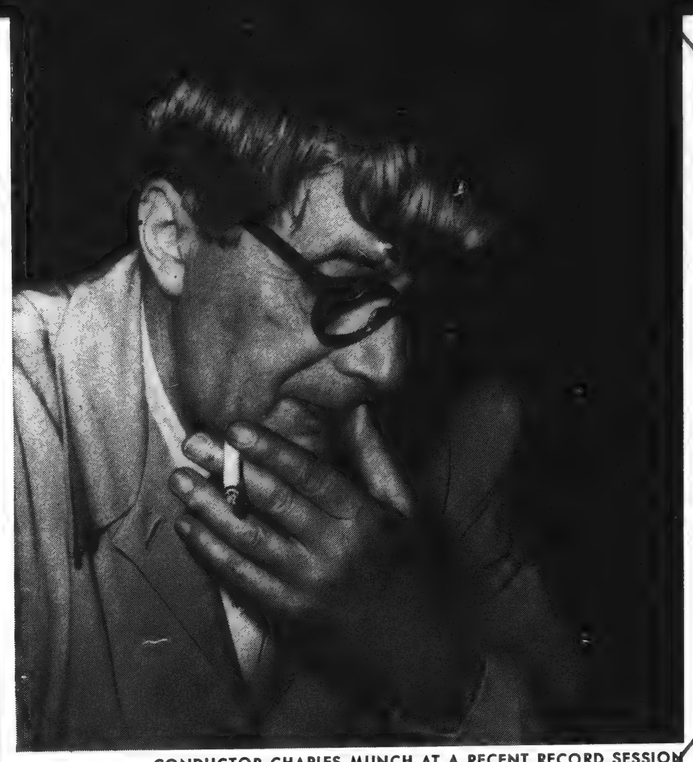
A new high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, with studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Milton's great Blue Hill, which will bring to the people of New England full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the cultural resources of Greater Boston colleges and universities, will begin broadcasting on Saturday, October 6, at 8:30 p.m., with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st Season, it was announced Wednesday by Ralph Lowell, Trustee of the Lowell Institute .

To inaugurate the new station, which will have the call letters WGBH, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has joined with the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston - Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College - which have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area.

The affiliation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Council in this new FM radio venture will make available to New England listeners full-length "live" scheduled performances of the Symphony Orchestra for the first time since 1926.

This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges, universities and other cultural institutions to offer a program of general education for all groups in the community," Mr. Lowell stated. "It has been made possible only by a combined cooperative community-wide effort through the Lowell Institute Coperative Broadcasting Council," he added.

Mr. Lowell pointed out that hundreds of faculty members of Greater Boston's colleges and universities, as well as representatives of other educational groups, social service agencies, business organizations and Boston's commercial AM, FM and TV stations have contributed to the Council's yearround educational program of the past five years.



CONDUCTOR CHARLES MUNCH AT A RECENT RECORD SESSION

Munch and Ravel

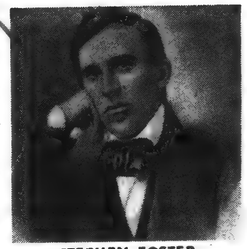
In 1920 Charles Munch was named professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory in Alsace, where he was born. At the time he was twenty-nine years old. In 1920 Maurice Ravel wrote "La Valse." Today, thirty years later, the two compatriots meet in Munch's new Boston Symphony recording of "La Valse."

Ravel, who made his debut as a composer in 1898, labored for long years before receiving the acclaim due him. One Paris critic described one of his early works as "some Rimsky-Korsakoff rehashed by a Debussy-ist who is eager to equal Erik Satie." As late as 1905 he was eliminated in the preliminaries of a competition for the coveted Prix de Rome and, as a matter of fact, he did not become really "popular" until 1928, when he composed "Bolero," even though by that time he had written "Rapsodie Espagnole," "Daphnis et Chloe" and many other great works. Today, Ravel is looked upon as the greatest French composer since Debussy.

Had Charles Munch been in 1920 the internationally famous conductor he is today he might have very well been the one to introduce "La Valse," for he has a reputation for championing contemporary composers, especially contemporary French composers.

MAURICE RAVEL

Munch is looking forward to his second Boston Symphony season and has plans to perform Darius Milhaud's "Le Creation du Monde," Honegger's "La Danse des Morts," Bach's Christmas Oratorio and the St. Matthew Passion, in Boston this year.



STEPHEN FOSTER

Melton and Foster

In the near future James Melton, on his "Harvest of Stars" radio show, will begin to sing an ever increasing number of Stephen Foster melodies. Melton, and the whole music world, will be saluting Foster more and more as next spring approaches. Reason: July 4th will be the 125th anniversary of the birth of Stephen Foster.

Says Melton of the composer: "Stephen Collins Foster wrote music that is as essentially American as strawberry shortcake and the Model T Ford. His many and varied compositions more or less form the basis of our folk music, and his popularity through the years, not only here but the world over, points to one unavoidable truth—that he wrote without frills and furbelows, but with sincerity and directness.

"His songs pretend to be no more than simple expressions of human feelings, whether the mood be gaiety, or melancholy, or nostalgia, or yes, even tragedy, and their honesty equally as much as their tunefulness and adoit texts, keep them alive in the memory because it keeps them alive in the heart.

"It is not too far-fetched, I think, to call Stephen Collins Foster a real genius."

Melton will further pay his respects to Foster when, next month (October), his new album of Foster songs is released.

JAMES MELTON SINGS A TRIBUTE TO STEPHEN FOSTER

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

This Clipping From
ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 24 1951

Forms Boston FM Station

WGBH, a non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, has been formed by the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, backed by Boston College, Boston University, Harvard University, Lowell Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College, in cooperation with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Programs will begin Oct. 6 with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston symphony's season.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (14,700)
This Clipping From BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SEP 24 1951

New Boston FM Outlet

NEW FM station in Boston goes on the air Oct. 6 at 8:30 p.m. with the first Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season, Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, announced last Wednesday. With call letters of WGBH, the station has studios in Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, Mass., operating at 89.7 mc (Channel 209) with 20 kw effective radiated power. Daily broadcasts will be from 3-10:30 p.m. Together in the enterprise are the Institute, Boston College, Boston U., Tufts College, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Northeastern U., all members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council to promote adult education by radio and television.

Ser 56

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 96,447)
This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 29 1951

Mischakoff Loss Presages End of NBC Symphony

By IRVING KOLODIN

THE NEWS that Mischa Mischakoff has signed a five-year contract as concertmaster of the revived Detroit Symphony Orchestra can mean much or little. Detroiters should be encouraged to know that its venture has such evident security that a concertmaster can be guaranteed a tenure of such length. (They don't come cheaply, you know.)

But those who regard Mischakoff's present employment (concertmaster of the NBC Symphony Orchestra) as one of the choicest any musician can occupy, are wondering whether this movement on the part of the chief deputy to Arturo Toscanini doesn't presage a trend, which may become general.

To be sure, musicians—and pretty good ones, too, including William Primrose, principal viola, and John Wummer, first flute—have left the NBC Symphony before. But Primrose always fancied a soloist's career, and sat in with the NBC simply to "play with the Maestro." Wummer took the post of principal flutist with the Philharmonic-Symphony because that orchestra was badly in want of a first-class man, and made him an excellent offer.

* * *

IN MISCHAKOFF'S case, however, all customary trends are reversed. Since musical "trades" aren't as well publicized as those in professional baseball or football, it may not be quite apparent that important posts in the major symphony orchestras are filled somewhat the way a baseball club recruits from its farm teams, or the independent "minors."

This year, for example, the Philadelphia Orchestra has added Jacob Krachmalnick as concertmaster, from the Cleveland Symphony, where he was assistant first-desk man; and Lorne Munroe, as principal cellist, from the Minneapolis Symphony. Not too long ago, Leonard Rose came from the Cleveland orchestra to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony as first cellist; and I have heard the personnel manager of a prominent orchestra boast of plucking a young second trombone from a rival orchestra and making him his brilliant first with the pride of a baseball scout who has turned up a 20-game winner.

All this is a recognized part of the musical scene, and healthy enough, in the incentive it provides for younger men to hope for important positions as they mature. But Mischakoff's decision (he will only play part-time with the Detroit Symphony till next Spring, when his present commitment to NBC expires) reverses all known tendencies, since he is leaving a post of top prestige (and earnings) for one that might pay as well or even more, but can't compare in stature with his present one.

WHAT DOES it all mean? It means, I think, that the star performers of the NBC Symphony are already reckoning with the possibility of Toscanini's retirement or physical incapacity in the foreseeable future. It seems to indicate that the NBC Symphony, as it has been known, will not be with us too much longer.

Does it mean—as has often been rumored—that NBC will terminate the orchestra's existence when it no longer has Toscanini to conduct it? A responsible official of the company when asked the question candidly, replied, as candidly, that nobody knew.

Whatever the decision, even if NBC should decide to continue the orchestra for prestige reasons, it isn't likely to be the razor-sharp ensemble we now know. Too many of those who give it its keen edge retain their jobs for the Primrose reason—to "play with the Maestro." Thus, the NBC Symphony seems destined to go down in history, as it has often been called, "Toscanini's orchestra."

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 160,697)
This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
AUG 26 1951

The World of Music

Boston Symphony keeps up superb work, is good example for other orchestras; Alabama's Nell Rankin in Met news

BY IRVING KOLODIN
Music editor, The Saturday Review of Literature

NEW YORK, Aug. 25—When Henry Lee Higginson died in 1919 without leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he had supported for most of his 85 years, the $1,000,000 endowment which had been expected, friends of the orchestra underwrote a new fund, come good years or bad. Thirty years and a whole cycle of changes have made that endowment merely a share of the money required to keep the enterprise solvent, but the good work goes on, in a style inimitably 'Boston."

The end of the Tanglewood series in the Berkshire Hills has brought some illuminating figures on the work of the orchestra. In a year's work that brought the orchestra to the 70-year mark, it performed for more than 750,000 persons during 212 concerts in 21 cities. Millions more heard the orchestra in broadcasts and from recordings.

What is significant about these figures is that these impressive numbers are associated with not merely a good orchestra, or a very good one, but one that is arguably the best in the world. In other words, while pursuing a program of intensive work through a virtual year-round schedule of 45 weeks, its management has contrived to sustain a quality standard that makes it the envy of every like organization in the world.

Nowhere in this land can one hear the lighter symphonic repertory played with the distinction that goes with the work of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops", and when the orchestra moves outdoors for its Tanglewood weeks, it changes the color of its attire but not the sheen or brilliance of its music-making.

So, while other orchestras are looking with longing eyes on engagements in movie theaters or sighing for sponsors to lighten their load, they might occasionally ponder the simple formula of the Boston Symphony: Good music superbly played. To judge from the 750,000 who endorsed it in the year just ended, it's pretty potent at the boxoffice.

* * *

MOST RUMORS to date about new artists for the next Metropolitan season have concerned singers of European background, but there will be at least one American newcomer in major roles. That is Nell Rankin, of Montgomery, Ala., who has spent much of her time recently in Zurich, Switzerland. Miss Rankin is a mezzo, and it wouldn't be too surprising if she made her debut as Amneris.

* * *

THE MUSIC BEAT—The Metropolitan's revived "Carmen" may be something more than anticipated, thanks, ironically, to RCA Victor, with whom Rudolf Bing was "Fledermaus"—feuding just a year ago. Fritz Reiner has just completed a recording of the entire opera for RCA, and insiders say that Rise Stevens revised her whole conception of the part under his guidance. . . . The death of Arthur Schnabel will be widely mourned not only among the audiences for which he played during his years of American activity, but also by many members of the musical fraternity itself, . . . The distinction of playing in "South Pacific" in London opposite Mary Martin seems finally to have gone to Wilbur Evans, well-known musical comedy baritone. The producers could have had Ezio Pinza again, but for too short a period of time to interest them. . . . Erna Berger, rumored to be "out" of the Metropolitan this season, will give three Lieder recitals in New York next February, as she did last year.

* * *

Nell Rankin

meet in the anteroom of William Herman's New York vocal studio, compare notes on careers and finances, and dream—as all students do—of the future. Chances are that you could have hired the trio any evening for $50, with the services of an accompanist thrown in. They'd come a little higher now, for if you add the surnames of Munsel, Peters and Rounseville to the given ones, you'd have three young people who have been making some of the Summer's heaviest musical news.

ROUNSEVILLE

Munsel and Peters still rate in the "baby prima donna" category, but Rounseville, a husband and the father of two, has had a

Record round-up

CLASSICAL

"FAVORITE OVERTURES." A whole stable of war horses, ridden with skill by George Solti. Fine playing. Lush sound. (London).

"DON QUIXOTE" (Strauss). A restoration on LP of a classical item from the pre-war German catalogues, with Composer Richard Strauss conducting one of his greatest works. (Decca).

"IMAGES" (Debussy). Gilt-edged finger-work by Walter Gieseking in a series of notable works by this composer. (Columbia).

"SONGS OF SCANDINAVIA." A dozen choice songs by Sibelius, Grieg and the lesser known but impressively gifted Yrjo Kilpinen. (WCFM RECORDS).

* * *

POPULAR

"SATCHMO AT SYMPHONY HALL." An evening with Louis Armstrong and band which has some mighty moments of jazz. The LP sequence is of questionable value. (Decca).

"WE KISS IN A SHADOW." Eloquent vocalizing by Eddy Howard on the charming lyric from "The King and I," and its show companion "Hello Young Lovers." (Mercury).

"LOVE IS THE REASON." A novelty "chase" tune from "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." Happy melodic confusion which is more happy than confused. (RCA Victor).

"MORTON GOULD PROGRAM." Lively arrangements by the versatile Gould, expertly conducted and brilliantly played. (Columbia).

* * *

Personality of the week

Once upon a time there were three vocal students named Pat, Roberta and Bob, who used to

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 85,505)
This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
SEP 21 1951

HUB TO HAVE AIR COLLEGE

WGBH to Have Symphony and Educational Programs

Boston, Sept. 21 (UP)—A new radio station offering a "program of general education" will begin broadcasting here Oct. 6, it was announced today.

The station will have the call letters WGBH and will feature full-length "live" broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the "cultural resources" of six Greater Boston colleges and universities, all of which collaborated to make the new station possible.

The colleges have been members of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Council since it was founded in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in New England.

"This new radio station will be the only one of its kind in the United States in which a major symphony orchestra is collaborating with a group of colleges. . .to offer a program of general education for all groups," said Ralph Lowell, trustee of the institute.

"The establishment of the new station will make possible a selective broadcasting service with many new approaches in the three academic fields of the humanities, the social sciences and the natural sciences," he said.

The program will include regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, courses recorded in the classrooms of the colleges, forums on world affairs featuring New England scholars and scientists and broadcasts of foreign programs of special interest.

Participating educational institutions are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

Station WGBH will have its studios in Symphony Hall and its transmitter in the Blue Hills. It will broadcast daily from 3 p. m. to 10.30 p. m. with slight time extensions on Fridays and Saturdays to handle the complete symphony broadcasts.

[6]

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 322,441) (S 284,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
SEP 23 1951

MUSIC

N. E. Opera Theatre News

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston's local opera company, Boris Goldovsky's New England Opera Theatre, will begin its sixth season, and its fifth at the Opera House, on Nov. 11 with one of the staples of its repertory, Puccini's "La Boheme"—a work which has already had one Boston performance this fall. On Dec. 9 will come Tchaikovsky's "The Queen of Spades" (Pique Dame), which enjoyed a single performance here some 30 years ago from a traveling Russian company.

* * *

The third of these Sunday matinees will be given over to Benjamin Britten's "Albert Herring." Jan. 13 is the date, approximately two years after the only preceding performance of the opera here, also at the hands of Mr. Goldovsky's forces. "Carmen" on Feb. 17 will bring the all-too-brief season to a close. Its previous performance by the New England Opera Theatre, and the first in America of the original version with spoken dialogue in place of the musical recitatives, added by Guiraud, was in January, 1949.

* * *

"The only opera company of its kind in the world," reads its press release announcing these plans. Not before, so far as I know, has it made this particular claim and there is room for speculation as to just what the phrase implies. Certainly there is nothing novel about a policy of presenting all of the operas, regardless of their origin, in English. That has been done time and again.

* * *

As the company's title suggests, it emphasizes the dramatic side of opera. But is there anything new in that? To be sure, you could not accuse the Metropolitan of leaning in this particular direction. New York's City Center comes a good deal closer to it. And realism, dramatic verisimilitude, was the avowed aim of Vladimir Rosing, now one of the stage directors of the City Center, when he headed his own American Opera Company several years ago. To be sure, Mr. Rosing was only the stage director of this organization, whose performances pleased Boston audiences in the late '20s. He did not try to conduct; and Mr. Goldovsky is both stage director and conductor. It is in that fact, perhaps, that the NEOT, as it likes to abbreviate itself, is unique. It is probably also unique in the fact that the singers are never under any circumstances allowed to look at the conductor. Instead of the singers following the director, which is the usual procedure, in the case of Mr. Goldovsky's organization, it works the other way around. He has to keep his eye on them, albeit they are never allowed to take liberties with the music, prima donna fashion, but must stay rhythmically on the job. It is one of the company's claims that it completely disregards the star system, and there is nothing new in that. It is the sum total of these things that does set the New England Opera Theatre apart from other companies, and Boston is fortunate in having it. The only drawback, as already suggested, is that its performances are so few and far between. A season of four operas in as many performances is not much of a season, and there is always the hope that some year it may be increased.

* * *

The aforesaid press release points out some interesting things. In five seasons the company has given eight productions that have not had local presentation before, an enviable record. Singers trained by the NEOT have won places for themselves in the operatic world. Mildred Miller, Ann Bollinger, Paula Lenchner, Frank Guarrera, Paul Franke and Paul Knowles are all at present with the Metropolitan company, while no less than eight of the 10 tenors in the New York City Center Co., are former N.E.O.T. singers.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 30 1951

Symphony on Air Saturday Night

A full performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning at 8:30 P. M. next Saturday will inaugurate daily educational broadcasts by WGBH, Boston's new non-commercial FM station for educational listening. The broadcast may be picked up at 89.7 megacycles on the FM band, channel 209.

First week highlights on WGBH will include "Hamlet" by the BBC World Theater; the Paganini Quartet; the Brattle Theater production of "Billy Budd," and a program by Carl Sandburg.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 322,441) (S 256,656)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 2 - 1951

CHARLES MUNCH

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Looking very fit after the vacation in Switzerland and on the French Riviera that followed his engagement at Tanglewood, Charles Munch yesterday morning met members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first rehearsal of the season. Seen later at a press luncheon at Symphony Hall, the conductor, now entering his third season, declared that he had found the sound of the orchestra "beautiful and moving."

To the players he introduced their new colleagues: Leo Panasevich and William Waterhouse, violinists; Bernard Kadinoff and Vincent Mauricci, violists; Armando Ghitalla, trumpeter; Olivia Hall Luetcke, harpist, and Harold Farberman, percussionist. John Holmes has returned to the oboe section.

Asked what he thought of the practice of a conductor making all his programs in advance, Mr. Munch replied: "I have done that, but the programs are subject to change." He made the gratifying announcement that outside Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, to be played at this week's opening concerts in memory of Koussevitzky, and the St. John Passion of Bach, which will be heard in Holy Week, he would not repeat anything that he had conducted in the two previous seasons. This will make for a much-to-be-desired freshening of the repertory.

On the matter of his forthcoming programs, Mr. Munch was noncommital save for his mention of the American composers whom he would play and the pieces to be performed by the various soloists. This year the native muse will be represented by Messrs. Copland, Fine, Shapero, Barber, Piston (the Fourth Symphony), Foss and Haieff. Exceptions to the above rule were the Monopartita of Honegger, a new Symphony of Martinu and a work by the Hungarian Harsanyi, thus far unknown here. The various choral works have been announced in these columns.

As for the soloists, Gregor Piatigorsky will be heard in the Cello Concerto of Haydn and Strauss' "Don Quixote" while Zaranel Sova will play the Cello Concerto of Barber. Besides introducing to us the Viola Concerto of Bartok, William Primrose will be heard in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." The new French pianist, Monique de la Bruchollere, will play the Rachmaninoff Third.

Symphony Season

Monitor Oct 2

Conductor Discusses Plans For His Third Year in Boston

By Harold Rogers

"I hope you will like the orchestra, gentlemen," Charles Munch said yesterday at a press luncheon in Symphony Hall. "I rehearsed it for the first time this morning, and it was beautiful!"

The genial conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in a relaxed mood. He commented briefly on his vacation after the Tanglewood concerts—in Switzerland, Paris, and on the Côte d'Azur.

"Did you play golf?" someone asked.

"Every day!" he exclaimed with a broad smile.

* * *

In speaking of the programs for the orchestra this season, Mr. Munch explained that he plans them for the entire year, but "subject to change." For this reason the programs are not announced in their entirety at the outset.

He provided a glimpse, however, of some of the things in store. In the American category we will hear works by Irving Fine (Notturno), Walter Piston (his new Fourth Symphony), Harold Shapero, Alexis Haieff, Aaron Copland, Samuel Barber (his cello concerto with Zara Nelsova as soloist), and Lukas Foss (who will arrive here from Rome to play the solo part in his own new piano concerto).

There will be several first performances. Mr. Munch will give the first Boston performance of a Roussel concerto. When asked how he would characterize Roussel, whom he knew personally, Mr. Munch immediately replied, "He was a gentleman!"

* * *

Mr. Munch will also present the first hearing in the United States of a new one-movement work by Arthur Honegger. It is called Mono Partita and was composed after his recent Fifth Symphony, introduced by Mr. Munch last season in Symphony Hall and later repeated at Tanglewood. New symphonies by Bohuslav Martinů and by the Hungarian composer, Tibor Harssanyi, are also on the list.

The conductor, now in his third season with the Boston Symphony, will make only two exceptions to his policy of repeating no works played here during his prior seasons. The first will be Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathétique," which he is including in his opening concerts this week end in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. The second will be the Bach Passion According to St. John, scheduled for Holy Week. Mr. Munch conducted both these works during his first season here.

Other choral works include two by Berlioz—"L'Enfance du Christ" (never before performed by the orchestra) at the pair of concerts preceding Christmas, and the "Damnation of Faust" in April. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will close the season.

* * *

Artur Rubinstein will appear as soloist with the orchestra. His name comes as an addition to the soloists previously announced. Monique de la Bruchollerie, who, Mr. Munch says, is well known in France, will perform the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 3. William Primrose, eminent English violist, will be heard in the Bartók Viola Concerto and in the Berlioz "Harold in Italy." A feature on the program when Kirsten Flagstad makes her first appearance with the orchestra will be Act I of Wagner's "Die Walküre" in concert form. The tenor is yet to be chosen.

While Pierre Monteux has not yet submitted the program for his guest appearances, Sir Thomas Beecham has, and it includes the Sibelius Sixth Symphony and works by Handel, Delius, and Rimsky-Korsakov.

Several new members have been added to the orchestra. Joining the violin section are Leo Panasevich and William Waterhouse. Among the violists are Bernard Kadinoff and Vincent Mauricci. Armando Ghitalla is the new member of the trumpet section. The new harpist is Olivia Hall Leutcke. Harold Farberman joins the percussion, and John Holmes, formerly in the orchestra's oboe section, returns to that section this season.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 2 - 1951

Munch Lists Symphony Plans at First Rehearsal of Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch, looking handsome as ever but this time also tanned and rested, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's first rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning. Last Thursday he flew in from Europe where he had been vacationing since the conclusion of the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival in August.

When he greeted members of the press at luncheon following rehearsal, he explained that he had done no conducting in that time, but had enjoyed his leisure first at Berne in Switzerland and later on the French Riviera. And he played golf every day of those several weeks.

When he begins the 71st Symphony season next Friday afternoon at 2:15, Mr. Munch will dedicate the program as a memorial to his predecessor, the late Serge Koussevitzky. Accordingly he will conduct Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss, and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Although Mr. Munch firmly intends not to repeat, this season, any work he has conducted in his previous two years with this orchestra, he will make an exception in the case of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

With other singers as yet unannounced, Kirsten Flagstad will be heard in a concert version of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere." At the concerts of next week, Alexander Borovsky will revive Weber's Concert Piece and introduce to us the Piano Concerto of Roussel. Pierre Monteux has not announced his programs, but the other guest, Sir Thomas Beecham, will give us Sibelius, Handel, Delius and Rimsky-Korsakov.

New Music on Tap

Mr. Munch brought back several new scores from Europe, notably the Monopartita (so-called because it is in one movement) of Honegger, which Mr. Munch terms "a remarkable document." This he will perform for the first time in America. There will also be new symphonies by the Czech Bohuslav Martinu and the Hungarian Tibor Harsanyi.

There will also be a good amount of American music by Alexis Haieff, Aaron Copland, Irving Fine (his Notturno), Walter Piston's new Fourth Symphony, and a work by Harold Shapero, of Newton.

Mr. Munch added information to that already announced concerning the soloists of the season. Artur Rubinstein will perform the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, while cellist Gregor Piatigorsky will be heard in the Haydn Cello Concerto and the "Don Quixote" by Strauss. When the French pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie makes her American debut, she will be soloist in the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff.

Zara Nelsova will be heard in either the Concerto by Dvorak or that by Samuel Barber, while violist William Primrose will play both the Viola Concerto of Bartok, and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." That Wagner program, in which soprano Kirsten Flagstad will be soloist, will be no less than the entire first act of "Die Walkuere" in concert form.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 30 1951

The extraodinary range of pantomimic expression which Charles Muench applies to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra is strikingly presented in these previously unpublished rehearsal photographs by Fred Fehl. The seventy-first season of the orchestra will be opened by Mr. Muench on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 5 and 6.

Ser 56

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 30 1951

College Courses Brought Into Your Living Room

Hear college courses in your own living room. An unusual idea, perhaps, but actually possible. WGBH, Boston's new non-commercial FM station for educational listening, will offer regular university and college courses, and interested listeners need only flick the dial to 89.7 on the FM band to take advantage of this opportunity.

The courses commence Monday, Oct. 8, and will continue daily. The station's initial broadcast will be next Saturday when a full length performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented. WGBH's broadcasting day begins at 3 and ends at 10:30 p. m., except Friday when opening time is 2:15 p. m. due to the earlier Boston Symphony Orchestra program.

These programs will be presented with the advice and cooperation of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Boardcasting Council whose members include Boston College, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston University, Harvard University, Lowell Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

So that fireside participants will have the impression of being in the classrooms, the courses are to be recorded during actual class sessions. In this way, the listeners will have the advantage of hearing any student participation.

Scheduled programs to date include courses from Boston College, Tufts College, M. I. T. and University Extension Courses originating at Harvard and Boston University. The Nursery Training School of Boston will present a feature for children and parents.

Parker Wheatley, general manager of WGBH, states, "I believe that the combined resources of the Greater Boston colleges and universities will be a unique contribution to all New England broadcasting."

Text Books Unnecessary

Those who tune in these courses at home will have the advantage of treating them in any manner they might like. Text books are not necessary, though in some cases they would be helpful, as would any outside reading.

The first of the scheduled courses, Forms of the Drama, will be presented on Mondays and Wednesdays from 3:30 to 4:20 p. m. Prof. Marston S. Balch intends to cover about 12 plays from Sophicles to more modern works. Prof. Balch explains that the course will be on, "a limited number of acknowledged masterpieces studied for what they can reveal about the forms and types that have been developed by the great dramatists."

Monday and Thursday evenings will feature a geological class conducted by Prof. C. Wroe Wolfe of Boston University. The course, Our Changing Earth, will span approximately 50 minutes from 7:30 to 8:20. This will be a University Extension Course.

Those aspiring to knowledge of rudimentary psychology should listen to Dr. Edwin B. Newman of Harvard when he discusses Introduction to Psychology on Tuesday adn Thursday afternoons from 3:30 to 4:20. This also is a University Extension Course, and will cover the scientific study of man's experience and behavior. Topics of perceiving, learning, motivation, and action will be discussed, and also the advantages and limitations of regarding psychology as a natural science.

Greek Political Theory is scheduled for Tuesday and Friday evenings from 7:30 to 8:20. Prof. Joseph P. Maguire, Boston College, teaches this course, and it will have the added interest of class participation.

Program for Parents

The Epic, another University Extension Course, by Prof. John H. Finley of Harvard, has been slated for Saturday afternoon. The class time will run from 3:30 to 4:50 p. m., and will deal with the continuities and differences between the classical and modern cultures as reflected in their most comprehensive literary forms.

An interesting highlight for parents will be the inclusion of a child care program. Presented by the Nursery Training School of Boston, this show is included to prove that proper schooling is of tremendous importance in correct upbringing of the child.

Prof. E. H. Armstrong of Columbia University, renowned for his contributions to electronic circuitry, donated the WGBH's three-kilowatt FM transmitter to M. I. T., which in turn has placed it at the disposal of all the Council members. Programs will be beamed from the studios to the Great Blue Hill transmitter by means of a microwave link atop Symphony Hall.

Consulting and supervising engineers in the construction and installation of the station are W. H. Radford, professor of electrical communications, Department of Electrical Engineering, M. I. T., and E. L. Chaffee, professor of applied physics, director of the Laboratories of Engineering Sciences and Applied Physics, Harvard University.

The 67-mile radius of WGBH, which hinges on the five states of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, has a population of approximately 5,000,000 persons in 1,460,000 families. Since 14.4 percent of all homes in the five counties of the Boston Metropolitan area now have FM radio receivers, according to The Pulse, Inc., leading radio audience measurement organization, WGBH will begin broadcasting to a potential audience of some 208,000 families or approximately 740,00 persons.

PROF. JOSEPH P. MAGUIRE of Boston College lectures to his students on Greek political theory. As he talks, he is being recorded for a future WGHB program. The pupils (left to right) are (front row) Michael J. Berrigan of Jamaica Plain, John J. Keaney, also of Jamaica Plain, and W. J. Berry of Milton. Left to right, second row, are Richard M. Welsh of Lynn, Francis M. Coyne of Arlington Heights and Edward P. Ryan of Brighton. At rear is Paul Kelly of Dorchester.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 219,114)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
OCT 1 195

Beecham, Monteux Symphony Guests

Guest conductors scheduled for the coming 71st season of the Boston Symphony are Sir Thomas Beecham and Pierre Monteux. The opening concerts this week on Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday at 8:30 will be conducted by Charles Munch, just returned from France, and the program will be dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Mozart's "Masonic Funeral March," strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" will be played. The same program will be repeated at the opening Tuesday evening concert on Oct. 9.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 2 - 1951

Munch Lists Symphony Plans at First Rehearsal of Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch, looking handsome as ever but this time also tanned and rested, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's first rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday morning. Last Thursday he flew in from Europe where he had been vacationing since the conclusion of the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival in August.

When he greeted members of the press at luncheon following rehearsal, he explained that he had done no conducting in that time, but had enjoyed his leisure first at Berne in Switzerland and later on the French Riviera. And he played golf every day of those several weeks.

When he begins the 71st Symphony season next Friday afternoon at 2:15, Mr. Munch will dedicate the program as a memorial to his predecessor, the late Serge Koussevitzky. Accordingly he will conduct Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss, and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Although Mr. Munch firmly intends not to repeat, this season, any work he has conducted in his previous two years with this orchestra, he will make an exception in the case of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

New Music on Tap

Mr. Munch brought back several new scores from Europe, notably the Monopartita (so-called because it is in one movement) of Honegger, which Mr. Munch terms "a remarkable document." This he will perform for the first time in America. There will also be new symphonies by the Czech Bohuslav Martinu and the Hungarian Tibor Harsanyi.

There will also be a good amount of American music, by Alexis Haieff, Aaron Copland, Irving Fine (his Notturno), Walter Piston's new Fourth Symphony, and a work by Harold Shapero, of Newton.

Mr. Munch added information to that already announced concerning the soloists of the season. Artur Rubinstein will perform the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, while cellist Gregor Piatigorsky will be heard in the Haydn Cello Concerto and the "Don Quixote" by Strauss. When the French pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie makes her American debut, she will be soloist in the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff.

Zara Nelsova will be heard in either the Concerto by Dvorak or that by Samuel Barber, while violist William Primrose will play both the Viola Concerto of Bartok and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." That Wagner program, in which soprano Kirsten Flagstad will be soloist, will be no less than the entire first act of "Die Walkuere" in concert form.

Beecham, Monteux Guests

There will be two guest conductors, Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham. Mr. Monteux has not yet set his program, but Sir Thomas has chosen the Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," the Sixth Symphony by Sibelius, and music of Handel and Delius.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will participate in the Easter performances of Bach's St. John Passion. The choruses for Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" and "La Damnation de Faust," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony have not yet been chosen.

Seven new members have joined the Boston Symphony this Fall: violinists Leo Panasevich and William Waterhouse; violas Bernard Kadinoff and Vincent Mauricci; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; Olivia Hall Luetke, harp, and Harold Farberman, percussion.

Several members of the orchestra have retired: John Murray, Henri Erkelens, Joseph Lukatsky, Harry Herforth, Elford Caughey, Siegfried Gerhardt, Charles Van Wynbergen and Gaston Dufresne, the latter to become first double bass of the Chicago Symphony. John Holmes has rejoined the orchestra as third oboe

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 30 1951

CHARLES MUNCH will begin the 71st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his third as music director, at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon at 2:15.

Charles Munch Begins Symphony Season Friday With Memorial to Koussevitzky

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon at 2:15, (to which the beginning time has been advanced), and Saturday evening at 8:30.

Charles Munch, having returned from France, will assemble the orchestra tomorrow morning for rehearsal in preparation for his third season as its music director. His first program, likewise to be presented at the opening Tuesday concert, Oct. 9, will be dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitsky, and will consist of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

At the series of Tuesday evening concerts, the two guest conductors of the season will both appear, Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham. Soloists will be the pianists Aldo Ciccolini and Byron Janis. For the series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, which is to begin on Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham will likewise be guest conductors and Byron Janis will be among the soloists.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 391,480)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
OCT 2 - 1951

Munch Back To Symphony

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season will take place in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30. The first concert of the Tuesday evening series of nine will begin Tuesday, Oct. 9, at 8:30.

Charles Munch, having returned from France, has assembled the orchestra in preparation for his third season as its music director. His first program, likewise to be presented at the opening Tuesday concert, will be dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. It will onsist of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

At the series of Tuesday evening concerts, the two great conductors of the season will both appear, Pierre Monteux and Sir Thomas Beecham.

[8]

HENRY ROMEIKE THE ORIGINAL NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

HENRY ROMEIKE THE ORIGINAL NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

WESTBOROUGH, MASS
CHRONOTYPE
10/5/51

NEW RADIO STA. TO BROADCAST BEGINNING SAT.

Programs of Educational Value To be Heard by FM Receiving Sets from 3 to 10 P. M.

Next Saturday night at 8:30 a full-length live performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be made available to radio listeners in this area when WGBH, Boston's newest FM station for educational, non-commercial broadcasting, goes on the air with its inaugural broadcast direct from the stage of Symphony Hall.

WGBH, at 89.7 megacycles on the FM band, offers many programs never before available in this section. During the week there will be regular courses recorded in the classrooms of the Greater Boston colleges and Universities, Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, M. I. T., Northeastern and Tufts. Featured among the courses will be Forms of the Drama, Introduction to Psychology, Our Changing Earth, Greek Political Theory, the Epic, and a course on United States history.

Next Sunday afternoon from 3 to 5 WGBH will broadcast the Budapest String Quartet with Mieczyslaw Horsowski from the Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress in Washington. The program will originate at station WGMS, Washington and will come to WGBH over the Continental Network. Sunday night from 7 to 10:20, in co-operation with the British Broadcasting Company, Shakespeare's Hamlet, starring John Gielgud, will be broadcast.

A Monday night highlight will be a poetry reading by Carl Sandburg from 8:30 to 10. Of special interest to theatre-goers will be the Brattle Theatre Company's full-length presentation of Billy Budd on Tuesday, 8:30 to 10:20 p. m.

An outstanding opera, Desire of the Sorrows, will be presented Wednesday night on WGBH by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation direct from Montreal. This broadcast is scheduled from 7:30 to 10. Thursday evening's main performance will be the Young Ireland Players in a series of short plays from 8:30 to 10.

On Friday from 2:15 to 4:30 p. m. and Saturday from 8:30 to 10:30 p. m. the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will again be heard. Also scheduled are comprehensive interpretations of world news and events by faculty specialists, full-length dramatic productions from the Tufts Arena Theatre, a Children's Hour supervised by the Nursery Training School of Boston (a Tufts affiliate), and forums on world affairs with distinguished New England scholars and scientists.

WGBH will broadcast daily from 3 p. m. to 10 p .m. Friday, due to the earlier performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, operation will begin at 2:15 p. m. Programs will be beamed from the studios at Symphony Hall to the transmitter on Great Blue Hill by means of a micro-wave link.

Professor E. H. Armstrong of Columbia University, renowned for his contributions to electronic circuitry, donated the station's three-kilowatt transmitter which will have 20,000 watts effective radiated power.

BRISTOL, R.I.
PHOENIX
10/5/51

This and That from Here and There

I want to put in a plug for a new radio station that's going to have its initial broadcast tomorrow. It's an FM station in Boston. It will have no "commercials"—which is why it's getting this plug. Furthermore it will devote its programs to educational and cultural material and the listener can enjoy what he hears without having to be told that he ought to take something for his stomach, hair, teeth, bad breath—or what have you. Or be shouted at to sound off for some darn fool cigarette. That in itself should be a tremendous relief.

The station letters will b e WGBH and it will be found on the FM band at 89.7 megacycles. Tomorrow night's program will start at 8:30 with a full-length "live" performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Saturday evening program of its 71st season.

This new non-commercial station will offer many programs never before available in this section of the country. During the week, for instance, there will be regular college or extention courses recorded in the classrooms. Among them will b e Forms of the Drama, from Tufts; Introduction to Psychology, Our Changing Earth, and The Epic (University Extention Courses), also Greek Political Theory, from Boston College; and the United States in World History, from M. I. T.

Next Sunday, from 3 to 5 p.m., WGBH will broadcast the Budapest String Quartet from t h e Coolidge Auditorium of the Library of Congress in Washington. In the evening from 7 to 10:20, in cooperation with the British Broadcasting Corporation, Shakespeare's Hamlet starring John Gielgud will be broadcast. A Monday night highlight will b e a poetry reading by Carl Sandburg from 8:30 to 10. Of special interest to theatre-goers will be the Brattle Theatre Company's full-length presentation of Billy Budd on Tuesday, 8:30 to 10:20 p.m.

Thursday evening's main performance will be the Young Ireland Players in a series of short plays from 8:30 to 10. On Friday, Oct. 12 from 2:15 to 4:30 and Saturday, Oct. 13, from 8:30 to 10:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Charles Munch conducting, will again be heard. Also scheduled are comprehensive interpretations of world news and events by faculty specialists, full-length dramatic productions from the Tufts Arena Theatre, a Children's Hour supervised by the Nursery Training School of Boston (a Tufts affiliate) and forums o n world affairs with distingushed New England scholars a n d scientists.

WGBH will broadcast daily from 3 p. m. to 10 p. m. On Friday, due to the earlier performance of the Boston Symphony, operation will begin at 2:15. Programs will be beamed from the studios at Symphony Hall to the transmitter on Great Blue Hill by means of a micro-wave link.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 6 - 1951

SOCIETY: Bostonians Weep at Koussevitzky Memorial

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Bostonians wept, quietly but openly, through the Mozart, Strauss and Tchaikovsky program with which Charles Munch opened the 71st season of Symphony yesterday afternoon, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Many a Friday subscriber, looking up to the platform where that familiar straight-back figure stood for a quarter-century of concert beginners, could still see that dynamic, unforgettable face, and there were tears on the faces of the orchestra members as they stood in silent tribute.

Remembering—Wallace Goodrich and the George Lewises—Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott—Mrs. Moses Williams and her son, Alex—Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and Mrs. William Dana Orcutt — Mrs. Thomas Proctor—Mrs. Russell Burrage—Mrs. Malcolm Stone—Maxim Karolik—the Eben Drapers—Henry Cabot and Richard Paine—Lewis Perry—Mrs. Schuyler Choate back from Paris—Mrs. Karl Reimer—Mrs. Gelston King—the George Saltonstall Wests — Mrs. Morgan Plummer — Mr. and Mrs. George F. Stanley—Mrs. Guy Currier and Mrs. Robert Steinert — George Judd and the slight, black-clad figure of Mrs. Koussevitsky.

A RECEPTION AT HOTEL HAWTHORNE in Salem will follow the wedding today of Miss Joan Mary Fitzpatrick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James P. Fitzpatrick of Marblehead, to William James Grattan Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. William James Grattan, also of Marblehead. Rev. John Fallon will perform the wedding ceremony in Star of the Sea Church, and the bride's father will give her away.

The bride is wearing white rose-point lace over marquisette, and a fingertip veil of French illusion with a tiarra of seed pearls and orange blossoms. Her flowers are white orchids and stephanotis.

Miss Alice Fitzpatrick, maid of honor, is wearing peacock nylon tulle with matching accessories, and the bridesmaids, who are wearing coral nylon tulle, are Miss Audrey Fitzpatrick, and Miss Carol Porter.

As 14.4% of all homes in New England area now have FM radio receivers, it will be possible for WGBH to begin broadcasting to a potential audience of 208,000 families, or 740,000 persons. All programs are planned and scheduled with the adivce and co-operation of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council whose members include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Lowell Institute, and six Greater Boston colleges and universities.

The Council will continue to present educational programs over Boston's commercial AM. FM, and TV stations. In their 847 hours of broadcasting, the Council won nationwide recognition and a number of awards, including the George Foster Peabody Radio Citation "for outstanding contributions to education through broadcasting during 1948," two first awards from the Institute for Education by Radio, Ohio State University in 1950, and a citation from the 17th annual Variety survey of Showmanagement in 1950 for "an exciting adventure in New England adult education."

lapsed into melodrama or mere theatricality. This was Mr. Munch's third venture with Strauss, and by far his most successful. Here was an occasion and he rose to it.

Would that as much might be said for the performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, with which the concert concluded. It began well, to be sure, save for an unaccountably sour chord at the end of the first movement, but Mr. Munch cannot recapture Koussevitzky's virtuosic way with the March-Scherzo, with him it degenerates into course-toned turbulence; nor can he impart to the final Adagio the sense of cosmic grief and lamentation. The will to do so may be there but the power to achieve it is lacking. This was Koussevitzky's symphony. To play it in his honor was altogether appropriate, but the effect was to remind you forcefully and regretfully of Koussevitzky's unique accomplishment with this highly personal score.

Six colleges and universities of Greater Boston are participants in the programs daily broadcast from that station from 3:00 P. M. to 10:30 P. M. The intellectual voltage of these may be estimated from some of the features announced for the week from Sunday, October 7th, to the following Saturday: drama, an opera, chamber music, the two regular symphony concerts, and five University Extension courses in literature, science, and political theory. Harvard, Boston University, Boston College, Tufts, Northeastern, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology spread these banquets by the sightless couriers of the air, food that is at once rich and nourishing to minds whose good digestion waits on appetite.

The vitality of an institution may be measured by its capacity for growth. So measured, the Boston Symphony's expansion of its usefulness during the past quarter century is, in its larger aspects, one of the pertinent historical facts of our time. At the outset of these broadcasts it may be remembered that the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals at Tanglewood began under a circus tent. The tent of Perie Banou in the Arabian Nights could be carried in the palm of the hand, but could also be spread widely enough to shelter an army.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

All programs are planned and scheduled with the advice and co-operation of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council whose members include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Lowell Institute, M. I. T., Northeastern and Tufts. Since 14.4% of all homes in the New England area now have FM radio receivers, it will be possible for this new station to begin broadcasting to a potential audience of 208,000 families, or 740,000 persons.

The Council will of course continue to present educational programs over Boston's commercial AM, FM ,and TV stations. In their 847 hours of broadcasting, since February 1947, the Council has won nationwide recognition and a number of awards, including the George Foster Peabody Radio Citation "for outstanding contributions to education through broadcasting during 1948," also two first awards from the Institution for Education by Radio, Ohio State University in 1950, and a citation from the 17th annual Variety survey of Show Management in 1950 for "an exciting adventure in New England adult education."

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 4 - 1951

Symphony Broadcasts at Charles Meeting House

The broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over WGBH will be offered over a sound system at the Charles Street Universalist Meeting House, Charles and Mount Vernon sts., as a public service. Both the Friday concert at 2:15 p. m nad the Saturday concert at 8:30 p. m. will be reproduced free to the public.

To celebrate the opening of WGBH, the Meeting House will alsc be open Sunday through Wednesday evenings, Oct. 7-10, to bring in special programs of drama and music.

Every Thursday evening the Meeting House offers a free concert of recorded music, specializing in the music of foreign cultures, and adding chamber, choral and solo selections to the symphonic repertoire.

The first symphony broadcast will be this Saturday evening.

Ser 56

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 505,451) (S 1,109,491)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 7 - 1951

BOSTON FM STATION BOWS

Non-Commercial WGBH Carries Concert by Symphony

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 6—The new non-commercial frequency modulation radio station WGBH went into operation tonight with a broadcast of the season's first Saturday night concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All programs of the orchestra will be carried by the powerful new station, which has studios in Symphony Hall.

A visitor to the studio tonight was Maj. Edwin Armstrong of Columbia University, who perfected FM broadcasting and donated the transmitter being used by station WGBH.

The new station is sponsored by the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, which includes six colleges and universities in greater Boston. WGBH has 20,000 watts effective radiated power. It operates at 89.7 megacycles of the FM band on channel 209.

Tonight's program, with Charles Munch directing, included Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music; Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and the Symphony No. 6 in B minor of Tchaikovsky. The program was a memorial to Serge Koussevitzky, for many years conductor of the orchestra.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
OCT 4 - 1951

Broadcast Slated Saturday Evening By Hub Symphony

This Saturday night at 8:30 a full-length "live" performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast from Station WGBH, Boston's newest FM station for educational, non-commercial broadcasting, which will go on the air for the first time, direct from Symphony Hall.

WGBH, at 89.7 megacycles on the FM band, will offer many programs never before available in this section, including college or extension courses recorded in the classrooms. Among them will be "Forms of the Drama," from Tufts; "Introduction to Psychology," "Our Changing Earth," and "The Epic," University Extension Course; "Greek Political Theory," from Boston College, and "The United States in World History," from M. I. T.

Next Sunday afternoon from 3 to 5, the Budapest String Quartet will be heard from Washington. Sunday night, from 7 to 10:20, in co-operation with the British Broadcasting Corp., Shakespeare's "Hamlet," starring John Gielgud, will be broadcast.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 9,069)
This Clipping From
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
OCT 4 - 1951

FULL LENGTH SYMPHONY ON NEW FM STATION

Next Saturday night at 8:30 a full-length live performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be made available to radio listeners in this area when WGBH, Boston's newest FM station for educational, non-commercial broadcasting, goes on the air with its inaugural broadcast direct from the stage of Symphony Hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 6 - 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What promises to be an eventful symphony season, the orchestra's 71st got under way yesterday afternoon with a concert in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The late conductor had been extensively memorialized at Tanglewood but this was the first symphony concert proper since his death on June 4. Yesterday's program will receive its regular repetition this evening, and, for the first time in 23 years, a complete Boston Symphony concert will go on the air over the new FM station, WGBH, located in Symphony Hall itself. Beginning next Friday both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be broadcast and that will make radio history.

When Charles Munch came on the stage yesterday afternoon to begin his third season as the orchestra's conductor, audience and band rose in greeting. Before beginning the first number, Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, Mr. Munch asked the audience to stand for a moment in silent tribute when the piece was concluded. It was with this solemn and impressive music that the first concert in the Tanglewood Shed began last summer, and Mr. Munch made the same request of the festival audience.

Mozart's piece, last heard at the regular concerts in 1914, received, as it had in the Berkshires, a most eloquent presentation. And after that Mr. Munch gave us as gripping a performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" as we have heard in many a year. This tone poem, wholly in place on such a program, was set forth in a manner to do complete justice to its structural plan, its many and sharply contrasting moods and, above all, its pervading drama, which never

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 5 - 1951

THE TENT OF PERIE BANOU

Two tall tales from the Arabian Nights have come true. One is the magic carpet, the other is the tent of Perie Banou. Our skies now abound with magic carpets—a bit too plentiful at times—fabricated of steel; the tent of Perie Banou is more mysterious, being woven of vibrations which hold converse with the incorporeal air.

At the start of each season some novel and organic development can be expected of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This afternoon, as the orchestra begins its 71st series of concerts, there is in Symphony Hall for the first time a broadcasting studio. The Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances throughout the season will be broadcast in full from the stage, and a microwave link will relay all programs to Station WGBH (Great Blue Hill in Milton), which operates from the Harvard Observatory by the 92-foot tower and antenna rising 724 feet above sea level and carrying to listeners within a 67-mile radius of Boston.

The word Massachusetts means "at the Great Blue Hill." So it was named by the Indian tribes, and the white man extended that name from Cape Cod and Cape Ann to the Berkshires. Back in the days when the Boston Symphony Orchestra could be heard only by limited audiences in person, the regret was that its infinite riches could not be shared with the multitude. They now are. The orchestra has become a participant in the new, noncommercial, educational FM radio station, which is operated with the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

An old war horse of national politics had been induced to read Romain Rolland's "Jean-Christophe," the protagonist of which is a composite portrait of Wagner, Beethoven, Hugo Wolf and perhaps one or two more European composers. He finished reading the novel with this remark, "Christophe got excited over strange sounds."

To the casual listener and if the music be trivial, strange sounds may seem all there is to it; but not when the masterworks of musical literature are played by the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. Such music has definite meanings even when not associated with choral texts such as Bach's Passion According to St. John, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," or Beethoven's Choral Symphony, all of which will be heard this season. Wordless symphonic scores have distinct personality, poetic content, and revealing origins in the life and development of the composers. The visible audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been so long and so well acquainted with these by the admirable program notes that what sixty years ago was a reputably literate musical public has now become a highly cultivated one, which knows the orchestral repertory much as it knows any other contemporary literature.

To extend this valuable instruction to the invisible audience, Prof. G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Herald Choirs, will discuss "Tomorrow's Symphony" on Station WGBH Thursday afternoons from 4:30 to 5:30.

[10]

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 322,441) (S 256,656)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 4 - 1951

SYMPHONY TO BE BROADCAST

WGBH Launches 7-Day Radio Schedule

The first complete (live) performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the past 25 years will be broadcast Saturday from 8:30 to 10:30 p. m. as the inaugural program of WGBH, the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council's new FM (frequency modulation) station, direct from the stage of Symphony Hall.

Operating at 89.7 megacycles in the FM band on Channel 209, WGBH will launch a seven-day-a-week schedule of cultural programs with the co-operation of six colleges and universities of Greater Boston; Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, M. I. T., Northeastern and Tufts.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 505,451) (S 1,109,491)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 4 - 1951

WGBH to Start Broadcasts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 3—Boston's new frequency modulation radio station, WGBH, will inaugurate its educational, non-commercial broadcasting facilities with a full-length, live performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night, it was announced today. The station is operated by the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council. Parker Wheatley, council director, said that the station would reach a potential of 208,000 families in Greater Boston and New England.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 10,571)
This Clipping From
MALDEN, MASS.
NEWS
OCT 3 - 1951

First Baptist Organist Edw H Low Was Student Conductor at Tanglewood

Edward H Low, organist and choir director of the First Baptist church, who received a scholarship from Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer for [redacted] Tanglewood under Hugh Ross, nationally known conductor, was chosen as the student conductor for "Tanglewood On Parade."

In addition to work at the New England Conservatory of Music for four years, especially with Geo Faxon, organist and choir director of St Paul's Cathedral, Boston, Organist Low has studied with an eminent English composer, T Tertius Noble, organist emeritus of St Thomas' church, Fifth ave, New York City.

BLANK PAGE

Ser. 56

BLANK PAGE

MO

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 46,049) (S 164,683)
This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 7 - 1951

Monteux to Return with Hub Symphony

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

AFTER an interval of more than 25 years, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence again this season. He was conductor of the Boston orchestra from 1919 to 1924, preceding the late Serge Koussevitzky. He and Sir Thomas Beecham will be guest conductors this season, though Sir Thomas will not appear in Providence. He was here last season with his own orchestra.

Monteux's appearance here will be on Nov. 27. On Jan. 1, Aldo Ciccolini, young Italian pianist, will be soloist here with the orchestra.

Announced at Luncheon

These and some other matters were made known last week at a Symphony Hall luncheon that followed the first rehearsal of the season. Conductor Charles Munch, recently back from Switzerland and the Cote d'Azur, put the orchestra through a sort of secret practice, then attended the luncheon, with the orchestra staff and a dozen newspapermen. The orchestra's season began with a concert at Wellesley Wednesday and two in Boston, Friday afternoon and last night.

The Providence season will open Oct. 30 in Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. Mr. Munch will conduct Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Season subscribers will receive only one ticket for the present, because of the possibility that the federal amusement tax on symphony orchestra tickets may be repealed. This would necessitate certain changes—which orchestras would be happy to make.

New Piano Concerto

Mr. Munch announced he would introduce, at the Boston concerts, a new piano concerto by Rousel. He said it would be the first American performance, but John N. Burk, program annotator, gently recalled that the Indianapolis Orchestra had performed it, at which Mr. Munch threw back his head with an "Oh-oh" of amused dismay.

A new Honegger "Monopartita," a new Martinu symphony, a new piano concerto by Lukas Foss, accepted sight-unseen, and works by Copland and Piston were mentioned by Mr. Munch for the Boston season. Whether any of them will resound in Providence has not yet been decided.

Seven new musicians will join the orchestra—two violins, two violas, a trumpet, a percussion, and a lady harp, the latter being the first of her sex on the permanent roll for a good many years.

Soloists Announced

Among soloists at the Boston concerts will be: Artur Rubinstein, Claudio Arrau, Byron Janis, and Monique de la Bruchollerie, pianists; Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova, cellists; and William Primrose, violist. Kirsten Flagstad will sing with the orchestra for the first time. Mr. Foss, now in Rome, will go to Boston in November to play his concerto.

"L'Enfance du Christ," a Ber-

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 6 - 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the first concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Masonic Funeral Music (E. 477) Mozart
"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 Strauss Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74 Tvhaikvosky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an event that always produces the feeling in me at least, that everything begins from here. It is at once musical and social, at once the manifestation of a more inward approach folowing the physical activities of the summer, and a rekindling of the more disciplined attitudes of the autumn season. So it was yesterday.

But yesterday it was also an occasion, a solemn occasion. For it was a program dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and a more suitable gesture or a more suitable program—could hardly be imagined. Every bar of the music, from Mozart's noble or funeral music inspired by the passing of his Masonic friends, to the apocalyptic melancholy of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, conjured up the sad fact that never again would the trim, elegant, magnificently proud figure of Serge Koussevitzky stalk upon the conductor's stand of Symphony Hall to survey, with immense grandeur, his "children."

MOMENT OF SLIENCE

At the begining of the concert Charles Munch, whose aristocratic bearing and trim figure equals Koussevitzky's own, announced that the program was dedicated to the late conductor and requested the audience to stand for a moment of silence following the Mozart. This familiar ceremony, which always seems just a little embarrassing to me (though I can think of nothing more appropriate), went about as well as I've ever seen it go. The audience did stand and, after a moment or two of rustling, managed to maintain a quite incredible silence for perhaps a half a minute. As a performance of reverent duty, it was quite as virtuoso as the performance of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" by the orchestra that followed.

This work, one that Koussevitzky himself loved and which, like the Pathetique, he imbued with a quality of elegaic delirium, is a fairly self-conscious meditation on death and life after death that, unless given with a certain detachment, turns into an orgy of maudlin sentimentality. Aware of this, Mr. Munch gave the long concluding section of the transfiguration, with its reiterated phrase of ascension, the most discreet treatment. There was never any doubt that Mr. Strauss was making the grade into paradise, but he wasn't hurled there by Mr. Munch.

The Sixth Symphony, with which Mr. Munch made such a deep impression two years ago, ws equally unsentimentlly conceived. It was somewhat less urgent in character thn it was then and, in the march, it was more controlled, the contrasts of the mounting tonl planes being more subtle, more inward. Mr Munch, I am sure, sees in this work no personal confession of self-pity on the part of Techaikovsky ta all, but thhat composer's gret compassion for humanity. He thus conveys the real tragedy of the work far more effectively than a more personal, more intimate conception ever could. It was consequently at once solemn and tender, despairing and wistful, dolorous and hopeful. And, as always, the march was given with such a disply of orchestral mastery it elicited spontaneous appluse.

MARVELOUS START

Speaking of orchestral mastery, the men of the orchestra never displayed it so gloriously as they did in this opening concert. I have never heard the brsses sound more strikingly integrated technically and tonally (though there were, I must report some slightly uneven attacks). The strings might still chieve a little more of the radiance of tone they are famous the world over for, but they were nonetheless superb. Another week of playing together and the orchestra will be in midseason form, but it certinly got off to a marvelous start yesterday.

It may be noted, incidentally, and with regret, that five members of the orchestra have, after more than 25 yaers of service, retired. They are Charles van Wynbergen and Siegfried Gerhardt, violas; Henri Erkelens and John Murray, violins; and Elford Caughey, harp. New members as of this esason are Leo Panesevitch and William Waterhouse, violins; Barnard Kadinoff and Vincent Mauricci, violas; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; Olivia Lueteke, harp (the only woman in the orchestra) and Harold Faberman, percussion. The orchestra contains one less bass player than formerly; the personnel and composition otherwise remains the same.

As has been noted, beginning with the concert tonight, all of these programs are now being broadcast over the FM station WGBH. Those in the city without FM equipment may hear these broadcasts free of charge at the Charles Street Meeting House on Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings. The program next week offers the pianist Alexander oBrovsky in Weber's Concertstuecke and Roussel's Piano Concerto (a first performance), other works being Beethoven's Overture to Egmont and Brahms' Symphony No. 3.

keep silence after the Mozart Masonic Funeral Music."

Exaltation

Though the conductor's request was followed exactly, and though the entire program was music associated with mortal ending, the afternoon was not one of gloom. It is not in the nature of the musical art to remain darksome and bowed for long, an attribute which Koussevitzky himself well understood when he was among us. Out of death comes immortality. Even in the brief eulogy of Mozart, a funeral march, a certain exaltation soon rises out of the depths of C minor, and it is significant that the piece ends in the brightness of the major key.

In the audience dressed in black, sat Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, the late conductor's widow, who had come down from the Koussevitzky Summer home, Serenak, in the Berkshire, to hear this memorial to her husband.

The remainder of the program consisted of two late 19th Century masterpieces which had been favorites with Koussevitzy during his long career: Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Power and Mastery

These Mr. Munch read with irresistible power, and with a consummate mastery of technic. The pace of the various sections of "Death and Transfiguration," a touchy matter and easily made too slow or too fast, seemed to be just right. Strauss' counterpoint, often heavy and complex and posing a problem of balance between the sounding brass and the singing woods and strings, was absolutely clear. You could hear everything essential that was going on.

Mr. Munch's way with the "Pathetic" is all his own; passionate and forceful, yet meticulous of detail and always under emotional control. There was noticeable refinement in yesterday's performance over that of two season's ago.

It is not possible to describe fully, to anyone who has not heard it, the sheer glory and richness and beauty of the Boston Symphony tone. Especially after one has not heard it for some weeks. The brass, which had been a shade less integrated and mellow than it might have been during these two past seasons, showed itseslf in a new golden aura during the Tchaikovsky work. Only one continuing flaw was discernible: the inclination of the woodwinds, and especially of the first oboe, to jump the conductor's beat upon an entrance. It was not more than a split-second's difference, but discernible, all the same.

Monitor Oct. 6

Memorial Concert to Koussevitzky Presented

By Harold Rogers

The seventy-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is under way. It was launched yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall when Charles Munch, now in his third season as the orchestra's conductor, mounted the podium. The musicians and audience rose to greet him.

After the applause subsided, Mr. Munch said that this concert was the orchestra's first in Boston since the passing of Serge Koussevitzky.

"We have dedicated this program to the memory of the great leader," he said. "We ask you to stand for a moment of silence after we play the Funeral Music of Mozart."

* * *

Mr. Munch then conducted the serene and stately measured phrases of the Masonic Funeral Music. As the listeners stood in silence many may have remembered Koussevitzky as he looked while standing there on the stage—his slight, trim figure, his aristocratic bearing, his head held high.

Then Munch began the opening strains of Richard Strauss's majestic tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

His reading of the poem differs considerably from that of Eleazar de Carvalho, who played it at Tanglewood last summer. Mr. Carvalho built his climaxes slowly and expanded them into great mountains of sound. Mr. Munch, on the other hand, has a tendency to contract the climaxes into smaller, surcharged spaces. It would not be easy to say which is better. Both are effective. The Carvalho reading apparently comes closer to the German style.

Mr. Munch's handling of the "transfiguration" section, however, was superior for its buoyant evanescence, its ethereal and transcendental qualities. The conductor finds his forte in the rarefied realms of poetry, and his abilities here would be difficult to surpass.

* * *

After the intermission the program was brought to a close with Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony in B minor, the "Pathétique." It was an admirable choice for this memorial concert, since Koussevitzky was a true devotee of the Russian composer and his interpreter par excellence.

Here again Mr. Munch's reading differs from Koussevitzky's—principally in the fact that the Herzensschmerz is all but missing. It is true that Mr. Munch has a touching way with the sweeping themes of the opening movement; the development sections, however, tended to meaningless bombast. But the Allegro con grazia, with its lilting five-four measures, was an expression of sheer beauty; and Mr. Munch's interpretation of the Allegro molto vivace, with its stirring parades and military fanfares, was brilliant.

* * *

The finale of this third movement is so conclusive that listeners are often deceived into thinking that the symphony has come to an end. Such was the case yesterday. The movement was followed by much applause, many got up to leave; even some of the ushers were misled into opening the doors for the exodus.

But the audience soon settled down for the Finale, the Adagio lamentoso, and it was certainly worth waiting for. Mr. Munch brought the movement to a serene conclusion that barely whispered

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 7 - 1951

All of us will have to grow a third ear . . . one for radio, one for television and one to follow Frequency Modulation, which is growing in leaps and bounds in Boston.

WGBH took to the air yesterday, with a live performance of the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra. Today the FM station will carry the Budapest String Quartet direct from the Library of Congress featuring Dvorak's Quintet; Mozart's E Major Trio and Brahms's Quintet, Op 34.

Inaugural greetings will be broadcast at 5 p. m. today and a "Hamlet" production at 7 p. m. will conclude the day's schedule. The station will be on the air daily from 3 p. m. to 10 p. m. with some of the choicest of listening features.

* * *

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 8 - 1951

Non-Commercial Radio Station Inaugurated

Boston, Oct. 7 —(INS)— WGBH, Boston's new high-power non-commercial FM radio station for educational broadcasting, yesterday went on the air with the first Saturday performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 7[redacted]-

To inaugurate the new station, the Boston Symphony joined with the Lowell Institute and six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston, University, Harvard, MIT, Northeastern and Tufts.

The colleges have been members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in this area.

[13]

Ser 56

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 7 - 1951

Back in the Saddle Again--- Boston Symphony on the Air

By RUDOLPH ELIE

At 8:30 last night a remarkable thing happened in the city of Boston; a thing that hasn't happened in 25 years and a thing that most of us feared would never happen again: The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in a broadcast performance of its entire concert from the stage of Symphony Hall. And, marvel of marvels, it is going to be heard in all of the 24 programs of its 71st season, without commercial announcements, without interruptions, without any nonsense of any kind. The millennium, it would seem, is here!

This remarkable thing happened—and it is but one of several remarkable things—through the vision of a man named Ralph Lowell, who, as trustee of a Boston institution created by his great-grandfather (the one who spoke only to the Cabots who spoke only to God), some years ago re-interpreted the trust that created the famous Lowell Institute lecture series and put them on the air through the now world-famous Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

The story of this Institute of the air has long been told. Everyone knows of the extraordinary programs broadcast ever since 1946 over most of the Boston radio stations; programs offering the faculty members of Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, MIT, Northeastern and Tufts in informative and educational discussions of the arts, sciences and problems of the day. As of last night, however, the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council has its own radio station with the most modern of studios located in Symphony Hall itself. And while the Institute will continue to present programs on other radio stations, there is no doubt that, in station WGBH, the Lowell Institute—with the possibility of TV in the future—has created the most striking advance in broadcast culture to appear in American radio.

MEETING HOUSE, TOO

Station WGBH is a frequency modulation station, operating (if you're interested in technical matters) at 89.7 mc. on channel 209. It operates at 20,000 watts, with transmitter on Great Blue Hill in Milton. Thus it may be heard with a strong, clear signal by anyone with a radio receiver containing FM at a distance of 70 or more miles. (According to Pulse, which surveys things of this nature, there are about 208,000 radios in that area equipped with FM, which indicates a potential audience in excess of 740,000 people.

Be that as it may, with its inaugural broadcast of the complete program of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night, the station, under the general management of Parker Wheatley, will offer about seven and a half hours a day of broadcast classical music both live and transcribed in addition to its famous round tables, extension courses and broadcast dramas. (In its first week, for instance, it offers live broadcasts of the Budapest Quartet from the Continental FM network, a recital by E. Power Biggs, John Gielgud in "Hamlet," Carl Sandburg reading his own poetry and the Brattle Theater performance of "Billy Budd.")

It may be added in passing that the station has also equipped the famous old Charles Street Meeting House with the finest sound equipment available to the sound engineers of the Radio Shack for the purpose of offering the Symphony concerts to the public free of charge. Both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be offered on FM equipment that can do justice to the full range and volume of the orchestra and Thursday evenings will be devoted, to free concerts of recorded music. Indeed, the Meeting House will be open beginning this evening to celebrate the opening of the station.

So much for WGBH and its plans. It now remains to set forth the program plans of the Symphony itself, and everything points to the fact the Mr. Munch again brings to bear his ingenuity and his catholicity of taste. For the larger works of the season, those with chorus and soloists, the conductor has chosen Berlioz' great "L'Enfance du Christ" (never previously done by this orchestra) and the same composer's "Damnation of Faust," one of the most exciting works in the entire choral literature.

MANY SOLOISTS

During Christmas week, Mr. Munch will repeat Bach's St. John Passion (alternating this sublime work with the St. Matthew Passion each season), and he will close the season with Beethoven's Ninth.

Among the piano soloists of the forthcoming season are Alexander Borovsky playing Weber's Concertstuecke and Roussel's Piano Concerto; Lukas Foss playing his own new Piano Concerto; Artur Rubinstein in Brahms' Second, Claudio Arrau (work not announced) and Monique de la Bruchollerie in Rachmaninoff's Third. Byron Janis and Aldo Ciccolini will appear in the shorter series.

Among the string virtuosi are Jascha Heiftez, Anshel Brusilow and Andre Grumiaux, violinists; William Primrose, violist, and Gregor Piatigorsky and Zara Nelsova, cellists. Mr. Primrose will give the Boston premiere of the Bartok Concerto and do the obbligato of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The only singer to appear this year will be Kirsten Flagstad in a concert presentation of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," though of course there will be soloists in the choral works.

Pierre Monteux will return again this season to appear as guest conductor, and Sir Thomas Beecham will give us a program of Sibelius, Delius and Rimsky-Korsakov. An imposing list of guest artists this is indeed; much stronger than the Symphony has offered in many years.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 85,505)
This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
OCT 8 - 1951

Radio Station Wins Praise For 8 Minutes of Silence

WGBH at Boston Lets Listeners Enjoy the Intermission At a Symphony Concert

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP)—An eight-minute period of virtual silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatist invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Sturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started it's career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During the interval, the radio audience heard only the murmur of concert goers' voices which came over an open microphone set up in the lobby of Symphony Hall where the station is housed.

Station Manager Parker Wheatley explained the pause this way: "It gives people a break, let the do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley quoted one listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music, to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

Another telephoned the station and said "in my opinion your intermission is the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Miss Jane Wagoner, director of audio-visual education in the Milton public schools, said: "I liked the intermission. It made the program informal and much less arty than most such programs."

George E. Judd of Norwell, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio."

Judd said that some people, after listening to a symphony on radio for two solid hours, build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "but the intermission is a refreshing pause."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-Operative Broadcasting Council whose members include Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lowell Institute.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 6 - 1951

Munch Pays Symphonic Tribute to Koussevitzky

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch paid symphonic tribute to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Usually the beginning of a new Symphony season is an occasion radiant and happy, the start of another chapter in the long record of one of the world's greatest orchestras. But yesterday's concert was tinged over with a sadness which first had been evoked when Mr. Koussevitzky died in Boston at the age of 77 last June 4.

The customary ceremonial order and the mood of this Fall's beginning naturally was changed. Mr. Munch was greeted by rising orchestra and audience when he first appeared upon the stage, and he acknowledged the gesture with smiling elegance. But where ordinarily he would have turned at once to the music of the afternoon, he raised his hands for silence and gravely addressed the audience.

"This is our first concert in Symphony Hall since the death of Serge Koussevitzky," said Mr. Munch. "We dedicate this program to the memory of that great leader, and we ask that you stand a minute and lioz work that the orchestra has never performed, will be presented in the Christmas season; Bach's "Passion According to St. John" in Holy Week; Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" in April, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the end of the season.

The new FM station, WGBH, with which the orchestra is associated, ought to be audible in Rhode Island, it was said. A studio is now being constructed in Symphony Hall and live concerts by the Boston Symphony will be among the offerings.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 46,074)
This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
OCT 8 - 1951

Eight-Minute Silence Radio's Biggest Step Since Paid Commercial

Boston, Oct. 7. (UP)—A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission—during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGBH which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Station manager Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions — walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said "in my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD
OCT 8 -

Radio Intermission Said 'Best Since Kettle Drum'

Boston, Oct. 7. (UP)—A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission—during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGBH which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Station Manager Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said "In my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

During the interval, the audience heard only the murmer of voices of concert goers which came over an "open" microphone set up in one of the lobbies of Symphony Hall where the station is housed.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said the concensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

Judd said that some people after listening to a symphony for two solid hours build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

Paul A. De Mars, a former radio station executive and engineer for 31 years, said it was "wonderful—I felt as if I were at Symphony Hall."

De Mars, who heard the program at his Salem, N. H., Summer home, said the intermission "certainly is new in American radio. Most stations now look with abhorrence at even five seconds of idle time."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council, members of which include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University and the Lowell Institute.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 21 1951

Living Bread

Bread cast upon the waters does return. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dealing a most living bread to the hungry for nearly 71 years and it is now to spread its table even more amply. The Saturday night concerts are again, for the first time since 1926, to be broadcast complete from actual living performance by a powerful noncommercial FM radio station, WGBH, with studios in Symphony Hall.

This is by affiliation with the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, which includes six colleges and universities of Greater Boston. Was it not Theodore Thomas who said "Popular music is familiar music, and to know is to enjoy"? Radio and recordings in the past quarter of a century have widened the audience for good music beyond all expectations and, in the long term, they have sent people into the concert halls. Those who loyally maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra by their tickets and by their generous contributions may have the satisfaction of its benefits being extended and the bases of its support being potentially broadened.

The wider issue is that an institution which pours such spiritual values into the great community seems thereby to attract the means to wider usefulness.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
OCT 8 - 1951

Concert Broadcast Includes Silence During Intermission

Boston, Oct. 8—(UP)— An eight-minute period of virtual silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, tsarted its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During the interval, the radio audience heard only the murmur of concert goers' voices which came over an open microphone set up in the lobby of symphony hall where the station is housed.

Station Mgr. Parker Wheatley explained the pause this way: "It gives people a break, lets them do what people usually do at concert intermissions — walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley quoted one listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music, to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

Another telephoned the station and said "in my opinion your intermission is the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Miss Jane Wagoner, direcotr of audio-visual education in the Milton public schools, said: "I liked the intermission. It made the program informal and much less arty than most such programs."

George E. Judd, Norwell, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio."

Judd said that some people, after listening to a symphony on radio for two solid hours, build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because fter all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-Operative Broadcasting Council whose members include Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Lowell Institute.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION-LEADER
OCT 8 - 1951

'Great Invention'

Audience Hails 8-Minute Silence in Radio Program

By STANTON BERENS

BOSTON — (UP) — A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission — during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed last night "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM Station WGBH which started its career Saturday night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Station Manager Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable — that one listener telephoned the station and said "in my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

During the interval, the audience heard only the murmer of voices of concert goers which come over an "open" microphone set up in one of the lobbies of Symphony hall where the station is housed.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

Judd said that some people after listening to a symphony for two solid hours build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

Paul A. DeMars, a former radio station executive or engineer for 31 years, said it was "wonderful—I felt as if I were at Symphony hall."

DeMars who heard the program at his Salem, N. H., summer home said the intermission "certainly is new in American radio. Most stations now look with abhorrence at even five seconds of idle time."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-Operative Broadcasting Council, members of which include the Boston Symphony orchestra, Harvard, Boston college, Boston university, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts college, Northeastern university and the Lowell institute.

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
OCT 8 1951

Eight-Minute Silence Boston Radio Innovation

Boston, Oct. 8 (UP).—An eight-minute period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert-hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 8 - 1951

EIGHT MINUTES of silence stole the show when WGBH, Boston's newest FM radio station, broadcast a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony to open its career. The silence marked the concert intermission, and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum."

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
OCT 8 - 1951

'GREATEST THING SINCE KETTLE DRUM'

Bostan radio offers 8 minutes of silence

BOSTON (U.P.)—A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission—during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed last night "as the greatest invention since kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM Station WGBH which started its career Saturday night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Station Manager Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions — walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

EXTREMELY FAVORABLE

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said "in my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on th music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

During the interval, the audience heard only the murmur of voices of concert goers which came over an "open" microphone set up in one of the lobbies of Symphony Hall, where the station is housed.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

BUILD UP A RESISTANCE

Judd said that some people after listening to a symphony for two solid hours build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'atin'—because, after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

Paul A. De Mars, a former radio station executive or engineer for 31 years, said the intermission "certainly is new in American radio." Most stations, he pointed out, now look with abhorrence at even five seconds of idle time.

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-Operative Broadcasting Council, members of which include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University and the Lowell Institute.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 8 - 1951

Radio Station Acclaimed For 8 Minutes of Nothing

By The United Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 7—A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission — during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation came during the initial program of FM station WGHB which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parker Wheatley, the station manager, explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Mr. Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said, "In my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettledrum."

During the interval, the audience heard only the murmur of voices of concert goers that came over an "open" microphone.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
OCT 8 - 1951

Broadcast Silence— Fans Love It

Boston, Oct. 8 (UP)—An eight-minute period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried tc create a "concert hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

READING, PA.
EAGLE
OCT 7 - 1951

Boston Radio Station Provides Intermission

Boston, Oct. 6 (U.P.)—A Boston FM radio station started its career tonight by offering an eight-minute period in which the audience was invited not to listen.

The brief pause for relaxation was given at intermission time during the station's first broadcast—a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Station Manager Parker Wheatley explained the pause was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y.
STAR-JOURNAL
OCT 8 - 1951

Time for a Smoke

BOSTON (UP)—An eight-minute period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JAMAICA, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND PRESS
OCT 8 - 1951

8 Minutes of Silence Opens Radio Concert

BOSTON (UP)—An eight-minutes period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time.

The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere."

The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[15]

Ser 56

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 8 - 1951

Radio Station Intermission Held Biggest Step Since Kettle Drum

Boston, Oct. 7. — (UP) — A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission — during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation —believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGBH which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parker Wheatley, station manager, explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said "in my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 8 - 1951

SILENT INTERMISSION ON BOSTON STATION

Boston Symphony Radio Program Receives High Praise

BOSTON, Oct. 7-(AP)-A non-commercial radio station was still receiving congratulations today for giving its audience a "silent" intermission during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first broadcast in 25 years.

The new high-power FM station —WGBH—began operation last night with a full length "live" broadcast of the Boston Symphony in memory of [illegible] Koussevitzky, its conductor for 25 years. During the 15 minute intermission there was no commentary or talk of any kind broadcast.

Before the intermission, an announcer, speaking from Symphony Hall, told the radio audience:

"Now we invite you to enjoy the intermission as if you were here in Symphony Hall. We want you to think about the music."

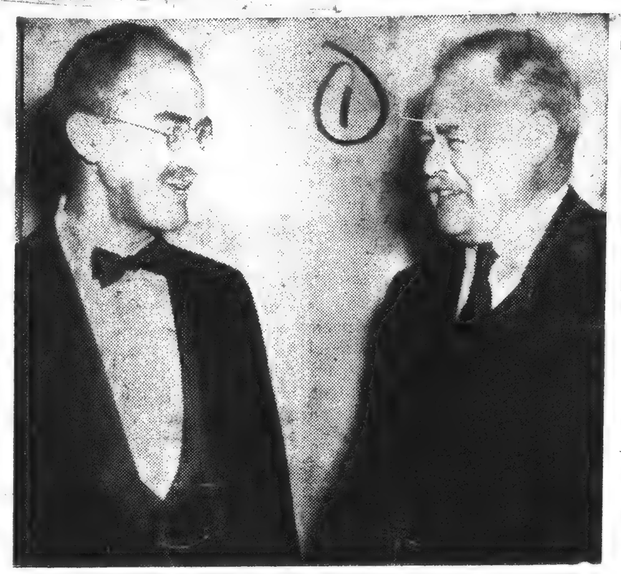
Parker Wheatley, general manager, said the station is the realization of five years of cooperation in educational broadcasting by the Lowell Institute which has been giving free educational lectures for 112 years.

Six Greater Boston universities and colleges, along with the Lowell Institute, advise station operation.

They are: Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Harvard University, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 7 - 1951



OPEN NEW FM RADIO STATION—Henry B. Cabot (left), president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, at Symphony Hall last night before they opened WGBH.

Symphony Hall Broadcast Launches Station WGBH

Boston's new high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, known as WGBH, began operation last night with the first of a series of full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Symphony Hall.

"This marks the first full-length performance of the orchestra to be broadcast in Boston in the past 25 years," Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, told the Symphony Hall and radio audience before the first Saturday-evening performance of the famed orchestra's 71st season.

The new station, he said, is the realization of five years of cooperation in educational broadcasting by six colleges and universities of Greater Boston and the Lowell Institute. They are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

All are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area. The Symphony Orchestra is the newest member.

The station, with studios at Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, "is truly the outgrowth of a community effort," Lowell said, declaring it is "a carrier of the cultural heritage of the world, in which our New England shares so abundantly."

Another speaker at the opening of the station last night was Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who said "the symphony exists for the purpose of playing the greatest music in the best possible manner to as many people as possible."

The new station enlarges the symphony's audience considerably, he said, thanking those who gave time and money to make WGBH possible.

An unusual feature of the broadcast which followed was the silent period during the regular intermission. This 15 minutes of quiet gave listeners at home the same chance to relax and discuss the performance as those who attended.

Last night's program by the orchestra consisted of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music" in memory of the orchestra's late conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6."

WGBH signed off the air immediately after the performance. It will broadcast henceforth from 3 p. m. to 10:30 p. m. During the Symphony season broadcasting will begin at 2:15 p. m. on Fridays and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the Symphony's performance.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 8 - 1951

Concert Over FM Station Gives 'Break' to Listeners

BOSTON, Oct. 7 (UP) — A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGBH which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

STATION MANAGER Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said, "In my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

* * *

DURING THE INTERVAL, the audience heard only the murmur of voices of concert goers which came over an "open" microphone set up in one of the lobbies of symphony hall where the station is housed.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

Judd said that some people after listening to a symphony for two solid hours build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

* * *

PAUL A. DeMARS, a former radio station executive or engineer for 31 years, said it was "wonderful—I felt as if I were at Symphony Hall."

DeMars, who heard the program at his Salem, NH, summer home, said the intermission "certainly is new in American radio. Most stations now look with abhorrence at even five seconds of idle time."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council, members of which include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University and the Lowell Institute.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 9 - 1951

Historic Silence

During a "live" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night, the announcer asked the audience not to listen for eight minutes. He explained that the intermission was to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they wanted to.

This is one of the most mature and intelligent silences we ever read about. We wish we might have been listening to it. We promise you we wouldn't have switched over nervously to something else to take up the time, but would have sat there in a kind of historic reverie, surprised, of course, at such an unprecedented and paradoxical request and solemnly gratified that at last the significant break had come.

Some people have waited 25 years for this break without quite realizing what it was they were waiting for. Meanwhile the voices have grown multitudinous and relentless, insisting that every fleeting minute be filled with something — noise, music, words, words, words. A feeling, an apprehension, a conviction has taken possession of us that an unfilled moment on the air is disastrous.

What a state of mind for free people to get into! Thousands keep their radios going "just for company," without the slightest idea of what they're listening to. Thousands have stopped listening altogether because of the constant flow of banality they're subjected to. Thousands in self defense have become discriminating, selected what they wanted and enjoyed their own intermissions.

Now the relentless voice itself announces an intermission in which everyone is free to reflect on the ancient and golden power of silence to enhance what it interrupts. What a progressive thing to do!

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 8 - 1951

'Silent' Intermission Applauded

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—A noncommercial radio station was receiving congratulations today for giving its audience a "silent" intermission during a Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast. The new high-power FM station—WGBH—began operation Saturday night with a full-length "live" broadcast of the Boston Symphony. During the 15-minute intermission no commentary or talk of any kind was broadcast.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
OCT 8 - 1951

WGBH (FM) On Air

A NEW educational station, WGBH (FM) Boston, was scheduled to go on the air Saturday, Oct. 6 at 8:30 p.m. with what is described as the first full-length performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast in that city in 25 years. An open house was held Oct. 3 in the Symphony Hall studios, now nearing completion. WGBH (FM) is licensed to the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, a project jointly sponsored by Boston College, Boston U., Harvard U., Lowell Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern U. and Tufts College.

[16]

Ser. 56

TROY, N. Y.
ORNING RECORD

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 8 - 1951

Radio Station Intermission Held Biggest Step Since Kettle Drum

Boston, Oct. 7. — (UP) — A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission — during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation —believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGBH which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Parker Wheatley, station manager, explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said "in my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 8 - 1951

SILENT INTERMISSION ON BOSTON STATION

Boston Symphony Radio Program Receives High Praise

BOSTON, Oct. 7-AP-A non-commercial radio station was still receiving congratulations today for giving its audience a "silent" intermission during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first broadcast in 25 years.

The new high-power FM station —WGBH—began operation last night with a full length "live" broadcast of the Boston Symphony in memory of [illegible] Koussevitzky, its conductor for 25 years. During the 15 minute intermission there was no commentary or talk of any kind broadcast.

Before the intermission, an announcer, speaking from Symphony Hall, told the radio audience:

"Now we invite you to enjoy the intermission as if you were here in Symphony Hall. We want you to think about the music."

Parker Wheatley, general manager, said the station is the realization of five years of cooperation in educational broadcasting by the Lowell Institute which has been giving free educational lectures for 112 years.

Six Greater Boston universities and colleges, along with the Lowell Institute, advise station operation.

They are: Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Harvard University, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 7 - 1951

OPEN NEW FM RADIO STATION—Henry B. Cabot (left), president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, at Symphony Hall last night before they opened WGBH.

Symphony Hall Broadcast Launches Station WGBH

Boston's new high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, known as WGBH, began operation last night with the first of a series of full-length "live" performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Symphony Hall.

"This marks the first full-length performance of the orchestra to be broadcast in Boston in the past 25 years," Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, told the Symphony Hall and radio audience before the first Saturday-evening performance of the famed orchestra's 71st season.

The new station, he said, is the realization of five years of cooperation in educational broadcasting by six colleges and universities of Greater Boston and the Lowell Institute. They are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College.

All are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in the New England area. The Symphony Orchestra is the newest member.

The station, with studios at Symphony Hall and transmitter on Great Blue Hill, Milton, "is truly the outgrowth of a community effort," Lowell said, declaring it is "a carrier of the cultural heritage of the world, in which our New England shares so abundantly."

Another speaker at the opening of the station last night was Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who said "the symphony exists for the purpose of playing the greatest music in the best possible manner to as many people as possible."

The new station enlarges the symphony's audience considerably, he said, thanking those who gave time and money to make WGBH possible.

An unusual feature of the broadcast which followed was the silent period during the regular intermission. This 15 minutes of quiet gave listeners at home the same chance to relax and discuss the performance as those who attended.

Last night's program by the orchestra consisted of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music" in memory of the orchestra's late conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6."

WGBH signed off the air immediately after the performance. It will broadcast henceforth from 3 p. m. to 10:30 p. m. During the Symphony season broadcasting will begin at 2:15 p. m. on Fridays and on Saturdays will continue to the close of the Symphony's performance.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 8 - 1951

Concert Over FM Station Gives 'Break' to Listeners

BOSTON, Oct. 7 (UP)—A Boston radio station's eight-minute intermission—during which the audience was asked not to listen—was hailed tonight "as the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

The brief pause for relaxation—believed unique in American radio—came during the initial program of FM station WGHB which started its career last night with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

STATION MANAGER Parker Wheatley explained the intermission was "to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Wheatley said the reaction was extremely favorable—that one listener telephoned the station and said, "In my opinion it's the greatest invention since the kettle drum."

Wheatley quoted another listener as saying the intermission gave him a chance "to dwell on the music—to let it sink in without my attention being diverted."

* * *

DURING THE INTERVAL, the audience heard only the murmur of voices of concert goers which came over an "open" microphone set up in one of the lobbies of symphony hall where the station is housed.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said the consensus seemed to be that the intermission "added up to an adult approach to radio listening."

Judd said that some people after listening to a symphony for two solid hours build up a resistance to that type of music.

"They become 'anti'—because after all, the human ear has limitations," Judd said. "But the intermission is a refreshing pause."

* * *

PAUL A. DeMARS, a former radio station executive or engineer for 31 years, said it was "wonderful—I felt as if I were at Symphony Hall."

DeMars, who heard the program at his Salem, NH, summer home, said the intermission "certainly is new in American radio. Most stations now look with abhorrence at even five seconds of idle time."

WGBH is operated by the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council, members of which include the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Tufts College, Northeastern University and the Lowell Institute.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 9 - 1951

Historic Silence

During a "live" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night, the announcer asked the audience not to listen for eight minutes. He explained that the intermission was to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they wanted to.

This is one of the most mature and intelligent silences we ever read about. We wish we might have been listening to it. We promise you we wouldn't have switched over nervously to something else to take up the time, but would have sat there in a kind of historic reverie, surprised, of course, at such an unprecedented and paradoxical request and solemnly gratified that at last the significant break had come.

Some people have waited 25 years for this break without quite realizing what it was they were waiting for. Meanwhile the voices have grown multitudinous and relentless, insisting that every fleeting minute be filled with something — noise, music, words, words, words. A feeling, an apprehension, a conviction has taken possession of us that an unfilled moment on the air is disastrous.

What a state of mind for free people to get into! Thousands keep their radios going "just for company," without the slightest idea of what they're listening to. Thousands have stopped listening altogether because of the constant flow of banality they're subjected to. Thousands in self defense have become discriminating, selected what they wanted and enjoyed their own intermissions.

Now the relentless voice itself announces an intermission in which everyone is free to reflect on the ancient and golden power of silence to enhance what it interrupts. What a progressive thing to do!

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 8 - 1951

'Silent' Intermission Applauded

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP).—A noncommercial radio station was receiving congratulations today for giving its audience a "silent" intermission during a Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast. The new high-power FM station—WGBH—began operation Saturday night with a full-length "live" broadcast of the Boston Symphony. During the 15-minute intermission no commentary or talk of any kind was broadcast.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
OCT 8 - 1951

WGBH (FM) On Air

A NEW educational station, WGBH (FM) Boston, was scheduled to go on the air Saturday, Oct. 6 at 8:30 p.m. with what is described as the first full-length performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast in that city in 25 years. An open house was held Oct. 3 in the Symphony Hall studios, now nearing completion. WGBH (FM) is licensed to the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council, a project jointly sponsored by Boston College, Boston U., Harvard U., Lowell Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern U. and Tufts College.

[16]

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 13 1951

MUSIC

Borovsky Soloist in Boston Premiere of Roussel Piano Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

That admirable pianist, Alexander Borovsky, was soloist in the Boston premiere of the Concerto by the late Albert Roussel, at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. For good measure, Mr. Borovsky also was heard in Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor, substituted early this week for the previously announced Concertstuck by Weber. Conductor Charles Munch began this program with the "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven and concluded it with Brahms' Third Symphony.

It is strange that Bostonians never had been offered before this deft and bracing work of Roussel, especially in view of the fact that Serge Koussevitzky had been the conductor, and Mr. Borovsky the soloist when the Concerto was first performed in Paris in 1928. At any rate, better late than never.

Roussel's only Piano Concerto is unmistakably his own, full of buoyancy, free from sentimentality, and distinguished by that skilled facture which is the first attribute of his style. This is no keyboard show piece, but an intimate and highly organized essay for the solo instrument and the orchestra. The first movement is waggish, amost droll, with its intentional heavy thumping in the solo, and the rhythmically excited part for orchestra, in which Roussel's command of subtle dissonance is notable.

Seems Difficult

This movement, like the finale, looks and sounds difficult, especially in the matter of rhythmic coordination between soloist and orchestra. It also leaves you with the same feeling of stimulation and healthy well-being common to all the fast music of Roussel that I have heard. The adagio comes as near to sentiment as Roussel would permit himself, and it is very elegant, very French and a tissue of delectable, spicily contrasted sound.

Here you have music truly of the 20th Century, demanding no great effort to be understood and none whatever to be liked. It is emotionally non-problematical, simply musical patterns, rhythms, tunes and contrasts to be enjoyed for their own sake.

Mr. Borovsky deserved every second of the generous applause he received for his authoritative way of playing the Concerto. Immediately before, he had given another of his clear, superbly proportioned and musicianly accounts of Bach, in the familiar D minor Concerto. Much of this work is almost as mechanical in the steady unfolding of the figurations, as the Third Brandenburg Concerto.

Spirited Interpreter

But nothing in Mr. Borovsky's playing is ever mechanical. He is always a spirited, if logical and well-ordered interpreter.

Mr. Munch picked just the right time to put forward Brahms' F major Symphony, which, of all the four, most suggests to me a quality of Autumn and reflection. Perhaps the ideal time to hear it would be on a drowsy Sunday afternoon in Indian Summer.

This was a remarkably fine reading of a Symphony in which the inner detail, by reason of a fairly thick scoring, must sometimes be hard to bring out. But following with the score, one could note that 98 percent of that detail was clearly to be heard. About three times, Mr. Munch indulged a slight change of the tempo that Brahms had not indicated, but the effect was all right, and not contrary to the general intent and style.

The "Egmont" Overture went just as beautifully and was eloquent too the turgidity of texture. It was given, in short, with all of Mr. Munch's genius for clarity, for poise, for proportion. It had its moments of excitement, but it was reflective of the mood of the whole concert, which was poetic to a degree.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning Oct. 26 for an all-out Beethoven concert featuring Jascha Heifetz in the Violin Concerto.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 - 1951

Unique Silence

BOSTON (UP)—An eight-minute period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time. The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere." The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 10 1951

$38,000 LEFT IN BEQUESTS

Ralph W. Blackmer's Will Probated

Bequests of $38,000 were disclosed yesterday in the will of Ralph W. Blackmer of 3 Melville ave., Dorchester, filed with the register of probate. Mr. Blackmer, who died Aug. 14, was connected with the John Hancock Life Insurance Co. for 50 years. After bequeathing $10,000 to friends, he left $5000 to the Arlington Street Church, $3000 to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and $2000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Greater Boston Community Fund, Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary, Perkins Institution for the Blind, Children's Hospital, Industrial School for Crippled and Deformed Children, Salvation Army and the Volunteers of America.

Bequests of $1000 each were left to the Boston Tuberculosis Association, Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Boston Dispensary, New England Hospital for Women and Children, Boston Home for Incurables, Morgan Memorial, Boston Industrial Home, Home for Aged Men, New England Home for Little Wanderers, Mt. Pleasant Home for Aged Men and Women, Home for Aged Couples and Home for Aged Women.

The rest and residue of the estate

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 12 1951

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE

Hailed as the greatest invention since the kettledrum, eight minutes of total silence transpired, on purpose, on a Boston radio program last week. It wasn't due to circumstances beyond control; it wasn't due to a strike of transmission engineers; it was planned that way.

Sponsors looking for new radio shows with the ultimate in audience appeal are not exactly standing line to acquire exclusive rights to WGBH's innovation. But ear-wracked listeners-in could hardly think of better ways for sponsors to spend their money.

A new FM outlet in Boston, WGBH broadcast a Boston Symphony concert on its opening night. Someone with intelligence and daring on the station's staff, appreciative of the fact that symphony listeners, unlike World Series listeners, do not have to know the position of the tuba player and the second fiddlers at every moment of the program, came up with the idea of a silent intermission.

This is probably the first time it ever occurred to anyone in radio that there are times when silence is preferable to noise. And anything transmitted in the interval between symphony numbers can hardly classify as anything but noise.

The intermission lasted eight minutes. A diligent search of the records back to 1921 or thereabouts indicates that this is the longest period of deliberate silence ever broadcast. We predict a brilliant future for WGBH, but not much chance of promotion for the staff genius who invented the noiseless intermission.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

OCT 17 1951

MUNCH IN REHEARSAL—This is how Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to the concert master during rehearsal. He will appear with the orchestra tonight at the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute field house. The program is Schumann's D minor Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, with the RPI mixed chorus, and Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

GETS SOUVENIR FOR COMING GENERATIONS—Mrs. Frederick W. Fuller, president of the Springfield Junior League, received an autographed program of the Boston Symphony concert at the Auditorium last night from Dr. Charles Munch, director of the orchestra. Left to right, Dr. Munch, Hollis M. Carlisle, vice-president of the Community Concerts Association who took a few hours off from his duties as chairman of the United Fund Red Cross drive to attend the concert and Mrs. Fuller.

all the way through. The orchestra was together, in attacks, except for one or two that I noticed in the Brahms, where the oboe and clarinet again jumped the beat, as they had last week.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 9 - 1951

Radio Rest Period Prescribed

Boston—An eight-minute silence from WGHB-FM's initial program during which the audience was asked not to listen, brought favorable reaction from listeners according to Parker Wheatley, station manager.

The time lapse was caused by an intermission period of the station's inaugural program—a "live" concert of the Boston Syhphony Orchestra. Wheatley explained that the station intermission was "to give people a break, let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 13 1951

MUSIC

Borovsky Soloist in Boston Premiere of Roussel Piano Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

That admirable pianist, Alexander Borovsky, was soloist in the Boston premiere of the Concerto by the late Albert Roussel, at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. For good measure, Mr. Borovsky also was heard in Bach's Piano Concerto in D minor, substituted early this week for the previously announced Concertstuck by Weber. Conductor Charles Munch began this program with the "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven and concluded it with Brahms' Third Symphony.

It is strange that Bostonians never had been offered before this deft and bracing work of Roussel, especially in view of the fact that Serge Koussevitzky had been the conductor, and Mr. Borovsky the soloist when the Concerto was first performed in Paris in 1928. At any rate, better late than never.

Roussel's only Piano Concerto is unmistakably his own, full of buoyancy, free from sentimentality, and distinguished by that skilled facture which is the first attribute of his style. This is no keyboard show piece, but an intimate and highly organized essay for the solo instrument and the orchestra. The first movement is waggish, amost droll, with its intentional heavy thumping in the solo, and the rhythmically excited part for orchestra, in which Roussel's command of subtle dissonance is notable.

Seems Difficult

This movement, like the finale, looks and sounds difficult, especially in the matter of rhythmic coordination between soloist and orchestra. It also leaves you with the same feeling of stimulation and healthy well-being common to all the fast music of Roussel that I have heard. The adagio comes as near to sentiment as Roussel would permit himself, and it is very elegant, very French and a tissue of delectable, spicily contrasted sound.

Here you have music truly of the 20th Century, demanding no great effort to be understood and none whatever to be liked. It is emotionally non-problematical, simply musical patterns, rhythms, tunes and contrasts to be enjoyed for their own sake.

Mr. Borovsky deserved every second of the generous applause he received for his authoritative way of playing the Concerto. Immediately before, he had given another of his clear, superbly proportioned and musicianly accounts of Bach, in the familiar D minor Concerto. Much of this work is almost as mechanical in the steady unfolding of the figurations, as the Third Brandenburg Concerto.

Spirited Interpreter

But nothing in Mr. Borovsky's playing is ever mechanical. He is always a spirited, if logical and well-ordered interpreter.

Mr. Munch picked just the right time to put forward Brahms' F major Symphony, which, of all the four, most suggests to me a quality of Autumn and reflection. Perhaps the ideal time to hear it would be on a drowsy Sunday afternoon in Indian Summer.

This was a remarkably fine reading of a Symphony in which the inner detail, by reason of a fairly thick scoring, must sometimes be hard to bring out. But following with the score, one could note that 98 percent of that detail was clearly to be heard. About three times, Mr. Munch indulged a slight change of the tempo that Brahms had not indicated, but the effect was all right, and not contrary to the general intent and style.

The "Egmont" Overture went just as beautifully and was eloquent

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 10 1951

$38,000 LEFT IN BEQUESTS

Ralph W. Blackmer's Will Probated

Bequests of $38,000 were disclosed yesterday in the will of Ralph W. Blackmer of 3 Melville ave., Dorchester, filed with the register of probate. Mr. Blackmer, who died Aug. 14, was connected with the John Hancock Life Insurance Co. for 50 years. After bequeathing $10,000 to friends, he left $5000 to the Arlington Street Church, $3000 to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and $2000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Greater Boston Community Fund, Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary, Perkins Institution for the Blind, Children's Hospital, Industrial School for Crippled and Deformed Children, Salvation Army and the Volunteers of America.

Bequests of $1000 each were left to the Boston Tuberculosis Association, Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Boston Dispensary, New England Hospital for Women and Children, Boston Home for Incurables, Morgan Memorial, Boston Industrial Home, Home for Aged Men, New England Home for Little Wanderers, Mt. Pleasant Home for Aged Men and Women, Home for Aged Couples and Home for Aged Women.

The rest and residue of the estate

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

OCT 17 1951

MUNCH IN REHEARSAL—This is how Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to the concert master during rehearsal. He will appear with the orchestra tonight at the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute field house. The program is Schumann's D minor Symphony, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, with the RPI mixed chorus, and Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 12 1951

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE

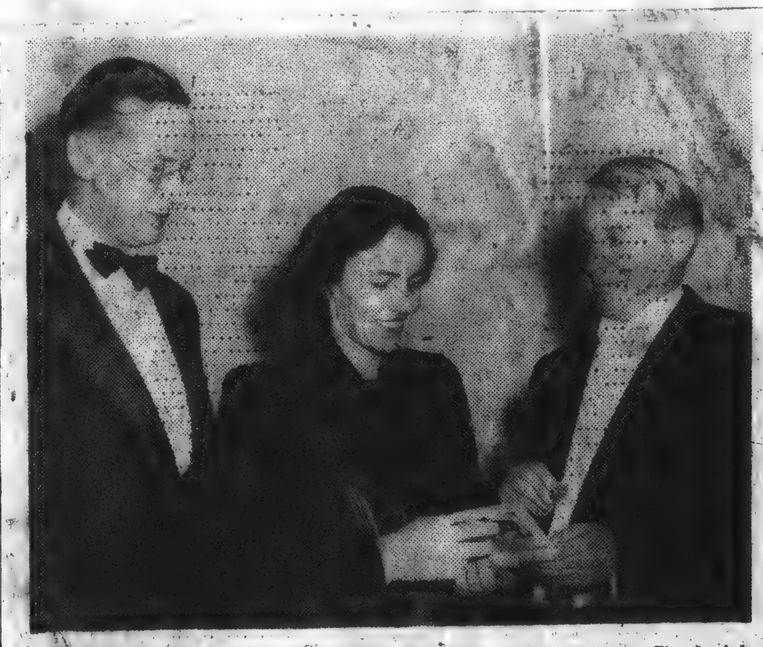
Hailed as the greatest invention since the kettledrum, eight minutes of total silence transpired, on purpose, on a Boston radio program last week. It wasn't due to circumstances beyond control; it wasn't due to a strike of transmission engineers; it was planned that way.

Sponsors looking for new radio shows with the ultimate in audience appeal are not exactly standing line to acquire exclusive rights to WGBH's innovation. But ear-wracked listeners-in could hardly think of better ways for sponsors to spend their money.

A new FM outlet in Boston, WGBH broadcast a Boston Symphony concert on its opening night. Someone with intelligence and daring on the station's staff, appreciative of the fact that symphony listeners, unlike World Series listeners, do not have to know the position of the tuba player and the second fiddlers at every moment of the program, came up with the idea of a silent intermission.

This is probably the first time it ever occurred to anyone in radio that there are times when silence is preferable to noise. And anything transmitted in the interval between symphony numbers can hardly classify as anything but noise.

The intermission lasted eight minutes. A diligent search of the records back to 1921 or thereabouts indicates that this is the longest period of deliberate silence ever broadcast. We predict a brilliant future for WGBH, but not much chance of promotion for the staff genius who invented the noiseless intermission.



GETS SOUVENIR FOR COMING GENERATIONS—Mrs. Frederick W. Fuller, president of the Springfield Junior League, received an autographed program of the Boston Symphony concert at the Auditorium last night from Dr. Charles Munch, director of the orchestra. Left to right, Dr. Munch, Hollis M. Carlisle, vice-president of the Community Concerts Association who took a few hours off from his duties as chairman of the United Fund Red Cross drive to attend the concert and Mrs. Fuller.

Springfield Union OCT 12

...po the turgidity of texture. It was given, in short, with all of Mr. Munch's genius for clarity, for poise, for proportion. It had its moments of excitement, but it was reflective of the mood of the whole concert, which was poetic to a degree.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning Oct. 26 for an all-out Beethoven concert featuring Jascha Heifetz in the Violin Concerto.

...all the way through. The orchestra was together, in attacks, except for one or two that I noticed in the Brahms, where the oboe and clarinet again jumped the beat, as they had last week.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 - 1951

Unique Silence

BOSTON (UP)—An eight-minute period of silence stole the show when Boston's newest radio station took to the air for the first time. The silence marked the intermission of a symphony concert and was hailed as the "greatest invention since the kettle drum." It was tried on the program in an effort to create a "concert hall atmosphere." The intermission, believed unique in American radio, came Saturday night when WGBH, Boston's newest FM outlet, started its career with a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 9 - 1951

Radio Rest Period Prescribed

Boston—An eight-minute silence from WGHB-FM's initial program during which the audience was asked not to listen, brought favorable reaction from listeners according to Parker Wheatley, station manager.

The time lapse was caused by an intermission period of the station's inaugural program—a "live" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wheatley explained that the station intermission was "to give people a break, let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions—walk around, have a smoke, do anything they want to do."

Ser 56

TROY, N. Y.
ORNING RECORD

Borovsky Piano Soloist At the Week-End Concerts

By Harold Rogers

Albert Roussel's only piano concerto, published in 1928, was first performed by Alexander Borovsky during the same year in Paris. Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Borovsky, with Charles Munch on the podium, played the first Boston performance of this work. This may also have been the concerto's second hearing in the United States, since a performance has been noted in which Joseph Bloch appeared as soloist with the Indianapolis Orchestra in 1949.

So much for the concerto's history, which indicates that it has not found greater acceptance for a variety of reasons.

Though the work is difficult to perform, Mr. Borovsky handled its many complexities with aplomb. He is a musician of sincerity and sensitivity, and while he does not lift his listeners to the heights, neither does he subject them to any sense of insecurity about his playing.

The concerto has probably been neglected because it is a minor work by a major composer. Its dissonance can hardly be considered an unpopular factor, at least with Symphony Hall patrons, who have warmly welcomed many works of advanced style.

♪ ♪ ♪

Roussel's self-conscious striving after effect—which he apparently shared with Milhaud and other members of the French Six during the 1920's—gives this concerto something of an exploratory nature, an unsettled or an unset style. It lacks the substance of Roussel's later symphonies—music that is manifestly the creation of a composer who knows that he knows.

The effects obtained in this early work are however, extremely inventive, sometimes novel, and titillating to the ear. The piece is filled with splashy percussive effects characteristic of the early Stravinsky. It also presages the musical substance of the later Roussel.

Mr. Borovsky preceded the Roussel concerto with a satisfying though pastel performance of the Bach Piano Concerto in D minor. His use of the sustaining pedal eliminated the crispness that some listeners enjoy in their Bach, but he also infused his performance with a serene and delicately colored mood.

♪ ♪ ♪

In both concertos Mr. Munch provided an integrated accompaniment. He used a smaller orchestra in the Bach and kept it subsidiary to Mr. Borovsky's playing. For the Roussel the orchestra and piano hold an equal footing.

Mr. Munch opened the program with a stirring reading of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and closed it with the Brahms Third Symphony. Subscribers who also heard Mr. Munch's Brahms program at Tanglewood will now have the opportunity to hear his readings of the last three Brahms symphonies in as many months.

He has a superb manner with Brahms, and his performance of the Third heightened impressions gained from his earlier Tanglewood performances of the Second and Fourth. Mr. Munch aims his effects not so much at one's heart as at one's appreciation of highly refined sound. Many of his effects are gained through sudden contrasts by balancing pianissimo against fortissimo.

While his reading always maintained a high level of interest, it was not always convincing. The Brahms Third Symphony is a work of many moods, and Mr. Munch's reading was not always consistent in projecting them. The first movement, for example, was not sufficiently lyrical, and the last movement was not sufficiently dramatic.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, broadcast over Station WGBH, as the first Friday matinee ever to go on the air, added up to an afternoon of mellow music-making. There was little in the way of brilliance or brazen clamor. Even though there was a soloist, the pianist, Alexander Borovsky, there was a scant amount of virtuoso glitter. This was not so much a matter of performance, though Mr. Munch and Mr. Borovsky both tended to underplay rather than overplay their respective roles of conductor and soloist, but of the program itself.

As originally planned, this second Symphony list would have supplied some of these missing qualities. However, Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz" gave way to the soberer matter of the "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven, and the first-named composer's concert piece for piano and orchestra, that has gone unheard at the Symphony Concerts proper for 33 years, was replaced by Bach's Concerto in D minor. This change was distinctly to the advantage of Roussel's Concerto, which followed, in its first Boston performance; since the Frenchman's piece, composed in 1928 and heretofore heard but once in this country, though a work of considerable interest and in parts even of fascination, is not essentially a display piece. It is undoubtedly difficult to perform, but its difficulties do not appear on the surface. It also has a certain amount of melodic charm, though Roussel was not primarily a lyricist, but its melodies are not of the kind that hit you in the face; they must be sought for.

Roussel spent some time in the East and the program notes reminded us that the slow movement was prompted by the gamelan, or gong orchestra of Java. The resemblance is there, all right, and there are exotic touches in the other movements. A well-wrought aristocratic music, this Concerto afforded a special pleasure. It was discerningly and sympathetically played by pianist, conductor and orchestra. But we are not likely to hear it again. Incidentally, it is somewhat singular that we had not heard it from Koussevitzky, since he, with Mr. Borovsky as pianist, introduced it to the world (in Paris) in the year of its composition.

The program, which will be repeated and broadcast again tonight, ends with the Third Symphony of Brahms, which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before. He treats the work more respectfully than he does the second, or the first, and if he failed to make the impression with it that he has with the fourth, it is not so much his fault as that of the music itself. More than ever, yesterday, you felt this was a symphony with two slow movements and a good deal of contemplative matter in the corner ones. There were moments of vigor in Mr. Munch's interpretation, but his approach on the whole inclined to be reflective, and the same might be said of his treatment of the "Egmont" Overture, which took fire only at the very end. Discretion being the order of the day, one might add that Mr. Borovsky played Bach's Concerto discreetly.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 13 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, gave the second program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Alexander Borovsky, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "Egmont" Op. 84.....Beethoven
Concerto in D minor.....Bach
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 36.....Roussel Symphony No 3 in F, Op. 90....Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Piano Concerto of Albert Roussel, like those of Scriabin, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Delius, Glazounov, Medtner, Dvorak, Holst and so on, is one of those unexpected things, written, it would seem, out of no particular enthusiasm for the medium but because a composer is more or less expected to write one. Roussel might well have avoided the duty; his Concerto, given its first Boston performance yesterday afternoon, hardly advanced his reputation.

This is not to say it is uninteresting or that it should not have been given. On the contrary, I only wish it were possible for us to hear more and more of these little-known works; the Scriabin, recently recorded, is a beautiful work. And the circumstances of the Roussel performance yesterday were absolutely ideal, for I can think of no more proper procedure than having the soloist do two concertos. Let him do anything he chooses for his major work, provided he starts off with one by Bach or Mozart or even Hummel. After all, the pianist has every right to finish with something that makes a great success, as neither the Bach nor Mozart concertos really do.

As it happened, the Roussel didn't make a great success either, not because it wasn't superbly set forth (which it was) but because the work is inherently uninspired. The composer, for one thing, had little to say save in the central slow movement, a very effective essay reflecting the composer's interest in Oriental modes and one that emphasized the more exotic tones of the woodwinds under a rhythmic, chordal obbligato by the piano. For another thing, the composer chose too large an orchestral mass against keyboard writing of a non-virtuosic style. There was not the contrasting give and take characteristic of the virtuoso concerto, but rather a studiously integrated blend of orchestral and piano coloration. This makes for artistic integrity, and provides its own special attraction, but the concerto is traditionally a joyful medium. It may, as it does in its greatest examples speak with towering profundity and touch the heart with the most noble eloquence. But the first element is that of the contest, the conflict between soloist and orchestra. Roussel's Concerto offers no contest. It is good, musical, reasonably effective, but it remains merely dutiful.

The D minor Concerto of Bach, which preceded the Roussel, is, however, one of the greatest of all. It is all contest as the strings now lead, now echo the voice-leading of the piano; the interplay is ceaseless and of ceaseless inspiration. Mr. Borovsky, who remains in my opinion one of our finest contemporary Bach players on the piano, and Mr. Munch, whose interpretative authority with Bach is unequalled among conductors today, gave this work the most sensitive reading I have ever heard.

It was not, as we have hitherto heard it, given with that urgency, that motoric drive and vigor that makes it so compelling, but with extreme finesse, with delicate shadings and subtle accents. I found it, consequently, an entirely new experience and a beautiful one. I think I prefer it the other way, as I grew up on the other, but this was one of those revelations that occur when the music of genius, filled as it is with such interpretative potential, is reinterpreted for us by men of great musical stature.

Much the same, as it happens, might be said of Mr. Munch's way with Brahms' Third Symphony. In his hands this grateful work became a summer idyll, fragrant with the sounds and scents of the fields and woods, luminous in the shifting colors cast on the scene by the ever-changing angle of the sun above. Gone was the flavor of Germanic sentimentality so often conveyed in this work, and gone

Army Denies War Dogs Loose Near Devens

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 14 1951

Historic Silence

From Providence Journal

During a "live" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday night, the announcer asked the audience not to listen for eight minutes. He explained that the intermission was to give people a break, to let them do what people usually do at concert intermissions —walk around, have a smoke, do anything they wanted to.

This is one of the most mature and intelligent silences we ever read about. We wish we might have been listening to it. We promise you we wouldn't have switched over nervously to something else to take up the time, but would have sat there in a kind of historic reverie, surprised, of course, at such an unprecedented and paradoxical request and solemnly gratified that at last the significant break had come.

Some people have waited 25 years for this break without quite realizing what it was they were waiting for. Meanwhile the voices have grown multitudinous and relentless, insisting that every fleeting minute be filled with something—noise, music, words, words, words. A feeling, an apprehension, a conviction has taken possession of us that an unfilled moment on the air is disastrous.

What a state of mind for free people to get into! Thousands keep their radios going "just for company," without the slightest idea of what they're listening to. Thousands have stopped listening altogether because of the constant flow of banality they're subjected to. Thousands in self defense have become discriminating, selected what they wanted and enjoyed their own intermissions.

Now the relentless voice itself announces an intermission in which everyone is free to reflect on the ancient and golden power of silence to enhance what it interrupts. What a progressive thing to do!

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
OCT 12 1951

Silence Isn't Fatal Either

A BOSTON radio station has done the unheard of thing. Midway in a broadcast of the Boston symphony when intermission arrived it decreed eight minutes of silence. The radio audience was informed of the decision and asked not to listen. The microphone was left on so that anyone who wanted to could hear the background noise. But there was no program, no commentator, no commercial—just eight minutes in which the devoted music lover was free to get a drink of water, turn down the furnace, let out the cat or otherwise disport himself.

From all reports nothing much happened, which makes it one of the quietest revolutions in years. Presumably those who tuned in to listen to the music were still there when the concert resumed. Those who had had enough sought other entertainment. The walls did not come a-tumbling down.

This violates all the canons of broadcasting, but it is a good sign. Radio proved long ago that silence is not golden, and it is time for a counter-revolution proving that it is not necessarily fatal either.

SANTA ROSA, CALIF.
EVE. PRESS DEMOCRAT
OCT 11 1951

Pierre Monteux To Retire in '52

SAN FRANCISCO (UP) — Pierre Monteux will retire a permanent conductor of the Sa Francisco Symphony Orchestr next April at the close of th 1951-52 season, the Musical Asso ciation of San Francisco an nounced today.

Monteux, who at the age of 7 ranks among the foremost con ductors of the world, has bee with the San Francisco Sym phony Orchestra since 1935.

After World War I, Monteu conducted French Opera at th Metropolitan Opera and fror 1919 to 1924 was conductor of th Boston Symphony. For the nex 5 years, he was with the Con certgebouw Orchestra in Amster dam and in 1929 he led the Pari Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 13 1951

New High-Power FM Radio Station In Boston On Air

Boston, Oct. 6 (INS)—WGBH, Boston's new high-power non-commercial FM radio station for educational broadcasting, tonight went on the air with the first Saturday performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 71st season.

To inaugurate the new station, the Boston Symphony joined with the Lowell Institute and six colleges and universities of greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, MIT, Northeastern and Tufts.

The colleges have been members of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 1946 to promote adult education by radio and television in this area.

WELLESLEY, MASS
TOWNSMAN
10/11/51

Standing Ovation Given Boston Symphony Orchestra

Alumnae Hall was filled to overflowing last Wednesday night when Mr. Charles Munch, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed that august group of musicians in the first concert of the 1951-52 Wellesley Concert Series. At the end of the concert, Mr. Munch and the orchestra were given a standing ovation.

The program was very like the one given the following Friday and Saturday as a memorial to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. It began with the majestic "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven, continued with the passionate and lyric "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss, and ended with Tschaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," No. 6. Faithful followers of the Boston Symphony know how often the late Dr. Koussevitsky offered the Pathétique Symphony and how deeply he was stirred by it. It is a tribute to Mr. Munch's sensitivity and musicianship that the reading he gave showed so much nostalgia and tenderness as well as majesty and sonority.

The brilliance and virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so acknowledged that we need not here repeat the fact. Perhaps the most interesting experience in hearing the group play within the smaller confines of Alumnae Hall is the delight in the beauty of tone or in those wonderful solo moments when one hears the flute, the horn or a stringed instrument so beautifully clear and yet so fused with the whole concept of the music.

The next concert of the Series is on November 7 when Solomon, the sensational British pianist, will present a program of piano music.

[18]

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
OCT 18 1951

Symphony Scores at Troy---With College Club Assist

The urbane and accomplished Charles Munch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brilliant and exquisitely performed concert last night in the RPI Field House.

As a whole the concert was on the modern and impressionistic side, featured as it was by a performance of the second of the Daphnes et Chloe suites by Maurice Ravel that was done with the vocal accompaniment of the RPI and Russell Sage Glee Clubs and the Emma Willard School Choir.

The vocal group had been prepared by Joel Dolven, RPI musical director. It spoke well for the training of the young singers that they responded to Mr. Munch's direction with a strength and precision that merited their appearance on the stage with so accomplished a group of musicians as the symphonists.

Ovation from Audience

The orchestra performed the work with flawless grace and gave to the tremendous finale a fire and strength that brought an ovation from the audience of some 5,000 persons.

The program had been opened with warm and sensitive reading of Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor. While one knowledgeable musician in the audience expressed the belief the reading was on the "pedantic" side, only the most critical would agree with him.

But it was in the concluding work, the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, that Mr. Munch brought forth the full musicianship of the truly great orchestra at his command.

A Dream Waltz

The second movement, a waltz, was a dream waltz that set hearts dancing.

The rather long and quiet third movement brought from a "sweet young thing" in the audience who was unaquainted with the work, the complaint that it was on the pedestrian side.

Seconds later she "took it all back" as Mr. Munch led the orchestra into the strange and ominous March to the Scaffold of the fourth movement and the equally strange and tremendously stirring Dream of a Witches' Sabbath that concluded the work.

The entire program was a musical treat that will be long remembered by those who heard it.

The only complaint of merit that might be voiced concerns the unfavorable acoustics of the field house. Persons sitting in some parts of the huge auditorium are cheated a bit, and with some justice say the music becomes lost in the cavernous building.

But that is not a fault of the conductor or of the orchestra. It should bring, rather, a realization that the Capital District remains in need of a capacious, a comfortable and acoustically suitable hall for the enjoyment of great music.
D. L. F.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
OCT 18 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY PERFORMS BEFORE LARGE AUDIENCE

Munch Conducts Works By Ravel, Schumann, Berlioz At Field House

By KEITH MARVIN.

With the repeated crashing chords of Hector Berlioz' orchestral curiosity, the "Symphonie Fantastique," Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded a well-chosen and exquisitely performed concert at the R.P.I. Field House last night.

The concert was the second by the group in the Field House, and was given before an audience of several thousand persons.

As an added attraction, the mixed chorus of R.P.I., Russell Sage College and Emma Willard School sang rarely-done vocal accompaniment to Maurice Ravel's masterpiece, the second of the "Daphnes et Chloe" Suites. This was the high point of the program.

The original vocal chorus is seldom performed, but Mr. Munch attempted it at the Tanglewood Summer Concerts at Lenox, Mass., last summer and met with such success that the mixed chorus of the three local institutions was asked to supply the vocal part of the number. The group was prepared by Joel Dolven, musical director at R.P.I., and his success in his task proved itself last night.

As for the orchestra, it was magnificent! We have never heard any modern music and particularly impressionism reach the heights the gorgeousness of sheer sound which Mr. Munch was able to get from his group. Granted, Munch is at his best in Ravel, but nonetheless, this reading of the work last night had to be heard to be believed.

From the lush opening to the savagery of its almost brutal finale, this was Ravel at his best, Munch at his best and the orchestra, both solo players and the group as a unit at their best! It would be superfluous to say anything further, but no one who heard "Daphnes et Chloe" last night will ever forget that performance.

The Ravel opus was in direct contrast to both the Schumann "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" Op. 120, and the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," Op. 14A, which concluded the program.

The Berlioz received a brilliant reading from the baton of the 60-year-old conductor. The most peculiar aspect, perhaps, in the rendition, was the utilization of two especially cast bells which appear in the last of the five movements which constitute the composition, entitled "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath." These bells were cast for the orchestra to take the place of the more conventional chimes used to achieve the effect of churchbells by the majority of orchestras.

The "Symphonie Fantastique" is enigmatic, and although it is generally assumed to be the description of the composer's love for an Irish actress of the time (1830), a Miss Smithson, the debate is still on in musical circles. The work was far ahead of its time, and is full of strange, descriptive ideas, such as the "March to the Scaffold" movement, with its ominous kettle-drum roll background.

The Schumann was also exceptionally good and was a wise choice as a program-opener. The work abounds with melody, last night's program illustrating how lovely it is when a perfect orchestral balance is achieved.

The pizzicato opening of the second movement was outstanding as was the balance between horns and strings in the preceeding movement. The one thing we noticed was the beautiful "fade-out" effect at the end of the second movement. We simply haven't ever heard anything like it—the strings growing fainter and fainter and all at once the next movement is in swing.

It was a good crisp reading, yet with the warmth present which a proper and successful reading of the great German romantic must have to assure complete success.

CONGRATULATIONS—H. L. Garren, right, expresses his pleasure to Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, following the concert last night at R.P.I. Field House.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 17 1951

Boston Symphony's Opening Dedicated to Koussevitzky

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—The opening of the 71st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was dedicated by its director, Charles Munch, to the late Serge Koussevitzky. The conductor asked for a standing moment of silence in memory of the orchestra's great leader for the last quarter of a century. Many people in the audience wept unashamedly during the tribute which was followed by a program of "Koussey's" favorite works.

For the first time, there is a broadcasting studio in Symphony Hall to bring the orchestra over the airways through FM radio station WGBH. The performances will be broadcast in their entirety and the station, which operates from the Harvard Observatory by a tower with antenna rising 724 feet above sea level, will carry the program to listeners within a 67-mile radius of Boston.

* * *

SEVEN HUNDRED wooden people have been tramping the Boston boards entertaining hundreds of adults and children alike with their "long hair" repertoire. The Salzburg Marionettes, portraying everything from Mozart operas to ballets and fairy tales, are quite a group of fascinating individualists.

Well over three feet tall, these puppets have a litheness of action which enables them to do all sorts of things without straining the bolts. They jump, run, play and dance with an endearing charm. One can easily see why these European marionettes have enjoyed such success abroad. Very clever.

* * *

AT THE SHUBERT, opening this week is the new musical comedy "Paint Your Wagon," a saga about the gold rush days in California. James Barton and Olga San Juan star in this one. The story, however, could do with a little dusting off.

It concerns a miner and his 16-year-old daughter who strike a rich vein and are thus the leading citizens of the town. His plans are to build up a city with schools, churches, stores and the like so that there will be more than a ghost town after the gold runs out.

His daughter, however, has eyes only for a young Mexican, who, in turn, has eyes only for gold. The saloon and dance hall take over, though, and the play ends with Julio the Mexican running off with the daughter to look for gold together. It's gay.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 19 1951

Boston Symphony:

RPI FIELDHOUSE CONCERT 'TOPS'

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Presupposing that the physics department of Troy's RPI boasts a seismograph, we are very certain that the inked paper record showed a distinct upheaval some time between 9 and 11 p. m. Wednesday, or that portion of the Boston Symphony orchestra's program in the nearby Field House devoted to the playing of the earth-shaking performances of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Berliot's "Fantastic" symphony. An audience in excess of 4,000 generously leavened with hundreds of Albanians, heard an electrifying, incandescent evening of exciting music, an emotional experience too rare in these days of materialistic living.

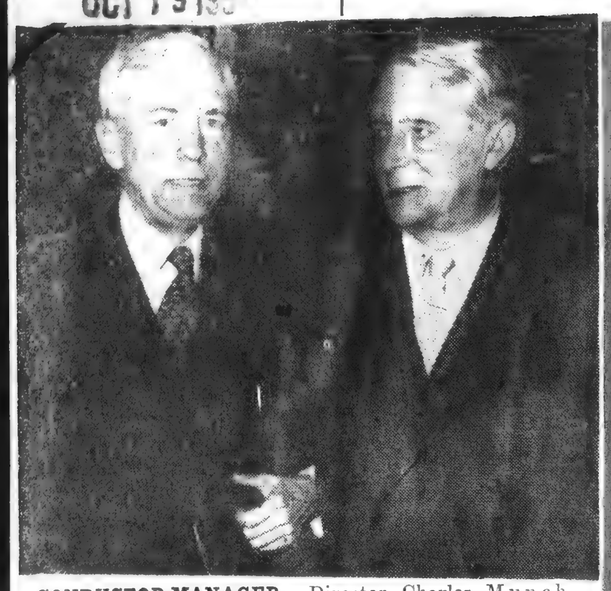
It is not our intention to speak, in a pseudo-erudite manner, of the motifs, statements of themes, recapitual recurrences and the other terms dear to the hearts of the musicologists. One doesn't do that at a Boston Symphony concert, for one is assured that he is listening to the world's finest symphonic organization, conducted (without score) by Charles Munch, the virtuoso conductor, he of the leonine countenance and seemingly boundless vitality. Incidentally, a noted sports writer, and a member of the audience, remarked with a grin, during the intermission: "I don't think Munch will last the whole nine innings." But he did and his pitching arm took on added strength and speed, right through the eerie coloration and bewildering "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath," the final movement of the Berlioz tone poem.

LOCAL COLOR was added in the Ravel work by the inclusion of the glee clubs of Emma Willard, Russell Sage and RPI, trained by Alfred Finch, Frank Hunter and Joel Dolven, the latter of Albany, a group of some 75 enthusiastic young singers which added the missing "vox humane" timbre to the orchestral score.

The program opened with the playing of the lovely, melodically streamlined beauties of Schumann's Symphony, No. 4, which presented Mr. Munch in his more quiet medium. After that, the program became a technicolor production of sound, worthy of Hollywood in the realm of sight. The inevitable rule of the Boston Symphony orchestra: "No Encores" was adherred to, but to quote the lyrics of a popular song "Who could ask for anything more?"

Ser 56

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL
OCT 19 1951



CONDUCTOR-MANAGER. Director Charles Munch, right, and George A. Judd, photographed in Hotel Syracuse on arrival yesterday for the Boston Symphony concert last night in the War Memorial.

—THE BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS—

Breath-Taking Beauty In Strauss Tone Poem

THE GLORY and the beauty, the power and the far-reaching ...ance of symphonic music was finely exemplified last night when the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, opened the Famous ... ...eries in War Memorial concert hall.

THE OCCASION marked the ... visit of the justly famous ... to Syracuse and the ... symphonic program in the ... Memorial. The warmth, the ... and the rich color that ... the works of the orchestra ... fathered by the sensitive ... of Director Munch, now ... third season in Boston. The ... revelation in music last ... the Richard Strauss tone ... "Death and Transfiguration."

THE DREAMS of the childhood ... th, the hopes, the futilities ... in this Strauss music, de... the moments of a dying ... Death is about to strike ... But there was more ... breath, weary sighs, ... —all turned ... a Hymn of Victory as the ... and the music ... and mounted for the ... and the chants of the ... seraphim. ... there was and a ... climax of prismatic ...

THE SCHUMANN Fourth in D ... Opus 120, played without ... integrated, that the ... might pass, clearly and ... from one musi... another. This symphony ... about the time when ... for his piano was "too ... for thoughts." The Ro... and movement ... without words ... in beauty, the ... solo violin orna... The Scherzo ... with a ne... ous one by the ... admirably pu... instrumented.

OPENING SELECTION was the Egmont" Overture by Beethoven, he composer taking the idea from he Goethe 18th Century play he poet made Egmont, the hero, romantic figure and from this ord picture the great composer ove some impressive melody an... ramatic phrasings. The program losed with Ravel's Spanish Rhap... odie, scintillating, with a plethora f style and color. The orchestra... ion is dexterous and one instinc... ively felt the music saying "Let us ravel around Spain and amuse ourselves"—from the beauties of he night in the Prelude through he Malaguena and the Habenera o the diversified final movement with its varied effects from many sections of the orchestra.

THERE WAS an ovation for Director Munch and his men, along with cries of "Encore," but none was forthcoming. Doubtless the eminent leader felt that the program content was sufficiently rich for one evening. Director Munch conducted from memory, shared applause with his musicians.

The orchestra plays tonight in Buffalo, journeys to Michigan and Ohio, in the short tour of seven engagements, according to George A. Judd, manager. In the audience of some 4,000 last night were numbers of college students from Syracuse and the Central New York area. The Orchestra next summer will play its 15th season in the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood. Richard Burgin is concertmaster.

The evening was not without confusion in seating and some annoyance on the part of the patrons, who found themselves in seats other than where they expected to be. This, it is hoped, will be remedied for the good of all concerned. —E.V.W.

Following the concert, Director Munch was presented ... painting by Mrs. Mur... Bernthal, wife of the ... Artists executive, in ... of the artist, Wilhelm ... of Germany. In his ... the latter had ... a Boston Symphony ... over the radio and ... transferred his im... of the music to ... for Director Munch. ... shows open vis... and mounting heights. ... Nusslein contacted ... Raymond Piper of the ... of philosophy, ... University, on hear... the rehearsal broadcast, ... that the Orchestra ... play in Syracuse, then ... the canvas which re... was received here.

New Memorial Fails As A Concert Hall

Delicate Tones of Boston Symphony Lost in Acoustical Stubbornness of Hall

By SIDNEY T. COX
(Special to The Times.)

Syracuse, Oct. 19.—The new Onondaga county war memorial may be a great place for hockey and basketball, but it is no concert hall.

This was amply demonstrated last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought all its renowned tonal magnificence and technical perfection to bear on a program of Beethoven, Schumann, Richard Strauss and Ravel, only to have them vitiated in the vast concrete vault, where delicate tone colors were swallowed up and resonance reduced to dull thundering.

Charles Munch, the conductor, managed to whip up some degree of excitement in the swirling finale of Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and to achieve considerable nobility in the peroration of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," but the total effect of both pieces was sadly diminished by the acoustical stubbornness of the hall. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Schumann's Fourth Symphony likewise suffered, as the Boston Symphony's lustrous string tone was rendered soggy, that of the brasses thick and tubby and the woodwinds' sound pallid and uncharacteristically much of a sameness.

The orchestra played from the stage at the south end of the auditorium, in which a shell was placed to reflect the sounds, but which was heavily curtained above and to the sides. At the hall's mid-point, a huge curtain was hung and the area thus bounded was populated by perhaps 5,000 persons, seated on wooden chairs on a concrete floor, the whole encased within concrete walls and arched concrete ceiling.

This writer is no acoustical engineer and can offer no real analysis of the auditorium's problems, but the fact must have been evident to anyone who has had opportunity for comparison that an orchestra which in its native quarters is perhaps the most tonally impressive in the world last night sounded remote and subdued, its great resources dissipated to the point of impotence.

That a performance under such circumstances could elicit cheers and repeated recalls of the conductor for bows by himself and the men of the orchestra is all the more remarkable. Mr. Munch has established himself, in his two years since succeeding the late Serge Koussevitzky at the head of the orchestra, as a worthy leader of this peerless group of instrumentalists. If he is not averse, at times, to stirring up the music to something beyond its boiling point, he is, when occasion requires, also the meticulous classicist. The result is not unfair to the memory of Koussevitzky, and suits the general temperament of the French conductor and the predominantly French orchestra.

That the memorial is not Symphony Hall could be further observed as the ushers, in an interesting profusion of uniform variations beyond their double-breasted red coats (some of which were worn open), waved to acquaintances or, if convenient, leaned over to converse with them, and as the concert-goers strolled about during the intermission munching hot dogs and ice cream sandwiches.

The lack of doors at the entrance to the auditorium proper resulted in the hall's being filled, after intermission, with a thin gray haze of smoke generated by thousands of cigarets. The effect, therefore, of the amplified announcement before the concert that smoking is prohibited in the hall itself, was negligible even in its observance, save for considerations of propriety.

A word of praise, however, should go to the nameless employe who, before the Beethoven overture had consumed half of its length, turned off the obtrusively noisy mechanical ventilators, which were providing the orchestra with considerable competition.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 19 1951

Boston Has Place as Top Symphony

By D. E. RITZ

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which ga... ...ro... gram at the RPI Fieldhouse in Troy on Wednesday evening, qualifies as one of the greatest symphonic organizations in the world. Even the critics, and there were many in attendance, were reduced to high enthusiasm and vigorous applause for the performers and for Charles Munch, director.

* * *

THE PROGRAM opened with the Schumann "Symphony number 4 in D minor, opus 120," continued with the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" suite number 2 with chorus and the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony, opus 14 A."

"Highlights should always be discussed first" is a rule that one learns in newspaper reporting but no one has yet given this reporter the proper procedure for what to do when the program is "all highlights."

But we'll start with the Ravel suite, with its colorful orchestration, and an interpretation that ranged from delicate nuance to most intense excitement. The assisting chorus, made up of members of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute Glee Club, the Emma Willard Choir and the Russell Sage Choir had received its preliminary rehearsal direction from Joel Dolven and presented a fine performance with the orchestra. The extended and difficult flute solo which occurs during the second section of the suite was given outstanding performance by Georges Laurent. Following the performance Conductor Munch shared the ovation with Laurent and with the members of the orchestra.

* * *

THE SCHUMANN symphony is blessed with rich sonorities, lovely melodies and intensities that are not easy to translate into words.

The Berlioz "Fantastic" is one of those compositions that offers "everything" both in mood and orchestra effect. Its greatest defect, if such it can be called, is its lack of continuous central theme. In form it is a series of five highly interesting episodes not just "in the life of an artist," as Berlioz termed it, but in orchestration. A unifying theme, while lovely, certainly does not predominate.

Moods mark the first movement and a lovely waltz forms the second movement. The third movement, a pastoral, opens with an English horn and oboe duet and the "March to the Gallows" is truly macabre. The final "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath" continues the vivid description and all translates to highly effective orchestral writing.

Each time we hear Conductor Munch our admiration for his musicianship rises higher. Under him the orchestra is likely to retain its high rank among the major symphonic groups of the world.

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
OCT 18 1951

Symphony Performs Brilliantly

By KEITH MARVIN.

With the repeated crashing chords of Hector Berlioz' orchestral curiosity, the "Symphonie Fantastique," Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded a ... ...en and exquisitely performed concert at the R.P.I. Field House last night.

The concert was the second by the group in the Field House, and was given before an audience of several thousand persons.

As an added attraction, the mixed chorus of R.P.I., Russell Sage College and Emma Willard School sang rarely-done vocal accompaniment to Maurice Ravel's masterpiece, the second of the "Daphnes et Chloe" Suites. This was the high point of the program.

The original vocal chorus is seldom performed, but Mr. Munch attempted it at the Tanglewood Summer Concerts at Lenox, Mass., last summer and met with such success that the mixed chorus of the three local institutions was asked to supply the vocal part of the number. The group was prepared by Joel Dolven, musical director at R.P.I., and his success in his task proved itself last night.

As for the orchestra, it was magnificent! We have never heard any modern music and particularly impressionism reach the heights of sheer sound which Mr. Munch was able to get from his group. Granted, Munch is at his best in Ravel, but nonetheless, this reading of the work last night had to be heard to be believed.

From the lush opening to the savagery of its almost brutal finale, this was Ravel at his best, Munch at his best and the orchestra, both solo players and the group as a unit at their best! It would be superfluous to say anything further, but no one who heard "Daphnes et Chloe" last night will ever forget that performance.

Direct Contrast.

The Ravel opus was in direct contrast to both the Schumann "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" Op. 120, and the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," Op. 14A, which concluded the program.

The Berlioz received a brilliant reading from the baton of the 60-year-old conductor. The most peculiar aspect, perhaps, in the rendition, was the utilization of two especially cast bells which appear in the last of the five movements which constitute the composition, entitled "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath." These bells were cast for the orchestra to take the place of the more conventional chimes used to achieve the effect of churchbells.

The "Symphonie Fantastique" was enigmatic, and although it is generally assumed to be the description of the composer's love for an Irish actress of the time (1830), a Miss Smithson, the debate is still on in musical circles. The work was far ahead of its time, and is full of strange, descriptive ideas, such as the "March to the Scaffold" movement, with its ominous kettle-drum roll background.

The Schumann was also exceptionally good and was a wise choice as a program-opener. The work abounds with melody, last night's program illustrating how lovely it is when a perfect orchestral balance is achieved.

The pizzicato opening of the second movement was outstanding as was the balance between horns and strings in the preceeding movement. The one thing we noticed was the beautiful "fade-out" effect at the end of the second movement. We simply haven't ever heard anything like it—the strings growing fainter and fainter and all at once the next movement is in swing.

It was a good crisp reading, yet with the warmth present which a proper and successful reading of the great German romantic must have to assure complete success.

[20]

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

OCT 22 1951

MUSIC

Munch's Hand Evident in Boston Symphony

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Music lovers of Detroit, still under the spell of the opening concert of its new Symphony Orchestra, jammed Masonic Temple auditorium for the second time within the week.

This time it was to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Charles Munch in an attention-compelling program.

The appearance of the venerable orchestra was especially welcome. On this occasion there was no reason for shame on the part of the listeners. There was the consciousness of a new orchestral tradition in Detroit for which no excuses need be made.

* * *

MUNCH, A FRENCHMAN like Paul Paray, brought much of the same Gallic verve to the concert. He has been in command at Boston long enough now to imprint his own personality upon the orchestra, and the results were evident.

The program consisted of three works, each of which exploited widely differing orchestral timbres. Especially was this so in regards to the famed strings of the orchestra.

The coloration varied from the elegant delicacy of the 18th Century Rameau, through the romantic breadth of Tschaikowsky to Honegger's strident clamor.

The Rameau work was a suite from his opera "Dardanus," composed in the early 1700s. It was typical of its time, and altogether charming with the gentle echoing of its rondeau of the second section and the gallant rhythms of its Rigadaun.

* * *

HONEGGER'S Fifth Symphony (Three-D) was as modern as an out-of-plumb steel-cutting machine, whose tortured voice it sometimes resembled.

This symphony by the famed Swiss composer was written less than a year ago. It is in three movements, and while its tonal effects are nightmarish, they reveal a universal feeling for orchestral voices.

The work opens with brutal harshness which subsides at times into rhythmic melodies of neurotic, one might almost say idiotic, gaiety. The tumult of the opening movement grows into a very torment of sound in which the blare of brasses is sounded insistently.

It culminates in a prolonged scream of agony from the trumpet, and drops to a near whisper which ends in the sullen thud of a drum in D.

It is this drum tap, ending each movement, which gives the symphony its soubriquet.

There is something macabre about the musical atmosphere of the whole composition that was never intended for tired nerves. The middle movement is especilly interesting in its form, and has passages of melancholy beauty.

* * *

THE FINALE swirls with frenetic motion which gives birth of further grief-laden episodes. The symphony's juxtaposition to the Rameau and the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony which followed it was a fine inspiration in programming.

Something entirely familiar was needed to relax the mind from the thumb-screw concentration to which it had been subjected.

The Tschaikowsky work was marked by Munch's approach to much of the music we have heard him direct. There is a clean-cut quality to his conducting which gives the impression of speed where that quality is perhaps only mildly in evidence.

The performance showed that one does not have to dip his baton in molasses to get the effects of sorrow. The symphony was notably well balanced in its parts and clear in its definition.

The concert was the first of the season by visiting orchestras to be given at the Temple.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 22 1951

Munch Becoming Integral Part Of Boston Orchestra

By Louise Cuyler

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first of its two Ann Arbor concerts last night in Hill Auditorium. A large and appreciative audience was on hand to welcome them back in this event which has become as cherished and indispensable a part of local musical tradition as is the annual May Festival.

In an organization of the Boston orchestra's caliber, technical competence and musical adequacy are taken for granted. Suffice it to say that last night's performance but strengthened one's confidence with regard to these qualities. Charles Munch, now in his third season as permanent conductor, has become so integral a part of the group, that it is difficult to remember other days and other ways with them. Munch is an exceedingly down-to-earth and practical musician, for all he is a sensitive and discerning artist, and it is the possession of these useful qualities which makes him an "orchestra man's conductor." He is one with his men in a fashion that few leaders achieve. The trustees could scarcely have chosen a wiser guidance for this splendid group.

Opened With Beethoven

Beethoven's dramatic overture to Goethe's "Egmont" opened the concert. This is serious, noble, somewhat heavy music, written at the height of the master's middle period. Not unexpectedly, it is in works of this sort, rather than in the highly circumscribed and traditional forms of the symphony or the sonata, that one detects the first encroachments of romanticism in Beethoven's style. The reading of the overture by Munch and the orchestra was broad and vital.

Prime interest centered around Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which was completed in Paris less than a year ago. Munch and Honegger share the circumstance of being Parisians-by-transplanting, the one from Alsace, the other from Switzerland. In both men, it is to be observed, French suaveness and "savoir faire" have fused with slightly more sturdy and earthy traits, retained from earlier milieus. The result, happy in each individual instance, is especially admirable in cooperation, and a most lucid realization of the new symphony was the consequence.

This Honegger work, while somewhat in the general style of his earlier compositions, seems, at a first hearing, simpler, tauter, and more uncluttered. In the opening movement, Grave, triads of parallel structure oppose each other in two broad, stark, sweeping lines. Between the two chief occurrences of this initial subject is interpolated a more lyric theme in woodwinds.

To Dramatic Conclusion

The second movement, Allegretto, is a fleet and scintillant scherzo, which is twice invaded by a trio-like Adagio section. The finale, marked Allegro marcato, is music of ominous portent, whose insistent rhythm carries the movement to inevitable and dramatic conclusion. The entire work is somewhat briefer than has been the wont of late, a condition which is not to be frowned upon, especially with so typical an example of nineteenth century effusiveness about to occur after intermission.

The music of Tchaikovski, along with that of several of his Russian contemporaries and heirs, has come to seem to be quite indigenous to Boston orchestra programs. With most works of Tchaikovski, the problem is one of applying just enough restraint in reading to curb the composer's undoubted excesses, at the same time that the poignancy and sweep, which are the music's most distinctive and endearing attributes, are preserved.

Mr. Munch read the much-abused and threadbare score of the sixth Symphony last night with fresh intuition, yet with fine control, and unfailing taste. As a result the effusiveness and sentimentality, which so often cloak this work, were minimized, and a much firmer, more orderly musical product emerged.

The Boston Symphony plays its final concert this evening, and the fine program, comprising major works by Rameau, Schumann, Strauss and Ravel, will be eagerly awaited.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 21 1951

Boston Symphony Reveals Its Usual Sonorous Tone

Charles Munch Conducts Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' 'Symphonie Fantastique'; DePaur Chorus Heard

By VICTOR PRAHL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor Charles Munch were given a rousing reception at the conclusion of their concert at the Auditorium on Tuesday night. It is always a major musical event when this famous organization plays here but for this concert everyone seemed to be in extra top form, their sonorous tone and immaculate ensemble soaring forth marvelously in the perfect acoustic of our Auditorium. The Community Concerts could not have had a better opening attraction.

Three Composers

At Tanglewood this summer we had the opportunity of becoming pretty well acquainted with Mr. Munch's manner of conducting and it was apparent that for this concert he had selected works to his own liking, for surely he was heard at his best in these three pieces by Beethoven, Schumann and Berlioz. One was held immediately by the impressive, rich deep chords of Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" which were so beautifully timed and delivered with such stirring depth of tone. It was an exciting unfoldment of the drama the essential qualities of which Beethoven had the genius to compress into such a short work.

Schumann's fourth Symphony composed in its present form just 100 years ago sounded vitally fresh under Mr. Munch's lively but sympathetic hand. He made one feel the essential unity of this work in which Schumann abandoned the traditional symphonic form by carrying the theme of one movement over into the next. In this innovation the composer anticipated the symphonic poem and the cyclic symphonies composed by others years later. We enjoyed especially in this performance the flowing lyricism of the Romanze with its florid passages for the solo violin played so exquisitely by Richard Burgin.

For those, and there are many, whom the music of Berlioz is a cultivated taste, the "Symphonie Fantastique" is full of dull, banal stretches. But here again, it was obvious that every phrase of this long piece of program music carried a definite meaning for Mr. Munch. His revealing performance held the interest of many who were hearing this piece of program music carried a definite meaning for Mr. Munch. His revealing performance held the interest of many who were hearing this piece of program music carried a definite meaning for Mr. Munch. His revealing performance held the interest of many who were hearing this vincing to the skeptic. It was one of his finest performances at Tanglewood last summer and it certainly was the highlight of this concert. It was at its conclusion that the audience recalled him numerous times, each time the conductor gratiously signaling the men of the orchestra to arise and share the applause.

De Paur's Infantry Chorus

De Paur's Infantry Chorus filled a return engagement as the opening attraction of the U. of M. concert course in Amherst on Thursday night, delighting an enormous audience that completely filled the large Curry Hicks building both upstairs and down.

This fine singing organization of 35 veterans fully deserves its popularity for it represents the best in this field of choral singing. While the program in general followed the plan of their previous concerts, most of the material was new. In the opening group of four songs by contemporary composers there were choruses in the modern idiom by Herbert Haufrecht, Howard Swanson, Otto Luening and Normand Lockwood.

There was a dignified beauty in Haufrecht's "These Are The Times," some very original effects in Howard Swanson's setting of Robert Bridges "Nightingales," delightful humor in Otto Luening's "Tiger's Ghost" and a fine feeling for the choral medium in Lockwood's "Dirge for Two Veterans" to the poem by Walt Whitman. Mr. de Paur is to be congratulated on performing these difficult choruses at the beginning of his concerts, for they do not carry a great audience appeal, but they are serious, worthwhile expressions by some of our most gifted composers and they certainly deserve a hearing.

Conductor's Arrangement

The next three groups, folk songs from Latin America, songs from World War II and Negro spirituals and work songs, were heard for the most part in Mr. de Paur's own ingenious arrangements. The swaying Spanish rhythms caught the fancy of the audience and these native songs were given a further flavor by some excellent singing on the part of the soloists.

While there are a number of new faces in the chorus since their Springfield concert last season, it is pleasant to see that Luther Saxon of this city is still with them. His high, clear, easily produced tenor voice in the solo part of the Spanish song "River which Flows Weepingly" was one of the most beautiful numbers on the program. It was good too hearing a repetition of the chorus's stirring performance of the story of "Private Roger Young."

There was a moving beauty in the deep, rich sonorities of Bach's "No Peace I'll Give Thee", from the Motet No. 7 and a further flowering of the same in the closing "Credo" by Gretchaninoff heard in a transcription by Mr. de Paur. As we left the hall they were just starting their encores, which must have been numerous.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

OCT 19 1951

4,000 at War Memorial Hear Boston Symphony

BY THOLA TABOR SCHENCK

More than 4,000 persons passed thru the turnstiles of the War Memorial last night to hear the renowned Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Charles Munch play its initial concert for Famous Artists in the spacious new auditorium.

The perfectly planned and executed program was not augmented by any encore. The genial director smiled his pleasure at the ovationally minded applauding listeners, called his players up several times and with finger on lips, left hearers with the echoing crescendo of Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole", the concluding selection.

The music opened with standing players' "Star Spangled Banner" and with little pause swung into the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. There was no wait for stragglers. Seating by the efficient ushers had been accomplished swiftlly without confusion.

The Overture has an idealistic motif and dramatic rests in the stirring work which brought salvos of applause for the director and instrumentalists on their third visit to Syracuse.

The long number, Schumann's D minor Symphony No. 4 was played without pause. The contrasting parts of the first movement with reiterated theme and varied volume slipped into the nostalgic, soft measures of the Romanze, the lively Scherzo with memorable trio and finale ending with crashing fortissimo chords. Listeners delighted in the gracefully negotiated descending scales of odd intervals, the quick responses to the Munch baton, hand and eyes in pointing up every choir and occasional solo parts thruout.

Following intermission the Strauss Tone Poem "Death and Transfiguration" revealed the sensitivity to this well liked "programme music." The quiet deathbed scene followed by the man's soul struggle and the eventual answer to prayer with celestial glory was thrilling and at the same time calming with serene elevation.

The Ravel "Rhapsodie" provided mood change with castanets, tambourines and rhythmic beats in the last three movements. The soft breezes which swept thru the night Prelude awoke harps and muted strings to ecstacy of movement and color in "Malaguena", "Habanera" and the brilliant fortissimo of "Feria."

Ser 56

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 23 1951

Second Concert Featured By Less Ponderous Music

By Louise Cuyler

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its second and final concert of the present pair in Hill Auditorium last night. While on Sunday the music had been three heavy and dramatic works, Monday's program perused somewhat less ponderous music, and was more sharply contrasted. Viewing the evening as a whole, it might be stated in retrospect that a liberal substance of German romanticism was surrounded and framed by two more impersonal and more spontaneous French compositions.

Rameau's music is usually characterized by the neatness, the transparency, the economy of means which so often clothe the best French music. To commence a concert with this simple and forthright fare is as cleansing and refreshing as a dash of clear water. In the suite chosen and arranged from Rameau's opera "Dardanus" by Vincent d'Indy, a minimal instrumentation was used, which is authentic realization, at the same time that it increases the archaic effect. The movements played were Entree, Rondeau du sommeil, Rigaudon, and Rondeau gai.

Moribund Music

The music of Robert Schumann is held in varying degrees of esteem nowadays. While most of the Lieder literature is rightfully cherished for its intrinsic beauty, and the keyboard works at least have the virtue of being pianistic, the four symphonies stand singularly stark and defenseless before coldly critical appraisal. There are richly robust chordal passages, especially for brasses, which Schumann always cherished, despite the fact that he often misused them in deplorable fashion; there are warm, tender melodies, and vigorous scherzos; but not withstanding, this is dated, moribund, prolix music.

It is perhaps dangerous to hear it played as well as Munch and his men played it last night, for the excellencies of the performance tend to obscure the weakness of the vehicle being read.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony is probably his best, since certain structural factors impose an automatic stringency on his customary diffuse style, rendering it unwontedly succinct. The performance was perhaps a more serious one than the music merited.

Mr. Munch changed the printed order of the post-intermission program, so that the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" followed the Ravel "Rapsodie Espagnole," thus closing the program. This was probably a wise move, since all else must have paled in the wake of the sheer volume of sound evoked in this tremendous and melodramatic tone poem. Ravel's Iberian revels are not quiet music, but they are almost effete in comparison.

The late Maurice Ravel, who was one of France's most distinctive composers of modern times, has always suffered in popular esteem because of certain resemblances, more imagined than real, that his music bore to that of Claude Debussy, his fellow-countryman and contemporary. There has never lived a finer master of the art of orchestration than Ravel. There is such a variety of swishes and rattles and rumbles, not to mention towering crescendos and throttled caesuras in this Spanish Rhapsody, that the whole thing appears to have been conjured up from nether regions. The reading last night was a stunning exhibition of virtuosity which will not be soon forgotten.

Performance Is Powerful

That the performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" sounded indescribably powerful, cloaked at times in such sheer intensity and strength as has seldom been heard here, is amazing indeed, when one considers the nature of the music that preceded it. Aside from wonder at the monstrous fortissimos, the most conspicuous virtue was the utter meticulousness and clarity observed in even the most difficult passage work. One such soaring line in the strings was quite electrifying.

It is with genuine regret that Ann Arbor bids Mr. Munch and his men "au revoir" for another year. They are indeed a fixture in the Choral Union schedule.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
OCT 31 1951

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Video Next Friday Evening

On Friday, at 8 p.m., WBZ-TV will televise the Boston Symphony orchestra directed by its regular conductor, Charles Munch, from the Boston Opera House.

This will be the first time that the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the leading orchestras of the world, has been televised from Boston.

The program will be produced by Ernest Walling from the National Broadcasting Company and will be directed by Tom Sawyer of WBZ-TV. This program will be fed to the NBC network through station WBZ-TV Boston.

Three cameras will be used to direct the program, one in the rear of the second balcony, one in a right hand stage box, and one on a dolly on the stage with the orchestra. Nine microphones will be placed in various parts of the Opera House. To facilitate the directions for switching cameras during the telecast, WBZ-TV director, Tom Sawyer is memorizing as much of the musical score as possible.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 20 1951

Honegger Piece Is Well-Projected By Charles Munch

THANKS to Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony, Buffalo music-lovers had their first hearing of Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony Friday evening in Kleinhans Music Hall. Some who were there will doubtless cavil at the word "thanks," because they will remember that the temper of the applause at the end of the reading held the guarded warmth of the well-brought-up child who says politely, "it was a nice party."

As with any major work, it is difficult to take in all of such a score and evaluate it on one hearing. The three-movement symphony, completed last December for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is a powerful and original work. Rooted in the very individual personality of the composer, it is buttressed by a highly disciplined mind and given an enigmatic quality by Honegger's extraordinary imaginative use of tone color and sonorities.

* * *

THE RHYTHMS ARE vital and strong. There are dissonances—not arbitrarily abrasive, however—but they lend a certain grandeur. The entire work is pervaded by a mood of a solemn fate, which is made more evocative of being lightened with tender woodwind passages.

In contrast to the somewhat restrained response to the Honegger, which was beautifully projected, the splendid performance of Brahms' Fourth Symphony received a full measure of appreciation, even to some shouts of "bravo."

Mr. Munch, a conductor of distinguished style and musicianship, read the Brahms as a man might reread a well-loved, oft-perused tale. He lingered lovingly over the lyric portions, sharing his affection for their poetry. Sometimes, it must be admitted, he conned the faster-moving dramatic pages so exuberantly that for an instant the thread of the story blurred. But altogether it was a reading to remember for clarity, grace and strength.

The orchestra brought a matching elegance to the stately music of suite from Rameau'sk opera "Dardanus," as arranged by D'Indy. The concert was the first of the Zorah Berry Artist Series.—T. C. B.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
OCT 23 1951

Leonard Lyons

NEW YORK, Oct. 22.

AS WE said farewell to Errol Flynn, in the exclusive story of the face slapping by Duncan MacMartin at El Morocco, it was almost dawn and the sky was as crimson as the left side of Mr. Flynn's face. This is the aftermath: Flynn, who had vowed to find MacMartin and "discuss" the matter further, went to the hotel where the Canadian millionaire always stays. This was at 4:30 A. M. The night clerk assured him MacMartin wasn't there. Flynn insisted that he be taken up, or that MacMartin be brought down. A passing police car stopped, the officers invited Flynn to take a ride with them, and he was distracted from his purpose by being permitted to ride with the cops up and down the West Side highway till early morning.

ERROL FLYNN

M-G-M will star Leslie Caron in its movie version of "Miss Liberty." The purchase price will return a profit on their investments to the original backers of the Broadway musical . . . When the "Call Me Madam" cast did their special skits, at the party celebrating the first anniversary of the show, George S. Kaufman sighed: "I've reached the stage where I can't stand any entertainment you can't turn off by switching a button"

* * *

JUST before the Senate rushed through the confirmations of the nine delegates to the United Nations, Eleanor Roosevelt told Warren Austin she preferred to resign—rather than accept only an interim appointment. That's the reason for the speedy confirmation . . . The State Department plans to send the Boston Symphony and the City Center Ballet on a cultural tour of Europe . . . The Government's halt on color television forced a postponement of an RCA project which would have revolutionized show business: RCA owns the rights to telecast "Call Me Madam" and other shows in which it invested large sums. The plan was to color televise these shows over a closed circuit into a large number of theaters, and charge $1 admission.

Dr. A. Stone, who was nominated for the Nobel Prize for his books on birth control, leaves for India soon at the invitation of the Government . . . The Peace Congress to be held in Zagreb, Yugoslavia, Oct. 23—the three-day anti-Cominform session—will decide to have its next meeting in Paris, on Bastille Day . . . Josephine Baker will make her TV debut on the Kate Smith show . . . Incidentally, to the many letter writers about the Damon Runyon Fund and the Josephine Baker incident—I resigned from the Runyon Fund last month. And I wasn't there the night of the Baker incident. I was at Sardi's, supping with Dr. Ralph Bunche.

* * *

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT was scheduled to meet with six different types of organizations last week, each representing a different field and each presenting their problems to her. "I'm supposed to be a fountain of knowledge about all subjects," said Mrs. Roosevelt after one of these meetings. "I'm dreading the day—and it's inevitable that it will come, because I always try to be honest in my answers—when some group will come to me and I'll have to tell them, in complete frankness: 'I never heard of it . . . or of you.'"

One of the famous by-liners in Collier's current issue, containing a report on World War III, went far beyond the editors' expectations. He wrote a report on World Wars IV and V. A ghost writer saved the day, the article and his by-line . . . Lt. Christopher Columbus, of the Spanish navy, spent his last night in town at El Morocco. He had to return to Spain because he's just been given command of a new vessel. "It's a small one," he told me, "insignificant"—but larger than the one his famed ancestor used in crossing the ocean . . . The police department's "housecleaning" announced last week wasn't a real one, but only a re-shuffling.

* * *

GORE VIDAL, the young novelist, is writing a play for Luise Rainer. The double Academy Award winner, in explaining her long absence from the theater, said, "I'm a perfectionist. To me there's no such thing as a half good play" . . . Miss Rainer, incidentally, went to Boston last week for the U.N., to participate in the United Nations Day ceremonies. The guide, who drove her from the airport to the hotel, tried to point out the sights—but Miss Rainer knew them all, knew more, in fact, than he did. Some time ago her husband had been offered a post with a Boston book publisher. The star went to Boston with him, to study the city and see if she'd like living there—and now she knows as much about Boston as any Bostonian.

Under the O'Dwyer Administration, Jim Lyons, Borough President of the Bronx, was unable to have forget-me-nots designated as the official flower of the borough. Lyons now finally has managed it, and at the dedication of the LaGuardia plaque at LaGuardia Field last week, he wanted to present forget-me-nots to Mrs. LaGuardia. The flowers are out of season, but Lyons obtained them by arranging special planting and blooming at the Botanical Gardens.

WARREN, OHIO
TRIBUNE-CHRONICLE
25 1951

The Lyons Den

By Leonard Lyons

Just before the Senate rushed thru the confirmations of the nine delegates to the United Nations, Eleanor Roosevelt told Warren Austin she perferred to resign—rather than accept only an interim appointment. That's the reason for the speedy confirmation . . . The State Dept. plans to send the Boston Symphony and the City Center Ballet on a cultural tour of Europe . . .

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
5 1951

The Lyons' Den

Boston Symphony May Be Sent On Cultural Tour Of Europe

By LEONARD LYONS

THE STATE DEPT. plans to send the Boston Symphony and the City Center Ballet on a cultural tour of Europe . . . The government's halt on color television forced a postponement of an RCA project which would have revolutionized show business: RCA owns the rights to telecast "Call Me Madam" and other shows in which it invested large sums. The plan was to color televise these shows over a closed circuit into a large number of theaters, and charge $1 admission.

[22]

Boston Symphony Acclaimed For Unusual Program Here

By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

The weather has changed since last Sunday. Last night was wet, dripping, substantially miserable. The rigors of the seasonal change were eased considerably, however, by the visit of the Boston Symphony to the Peristyle of the Museum of Art.

Charles Munch was the conductor and the audience that greeted him and his players was the largest that the Peristyle has housed in some long time. In the business of orchestral concerts, at least, it appears that quality does sell year in and year out.

Program Unusual

Mr. Munch's program for the night was highly unusual for this sector: the Suite from Rameau's Opera, "Dardanus," music which I have never heard in Toledo, Honegger's Symphony No. 5, which was completed only last year, and Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, which is heard often here and elsewhere but not frequently with Rameau and Honegger.

Arthur Honegger is a Swiss, one of the group of conductors who were years ago known as "Les Six." Of the group Durey, Auric and Taillefaire are heard little today. The others, Poulenc, Milhaud, and Honegger, have proved more durable. Honegger was always one of the strongest of the lot, but there has been a feeling about his work, rather widely held, that his music was too angular and too thinly scored to wear well.

Piece Expertly Devised

On the basis of one hearing, I can detect no reason that the Symphony which was played last night should not last exceedingly well. It is an expertly-devised piece. At bottom it is conventional enough. And, if over its foundation it seems to veer off into new and untried structural and tonal patterns, it is unerringly logical throughout. In a word, it fits.

It is big and sonorous, but it is not heavy. On the contrary, it is vigorous, elastic, rhythmically agile and harmonically rich. And the Boston Orchestra played it explicitly, elegantly and with a completely grand style, balance and tone.

If the rest of the concert seemed a strange outpouring from the Boston players, as we have come to know their work over so many years, it was not in any way a puzzling display. For this is the kind of virtuoso orchestra that can adapt itself to all manners of conducting. And certainly the conducting and the perceptions of Mr. Munch differ considerably from those which preceded them.

Fine Balance In Strings

So one had to get a acclimated to Rameau with an organ-like big, almost lush string tone. One missed, perhaps, the fine, French balance in the strings, the preciseness of tone and phrasing. But there was still a marvelous transparency between the choirs of the orchestra, an almost unmatched clarity in every voice at all volumes.

Mr. Munch's conception of Tchaikowsky was new to me. It was not the dolorous article which we observe too frequently or the cleanly-washed product which is much more satisfactory. It was an immense conception endowed with the manliness which is too often denied its composer. And that is good. But it needs larger acquaintance to enable one to hear it intimately.

The first movement was in performance a little ragged, the first such production I have heard from this orchestra in some 30 years.

Peristyle Packed As Munch, Boston Symphony Perform

Orchestra Shows Beauty Of Tone In Works By Tchaikowsky, Rameau And Honegger

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting, last night in the Museum Peristyle.

The Program

Rameau ... ...Suite from the opera "Dardanus"
Honegger.....Symphony No. 5
Tchaikowsky ....Symphony No. 6 in B minor (Opus 74, "Pathetique")

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Staff Writer

Soggy weather did not deter a large audience from crowding the Peristyle last night, almost to its last cranny, to hear Mr. Munch and his players, an infrequent privilege these days, for the great Boston Symphony Orchestra has not come to Toledo for quite a while.

The golden strings of the Boston ensemble were evident at the very start of things, in the little Rameau suite, music of deceptive simplicity yet fraught with heartening beauty and classic ease. Mr. Munch had thought to diminish his orchestra for this occasion, an effort to meet the classic mode, yet even with this reduction I could not help but wonder whether Rameau of the 18th Century would have approved this robust sonority. The playing, of course, was impeccable.

Bewildering Score

Mr. Munch had conducted the Honegger symphony last summer in Tanglewood, where Dr. Koussevitzky was to have presented the first performance in memory of his wife, to whom it is dedicated. I still think this a strange and bizarre score, derivative and allusive, yet its rebellious strength and obvious attempt to achieve a Slavic barbarity and splendor never quite break through a native elegance and precision. One is bewildered at the close, yet curious to hear it once more.

Mr. Munch gave the Tchaikowsky masterpiece a foursquare and rather open and literal reading. His unfortunate propensity for dashing toward an incoherent climax was annoyingly evident; also an overemphasis upon clarity and counterpoint, so that often the under side of melodic texture was all that one could hear, and the tune itself was obscured by harmonic but irrelevant horns and winds. Nor did the "tired sigh" at the end, so hopeless and resigned, quite achieve its purpose of tearful tranquillity.

Subtle Resistance Noted

The orchestra, when left to its own unruffled devices, keeps its extraordinary beauty of tone and capacity for infinite shading and tint, and Mr. Munch, tense and overly dramatic, cannot quite ruin these innate qualities. It was apparent last night, at several points, that the players themselves felt called upon to resist subtly this drive toward racing tempi and exaggerated moods. Yet Mr. Munch can be delicate and sensitive and airy when he chooses, but so often he forgets when climax looms.

MUSIC

Praise be to Orpheus. The Choral Union Series, in the fourth and fifth concerts of the season, has at last come across with a group of musicians worthy of undivided attention, unqualified praise, and the $2.40 or more we pay to hear them.

In its twenty-seventh Ann Arbor appearance, the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, Sunday night presented a program displaying three different conceptions of essentially dramatic music, and as usual did well by them all.

Judging from one hearing, the Honegger Symphony No. 5 was deservedly the chief point of interest in the program, both from the standpoint of its newness and its worth. The chordal first movement provides a sturdy, well-unified beginning and lays the groundwork for the rhythmic development and intricate color effects which follow.

The finale is an extended effort to build up tension, and Honegger is evidently no amateur along this line. Repetition of a definite rhythmic pattern, running passages in the strings which almost but never quite reach their goal, the standard tremolo, and dissonant blasts from the brass section—all these work their magic before the movement is climaxed, and then closes on the significant drum tap.

From Honegger's Fifth Symphony, the program proceeded to Tchaikovsky's Sixth, which Munch did his best to keep from being overly "Pathetique." Restraint was the dominating characteristic of his interpretation of the first movement. The lyric theme, particularly, was held back in its first appearances in the muted strings, and not until the final section of the movement did it sing out in all its outworn glory. In the succeeding two movements, Munch showed Tchaikovsky to be as effective in creating impressions like the warm gracefulness of the second movement and the martial vigor of the third as he is in creating a passionately tragic mood.

Munch's interpretation of this symphony is not a unique one; Tchaikovsky's lack of subtlety gives no opportunity for such an accomplishment. His interpretation is rather faithful to the inherent characteristics of the music and ignorant of any surrounding traditions which can only obscure what quality the music has.

Last night's concert gave Munch a chance to display his vitality and his generally liberal conception of orchestral technique. The Rameau was serenely handled, but in his reading of Schumann's Fourth Symphony Munch probably deviated from the conventional more than in any other selection of the two concerts. The music, unfortunately, emerged somewhat strained from his lively treatment.

The Ravel "Rapsodie espagnole" and the Strauss tone poem were both impressive; the latter triumphant work was the most enjoyable part of the entire program.

Thanks to the Boston Symphony and to Charles Munch, the concert series, in two programs, reached a level it can only hope to equal in the remainder of the season.

—Virginia Voss

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Back from their Western trip, Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony gave yesterday the first performance of the all-Beethoven program planned for the current pair of concerts, the season's third. Since Mr. Munch had already shown us his version of the Eighth Symphony, interest centred in the other items, the Third "Leonore" Overture and the Violin Concerto, with none other than Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Mr. Heifetz, it would seem, had already played the piece here in 1919, '31, '38 and '45, but this was the first time he had performed it at Symphony Hall in collaboration with Mr. Munch.

Yesterday one heard just about what one expected. Mr. Heifetz's playing was suave, polished, finished, technically and musically impeccable. It is possible to infuse more warmth, a more romantic and personal quality into the work, that by general consent, stands at the head of all concerted pieces for the violin. We learned that, particularly, when the Concerto was performed here by Ginette Neveu (with Koussevitzky conducting) a few months before that enormously talented French woman met her death in an airplane accident. We did not know at the time that we would not hear her play the Concerto again; and we are not likely to encounter from anyone else a reading so vital and electrifying. Mr. Heifetz's way with the piece was, by comparison, calm and detached. At least, the music had serenity, and Mr. Munch does not always achieve serenity, while the Larghetto, especially, was a tonal treat.

Mr. Munch gave an exciting account of the "Leonore, No. 3," in which he had not been heard here before. The introduction was unusually impressive and the close was stirring, as it always is, no matter who conducts. The chief theme of the Allegro, supposedly descriptive of the heroic character of Leonore, was announced quietly in sub-pianissimo and then repeated, after the intervening crescendo, in frenzied fortissimo, a degree of contrast that did not seem to make either musical or dramatic sense. One longs occasionally to hear the classics played "straight" rather than interpreted with a capital I.

Less violent than before, Mr. Munch's version of the Symphony emphasized the music's vigor and sometimes at a sacrifice of its potential charm. All too often the orchestral tone was rough. It is probably unkind to mention that there was horn trouble in the trio of the Menuetto, a treacherous spot. The audience received Symphony and Overture warmly and, as was to be expected, heaped plaudits upon Mr. Heifetz. The reader may be reminded once more that both the Friday and Saturday concerts are now broadcast on WGBH.

BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD

OCT 30 1951

Symphony TV Concert

By AL SALIE

A special half-hour concert featuring the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its regular conductor, Charles Munch, will be telecast over the National Broadcasting Co.'s entire television network Friday night (WBZ-TV 8 to 8:30 p. m.).

The special event, originating from the stage of the Boston Opera House, will be handled by WBZ-TV camera crews. It will be the first time that the orchestra has been televised from its home city.

The concert will be under the sponsorship of RCA-Victor, and will serve as a "one shot" fill-in until Ezio Pinza takes over the Friday night period Nov. 16.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

OCT 26 1951

Stirring

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

After reading your music critic of the Boston Symphony concert I was surprised that only a mention of the opening selection, the "Star Spangled Banner" was made.

I'd like to ask if anyone ever heard a more fitting opening, played with all the feeling that goes with the playing of this selection? This memorial building hears this selection played by "canned music" but Thursday night it was real, and right from the hearts of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VICTOR W. RODGERS,
Baldwinsville.

[23]

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

OCT 27 1951

Jascha Heifetz Soloist in Beethoven Program at Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

Boston Symphony concerts this ... Conductor Charles Munch has ... ent ... program to Beetho... ... the Eighth ... ... ding the Leo... ... Overture ... ... to have ... ... on the stage of ... Symphony Hall flanked and backed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. ... since April of 1949 have we ... heard in this wise. What ... could be a ... of its own with ... ... violin concertos of ... ... Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms that ... performance of them also ... genius, pleasurable and impossible to forget.

This is not only a matter of his ... ... technic and the ... rich bright floating tone which he ... produces. It is as much, perhaps ... ... the sense of musicianship, of ... style and understanding; the grasp ... ... of musical profundities ... that place his performance of such concertos among the superlative tonal experiences.

Chiseled Detail

... the entire Beethoven master... ... yesterday afternoon ... and so beyond all doubt will it go ... again tonight. To be fancy, you ... could say further that Heifetz' ... reading has the perfection of ... chiseled detail of a Michaelangelo ... sculpture and its power as well. With good reason yesterday's audience hailed Mr. Heifetz with long continued applause and cheers.

The orchestra, which in Symphony and Overture had seemed a bit tired and edgy after its 10 days on tour, was transformed once the Concerto was launched. The tone was the ocean-deep, compact, luminous tone of this orchestra at its fabulous best. The response to Mr. Munch's superb interpretive authority was immediate and precise.

When the first bar of the Eighth Symphony seemed nearer two F's than one, when certain entrances were jittery, and all not exactly on the beat, when the speed of the "Leonore" Overture momentarily threatened to run away with all hands, those shortcomings almost certainly must be attributed to the fatigue of the annual mid-West tour.

Yet even with these flaws, both Symphony and Overture were done with spirit and a most satisfying polish of style. The Symphony went noticeably better in this respect than when Mr. Munch, guest conductor in 1948, had given its most recent hearing until yesterday. This time the work sounded lighter, more delicate and rhythmically flexible. It was all right, too, that the Symphony, though composed later, came before the Overture, which is bigger and more ... Beethoven.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 27 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, gave the third program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist. The all-Beethoven program offered the Eighth Symphony, the Third "Leonore" Overture and the D major Violin Concerto.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It is to be doubted if there is anything in the orchestral concert of today that is more completely first class than hearing such an incomparable trio as Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony orchestra and Heifetz doing the giant of all violin concertos. To call it a sort of rite, indeed, would not be far from the fact.

Listening the Heifetz is practically a rite at any time. He is, after all, the ultimate violinist of the day; who can challennge his position? Several of his contemporaries may equal him in technical bravura though hardly inn effortlessness. Some may attainn his incredible control of the bow, his exactitude of intonation on the widest skips on the fingerboard, his tonal opulence on the low strings, his utter command of every violinistic effect. Yet Heifetz remains, both among musicians and concert audiences, and rightly so, the ultimate inn the style of the day: the violinist without the slighest mannerism of the hot-house virtuoso of a former day.

His approach is inward; he lets the music itself make its own contact, its own communication. His role is merely that of the re-creator; his technical achievements are at the disposal of the masters, and he interprets their express wishes without trying to convey the impression (so often conveyed by virtuoso players) that he created the whole thing himself out of hand.

This was the case yesterday. It was Beethoven speaking, not Heifetz. It was Beethoven, in one of the happiest and most fertile years of his life in a work entirely untroubled by the storm and stress of his later years. At once introspective, reflective, emotionally low-keyed, it is wholly without the virtuoso tension. It displays the characteristic give and take the form conventionally requires, and it certainly offers the soloist opportunity to demonstrate his prowess.

Utmost in Honesty

But the D major Concerto is first of all a completely musical expression demanding the utmost in honesty of approach; it cannot be fiddled with, and it certainly wasn't yesterday. Colaborating with the violinist in making this performance so authoriative was Charles Munch, who is clearly one of the very fineset accompanying conductors we have. Unlike Koussevitzky, whose struggles with soloists were legendary, Mr. Munch never allows his personality to interfere. The composer and soloist are supreme; his role is that of the technical supervisor taking his cue from the soloist's approach. Heifetz chose introspection, repose, serenity of spirit, and so it was in the orchestra.

It is perhaps a little unfair to single out Heifetz for what is to follow for nearly all violinists do the same thing, but I do wish we wouldn't tune his instrument during the orchestral sections. Once tuned properly the violin will remain in tune long enough to get through any concerto movement. Even if it does slip, the slip is generally so infinitesimal that any competent violinist can compensate for it on the finger board. Maybe I'm overly sensitive in this regard, but it always shakes my confidence in a violinist when he tunes his instrument during the orchestral expositions as if to point out that nothing much counts when he isn't playing. Beyond this peevish observation, I have nothing but the best to say of the performance. It was truly the last word.

Slightly Grainy

The performance of the Eighth Symphony, however, was not. It just didn't go with the technical quality it might have, nor was it always persuasive. The strings seemed slightly grainy to me, and the overall sound wasn't as resplendent as usual. The spirit of the thing was apt enough, and it all got better as it went along, but it was not a memorable performance. The Third "Leonore," however, was. Indeed, it was an electrifying experience, a tribute both to the extraordinary bravura the orchestra can achieve when in top form and to the conductor's vast capacity for seeking out and conveying every nuahce of texture and every shading of dynamic level.

Harking back a moment to Heifetz, it may be remarked that the violinist was wearing, for the first time in my experience, a fleeting smile when he responded to the applause. I thought it looked very well o nhim, too, and when he gets it broken in it should prove to be most becoming. The program next week offers the American premiere of Lukas Foss' Piano Concerto, with works of Weber and Debussy to round it out.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 28 1951

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the moment this department doesn't know whether to laugh or to cry. It scans the survey of the 1950-1951 American orchestral season presented in the current issue of Musical America and discovers that 15 per cent of the total performances given by the 25 "leading" orchestras were of native works, and assured that this is "an encouragingly large proportion." Then it turns to a communication received from the National Music Council, which also conducts an annual survey, and is told that, as regards the programs of the 25 "major" American orchestras in the same season, there are grounds for "genuine alarm as to the future of creative music in our country."

"The number of compositions by native-born musicians on these programs," the bulletin continues, "has been steadily declining during the past three seasons. During 1950-1951 the major orchestras performed the smallest number of American works since the 1941-1942 season. The percentage of American compositions played, 7.3 per cent, was the lowest ever recorded in these surveys, except for the 1940-1941 season."

To combat this deplorable trend "the music editors of the daily press, the entire music press, the directors of music schools and the leaders in other musical fields are asked to use their good offices to the end that nation-wide publicity be given this matter, and effort aroused to stimulate more frequent performances of the fine orchestral works of our native composers. A sizable increase in the American compositions performed would still leave ample room for contemporary and other foreign composers."

* * *

Well, what's the answer? Or, whom are we to believe? For one thing, the "leading" orchestras of Musical America's survey and the "major" ones investigated by the council are not in every case the same. "The magazine's list includes the orchestras of Erie, Duluth, Louisville and the NBC, all omitted from the other tabulation. The latter, on the other hand, takes cognizance of the orchestras of Buffalo, Kansas City, Portland Ore., and Seattle, that Musical America ignores. Moreover, Louisville, with 25 per cent and Erie with 20 per cent, boosted Musical America's score considerably, while Portland stood at the foot of the other list with 2.1 per cent. Both Seattle and Kansas City made a poor showing. But so did the NBC Symphony, which Musical America included. Toscanini's interest in American music has always been lukewarm, and the other conductors on that radio program remain timid in this respect, perhaps for a very good reason.

* * *

And there is still another angle to the situation. Musical America "American" composers include som of foreign birth, such as Menott and Boris Koutzen, while the Musi Council is talking only of the native-born composer. This is a difficult line to draw. In one sense Bloch, Stravinsky, Hindemith and Schoenberg count as Americans; and had Musical America added them, its total would have soared.

The issue of to what extent birth and residence count, respectively, toward determining a composer's nationality will never be settled to the satisfaction of all. If the foreign-born composer is to be included in statistics of this sort, the line should be drawn between those who made their reputation abroad and those who, like Menotti, made it first in this country. That would also take in Lukas Foss, born in Berlin, who participates in the first performance of his Piano Concerto at the Symphony Concerts of this week.

* * *

On the whole, Boston's showing was not too impressive in either case. Musical America credited our orchestra with 5 per cent and the Council with only 4 per cent. It was tied here with Minneapolis; and the two were four places from the bottom. The Council had als another list which embraced Amer can-born and naturalized compo ers, living in the U. S., and he Boston, relatively, was an ev worse case. Our orchestra and th of Seattle were credited with 10 per cent, which put them one place from the bottom (San Antonio, the cellar champ, could show only 5.9 per cent). Cincinnati won the pennant with 5.3 per cent, while in the native-born list, Washington's National was on top with 17.4 per cent. There is no getting round the fact that Charles Munch has not displayed the interest in American music, or in contemporary music generally, that Koussevitzky did. And the audiences, I suspect, are not unpleased. If American music

Performs Concerto on Beethoven Program

By Harold Rogers

The Beethoven program yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall reaffirmed the appropriateness of the choice of the master's name for the golden scroll centered on the proscenium arch.

The concert reached its climax with Jascha Heifetz' superb performance of the Violin Concerto. It was not only a triumph for Mr. Heifetz; it was also a triumph for Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Such an integrated and sensitive accompaniment is a rarity. The soloist and conductor were at one in their classical approach and purity of style.

Mr. Heifetz' flawless artistry reached an exciting pitch in the cadenza of the first movement (Allegro ma non troppo). The difficulties of the manifold stoppings were traversed with accuracy, fluidity, and brilliance.

In the quasi-improvisation of the serene Larghetto the soloist played with a moving lyricism. He elevated Beethoven's simple melodies to their native, exalted realm. The final rollicking Rondo, in the hands of an amateur, can be utterly trite, but it would be quite impossible for Heifetz to produce a trite note. Afterward many of the listeners stood while tendering a prolonged ovation.

Mr. Munch opened the program with a delicate and altogether charming reading of the jovial Eighth Symphony. Since we have come to expect him to take all fast tempos even faster, we are not often disappointed. Fast tempos are generally exciting and are disappointing only when the musicians lose their relaxation and the music loses clarity.

Such tensions, however, were slight in yesterday's performance and occurred only once or twice in the finale, the Allegro vivace. The Allegretto scherzando — the shortest symphonic movement Beethoven ever wrote—was delightful.

Sandwiched between the symphony and the concerto was the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3—one of four overtures Beethoven composed during the tortuous evolution of his only opera, "Fidelio." Here Mr. Munch again demonstrated his ability to achieve astonishing effects by taking the main theme triple-piano (so softly that it can hardly be heard) and then employing a snowballing crescendo that reaches the second statement of the theme at a triple-forte. It's an impressive device—one of Mr. Munch's best.

The off-stage trumpet call (which in the opera announces that Florestan will be saved from execution) was dramatically in the distance. When the call is heard the second time, it is closer —an effect achieved merely by opening the door at the side of the stage. The trumpet then recedes in the distance—an amazing diminuendo—when the door is slowly closed.

[24]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 30 1951

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Providence tonight in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium for the first concert of the 1951-'52 season and an association that was begun many, many years ago between community and orchestra is happily renewed.

Since the Boston Symphony was last here, its beloved former conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has died, not in retirement but in the full round of his work and with many engagements in plan. Tonight's concert will be in memory of the slight little man who, over a quarter of a century, made a firm place for himself in the hearts of the Providence audience.

As a memoriam, Charles Munch, his successor, will lead the orchestra in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which expresses in lovely music man's unquenching hope for radiant immortality.

Providence has come to know and to appreciate the many fine qualities of musical scholarship, leadership and questing beauty in Mr. Munch's baton. Once again we greet our old friends in the orchestra and welcome the appearance in Providence of Mr. Munch with the hope of another splendid season.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 31 1951

Reviews of Music

Munch Conducts Boston Symphony To Open Season

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, played the first concert of the season last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium and a capacity audience gave conductor and orchestra an ovation. The program included two numbers which were played at the opening concert in Boston in tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky. The music, powerful and stirring in itself, was presented with a special quality of devotion and insight which made the occasion not only a moving experience for the recollections it awakened but also for the promise of great things in store for us from this superbly trained orchestra.

The concert opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84. It was apparent at once that the box stage (now usable because of the additional equipment backstage at the auditorium) added considerably to the liveliness of the reed and brass tones. The dramatic sweep of the Beethoven music was arresting. Charles Munch's manner of contrasting his tonal values is one of the most interesting qualities of his conducting. This, together with the perfect timing of his effects, makes his work exciting.

The Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24, is an amazing work. The German title, "Tod und Verklarung," fits it better than the English translation. The very shape and sound of the words is a key to the structure of the piece. "Tod," abrupt and final, is linked to the longer, brighter word, "Verklarung" and the insistence of the rising, triumphant phrase repeated in every section of the orchestra was firmly fixed in one's memory. The orchestra gave every ounce of expressive interpretation possible to the beautiful music.

The strings sang as with one voice and the brass and reed sections reached the ultimate in delicate pianissimo tone, as well as in rich full forte tone. The ensemble breathed in unison and the listeners were completely aware that a virtuoso performance had been heard.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74, completed the program and in this work we heard all the emotionally stirring phrases of the timeless melodies which the great Russian composer left us. The wistful serenity of the themes of the first movement, the grace of the Allegro con grazia and the rhythmic verve of the Allegro molto vivace brought an interruption of applause. It was as if the audience could not contain its enthusiasm. Dr. Munch quickly brought the mood back to retrospective solemnity with the benison of the Adagio lamentoso. The music had, for the short space of time, made the world seem a good place, with a degree of understanding and unison.

Renaissance Lodge Of Sons of Italy Gives Annual Concert

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Renaissance Lodge of the Order of Sons of Italy in America presented its third annual concert last evening at the Gilbert Stuart Junior High School Auditorium in Providence. The artists were Anne M. Tremontozzi, soprano; Joseph Conte, violinist; Clifford E. Provencal, tenor; Lucia Lancellotti Caito and Elena de Giorgio, duo-pianists. Ingeborg H. Ziegler was accompanist for Miss Tremontozzi and Salvatore Fransosi was accompanist for Mr. Conte and Mr. Provencal.

The program:

I. Danza, Danza Fanciula ..... Durante
Alma Mia ..... Handel
Dove Sono (Le Nozze di Figaro) ..... Mozart
ANNE M. TREMONTOZZI, Soprano
INGEBORG H. ZIEGLER, Accompanist

II. Concerto No. 5, A-Major
(1st mov.) ..... Mozart
Lotus Land ..... Scott
Scherzo-Tarantelle ..... Wieniawski
JOSEPH CONTE, Violinist
SALVATORE FRANSOSI, Accompanist

III. Prelude ..... Franck
Sicilienne ..... Bach
Five Waltzes, op. 39 ..... Brahms
LUCIA LANCELLOTTI CAITO and ELENA de GIORGIO, Duo-Pianists

INTERMISSION

IV. Arioso (I Pagliacci) ..... Leoncavallo
Serenade ..... Toselli
Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life ..... Herbert
CLIFFORD E. PROVENCAL, Tenor
SALVATORE FRANSOSI, Accompanist

V. El Vito ..... Infante
Valze ..... Arensky
Marche ..... Prokofieff
ELENA de GIORGIO and LUCIA LANCELLOTTI CAITO, Duo-Pianists

The second group of songs which was programmed by Anne Tremontozzi was omitted because of a throat condition, but there was no suggestion of strain in the opening group, which was marked by richness of tone, a lovely sotto voce where needed, and great poise. Miss Tremontozzi's voice suited the mood and character of the Mozart aria so very well that there should normally have been encores. Ingeborg Ziegler gave excellent support at the piano.

Mr. Conte had a few problems with his group. The Concerto was a little out of balance which could have been solved by putting the piano on the half stick, and the piece which followed was unhappily made up of sections which tempted the audience to applaud twice before the piece was over. The final piece was a tour de force for the violin, and both Mr. Conte and Mr. Fransosi finally came into their own.

In the tenor group, Mr. Provencal displayed a fine natural voice and skill in putting ideas over. His two encores were both old favorites.

Lucia Lancellotti Caito and Elena de Giorgio were well matched at the two pianos. They had a tendency to be conservative about tempo, which is perhaps another way of saying that many similar teams play too fast.

Carolyn Penta and Carmela Bruno were co-chairmen in charge of arranging the program for the Renaissance Lodge.

E BOSTON HERALD,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting in the illness of Charles Munch, gave the fourth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Lukas Foss, composer and pianist, was the soloist. The program: Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber; Piano Concerto No. 2, Foss; Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98, Brahms.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

In his Second Piano Concerto, given its American premiere yesterday afternoon, Lukas Foss demonstrates himself to be an arrived composer of the first order. He also demonstrates again what we've known a long time: that he has few equals as a pianist as well.

This concerto is a very imposing work both in content and architectural dimension. It lasts at least 40 minutes, which is unusual in this era of concise musical expression, but its content requires this; there is no attenuation for mere sake of conceit. Its language is highly contemporary, employing polytonality and very complicated rhythmic variation, but it is not aggressively modern and largely avoids the linear dissonant counterpoint that is, because you make up the rules as you go along, the current rage of the younger composers. It is very original, too, despite the occasional echoes of the familiar past.

The composer, who has just returned from a year's study and work in Rome, points out in his program notes that his concerto is close to the 19th century concept, and this is true. In fact, the spirit of the work is almost that of Brahms' D minor Concerto, also composed by a young man (Brahms was 25, Foss is 29), and also very large in conception. Like Brahms, Foss begins with a powerful and a noble utterance, continues in the slow movement with a lyrical meditation, and finishes with rollicking bravura. Obviously, the sound, like the world itself, has changed in 93 years, but the spirit of the thing hasn't. And it is not too absurd to suggest that this concerto will speak as clearly to audiences 93 years removed from us as the Brahms does here and now. If anybody, that is, but the composer will play it for these next decade or two to establish it.

Five Motives

The first movement now seems far and away the best. It employs no less than five important motives, the first appearing as a striking trumpet call. This is powerfully imitated on the piano at its first entrance and leads to a strong motoric impulse out of which there appear, as the work progresses, the other four motives, of which two are vigorously rhythmic, two more lyrical in mood. One of these lyrical themes, first coming as an interlude for piano alone, suggests a nursery song and it is delightful. But the general character of this movement is urgent and it is clearly both a masterpiece of the organization of material, and a masterly essay in writing for keyboard and orchestra.

The second movement is less successful, not because Mr. Foss' inspiration wanes but because, like most contemporaries, he seems reluctant to be caught with a long-breathed melody. The melodic materials are beautiful in a fragmentary way, but they never last long enough to establish themselves. He sets up a perfect mood, as at the appearance of the plucked accompanimental figures in the cellos, and nothing happens. In view of the fact that the AABA melodic conception has been around for 15 or 20 centuries, there seems little reason to be embarrassed by it, but regrettably enough, all the young composers—and even their middle-aged contemporaries—are.

The rondo-like finale, displaying assimilated jazz elements, is a lightning-swift toccata, formidable in its difficulty and of rather incredible bravura. It is marred, for me, at least, by its excessive vehemence; it struck me as being a little too obviously designed for display. However, like the entire work, it is a piece engendered by creative inspiration and not under any circumstances by the smell of the lamp. Mr. Foss' playing was brilliant throughout, and he was given splendid accompaniment by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin, who had the difficult duty of stepping in at the last moment due to Mr. Munch's illness.

The rest of the concert, that is the Overture to "Der Freischuetz" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony, neither of which seems in need for further support in this department, were competently played as always. The program next week offers Gregor Piatigorsky in Haydn's Cello Concerto and Strauss' "Don Quixote," Franck's Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" opening the concert.

HEMPSTEAD, L. I., N. Y.
NASSAU REVIEW-STAR
NOV 3 - 1951

Boston Pops A Big Success In Sub Show

By JOHN LESTER

The world - famous Boston Pops Orchestra subbed for the equally famous Boston symphony last night, NBC-TV, 8 to 8:30, when symphony conductor Charles Munch was suddenly taken ill.

The Pops group, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, thereby made an unexpected world premiere on television and it was an event that cried out for repetition.

This was real television with four (my count) cameras covering the 60 - odd piece orchestra from every possible angle and with an intelligence born of a sound knowledge of music, the orchestra and Maestro Fiedler. All those who there is no cause for alarm, nor will there be. Nov 3 which may on the whole be the most original movement of the three, even if it is not as well integrated. The second movement starts off in a manner faintly suggestive of Debussy. Cool woodwinds give the music the character of an eclogue, and contrast is furnished by an inviting section that might bear the indication "Tempo di fox trot." There are jazzy touches in the finale, too. In fact, in the piece as a whole, the rhythmic interest exceeds the melodic. Mr. Foss works with snippets of melody, some of them quite arresting, rather than will long-breathed tunes. The orchestration throughout is highly ingenious, with many striking tonal effects.

The Concerto is extremely difficult to play and the composer handled it with true virtuosity. You even suspected that his performance had a lot to do with putting the piece across. In the hands of a more phlegmatic pianist it might prove less engrossing. Admirable was the support furnished by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra and the part that the orchestera plays is an important one.

Save for the fact that the horns behaved badly in their opening quartet, Weber's Overture received an effective performance and the Brahms Symphony was given a sound reading though one was reminded at times of a statement made long ago that Brahms' orchestration is often muddy and hoarse. Only a conductor preoccupied with enphony can dispel that impression.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The sudden illness of Charles Munch put associate conductor Richard Burgin in charge of the current pair of Symphony Concerts and also occasioned an unavoidable change in the program. However, interest had centred in the American premiere of Lukas Foss' Second Piano Concerto, which the composer flew from Rome to play; and that much of the original list remained, together with the opening number, Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz." It was after intermission that things were different yesterday afternoon and will be this evening. Having had insufficient time both to learn and rehearse the Foss Concerto and prepare Debussy's early "Printemps," in which Mr. Foss and Bernard Zighera were to play the two piano parts, and that composer's "Iberia," Mr. Burgin put in their place the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

The first two movements of the new Concerto, which had its first hearing in Venice last month, and is dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, appear to be more successful than the third. Had Mr. Foss sustained himself at that level and provided a finale that was consistently, rather than occasionally, exciting and compelling, he might have turned that much-to-be-desired trick of writing a concerto to which the virtuosi would be attracted. Some of the old favorites are being worn pretty thin, but no new piece in the form seems capable of taking their place in the affection of the public.

Mr. Foss is still young enough to be influenced by his elders. There is a good deal of Stravinsky, rhythmically and otherwise, in the first movement and some in the last.

TV. This program will be fed to th NBC network through statio WBZ-TV Boston.

Three cameras will be used to di rect the program, one in the rear o the second balcony, one in a righ hand stage box, and one on a dolly on the stage with the orchestra Nine microphones will be placed i various parts of the Opera House To facilitate the directions fo switching cameras during the tele cast, WBZ-TV director Tom Saw yer is memorizing as much of th musical score as possible.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 6 - 1951

MUSIC

All-Vivaldi Program Played at Cambridge Collegium Musicum

By JOHN WM. RILEY

An all-Vivaldi program, played by the Cambridge Collegium Musicum in Sanders Theatre last night, proved one of the most entrancing concerts this enterprising group has given. There was a capacity audience a fact which spoke well both for the reputation of the players and the egood taste of the listeners.

For a good many years Antonio Vivaldi has been noted chiefly as an "influence" on the main stream of music, rather than a major figure. Many works of Bach, for instance, which have attained a fire place in the repertory, were arrangements for new instruments or combinations of original works of Vivaldi. Latter day scholarship has unearthed the origins of the Bach works. And the recent publication of the complete work of Vivaldi has presented them as the composer conveived them.

Thus, the opening number of last night's program, the Concerto Grosso in D Minor, once known as an organ concerto by the eldest of Bach's sons, was discovered to be an arrangement by J. S. Bach of the Vivaldi Concerto. So, the Concerto for Violins which closed the program, was arranged by Bach for four harpsichords.

The program also included a Sonata in F for Cello and Continuo in which Samuel Mayes played the solo part with marvelous tonal lustre and technical precision, a Concerto in B-Flat for Violin, Cello, Strings and Continuo, and the "Bullfinch" Concerto for Flute in which Philip Kaplan earned prolonged and warm applause.

The Cambridge Collegium Musicum—Erwin Bodky, Wolfe Wolfinsohn and Mr. Mayes—was assisted by members of the Boston Symphony: Mr. Kaplan, Gaston Elcus, Paul Federovsky, Harry Kobialka, Eugene Lehner and Josepf Zimbler. Their playing, individually and collectively, was neat, bright and nicely balanced. The next program in this series will be given Monday evening, Nov. 19.

Week-End Symphony Concerts Feature Composer as Soloist

By Harold Rogers

Playing with brilliance, Lukas Foss was heard yesterday afternoon in the American première of his Piano Concerto No. 2, a work of major dimensions and, considered in the light of his own musical development, of major importance.

The young composer, erstwhile official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrote the concerto during the past year while abroad on a Prix de Rome. He was at the keyboard for its initial performance with the Orchestre Fenice at the final concert of the Venice Festival on Oct. 7. Last week he flew here for the current Symphony Hall hearings.

Foss's three-movement concerto utilizes classical economy, romantic structure, and a contemporary idiom that now bears his own distinctive trademark. This idiom distantly recalls Paul Hindemith, with whom Foss studied; but one is more aware of certain Stravinskian overtones—the interweaving of melodic lines, some elliptical phrases, and impulsive rhythms.

* * *

By and large, however, the style is Foss. References to other composers aid the reader, but they tend to pigeon hole a composer, and Lukas Foss is far too talented and original to be pigeon holed.

The opening Allegro sostenuto is introduced by several dramatic trumpet calls, after which a mood of foreboding is set up, mainly through staccato excitement and an underlying rhythmic urgency. Through the technique of tension and release the composer piles up a series of climaxes—a form that tends to be disparate but which holds the listener's attention.

Several lyrical statements from the piano, played with simple eloquence, were far too few. Though the cadenza was a technical tour de force, one was more impressed by the great surcharged chords than by a display of pianism.

* * *

The second movement—Adagietto—comes in serene contrast. The singing nocturne-like theme is accompanied by something like a casual promenade. The pianist made the most of these poetic moments—moments that were lost in the middle section when an accelerated tension evolved, but were regained during the recapitulation.

The final Allegro vivace has the character of a scherzo. A dazzling toccata weaves its rippling way through the colorful fabric and at times fans out into something that might be related to jazz. Mr. Foss uses the percussion sparingly but effectively. The piano soon becomes what the composer refers to as a "galloping horse." After a titanic cadenza the concerto comes to a brassy conclusion. Mr. Foss as a composer demonstrates an inventive mind, artistic restraint, and the ability to steer clear of the banal.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor, officiated yesterday in the absence of Charles Munch, who was indisposed. He opened the concert with a stirring performance of Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz" and brought it to a close with a fine Teutonic reading of the Brahms Fourth Symphony. The latter replaced the Debussy "Printemps" and "Ibéria" origin-given splendid accompaniment by [25]

STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
ADVANCE
NOV 3 - 1951

Radio and Television

Boston Pops Makes Hit As Symphony Substitute

By JOHN LESTER

The world-famous Boston Pops Orchestra subbed for the equally famous Boston Symphony last night, NBC-TV, 8 to 8:30, when Symphony Conductor Charles Munch was suddenly taken ill.

The Pops group, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, thereby made an unexpected world premiere on television and it was an event that cried out for repetition.

This was real television with four (My Count) cameras covering the 60-odd piece orchestra from every possible angle and with an intelligence born of a sound knowledge of music, the orchestra and Fiedler. All those who have declared in the past that photographing an orchestra in concert in this way is "static" television and, therefore, to be avoided should give up once and for all.

This was an excellent half-hour of TV, excellent in every way.

• • •

FIEDLER opened the premiere program with "The Princess Elizabeth March," in honor of Princess Elizabeth, of England, currently visiting in this country. "Espana" followed and then an "encore" number for which the Pops is noted, "The Syncopated Clock".

After commentary by Ben Grauer and a brief Community Chest Appeal, the program concluded with the heavier selections, a medley of Richard Strauss waltzes and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkeries".

Bravo, Boston Pops.
Bravo, Arthur Fiedler.
Bravo, NBC-TV.
And tonight Toscanini with more of the same.

• • •

IT WAS quite a week for the more classical things on television. In addition to last night's presentation of the Boston Pops Orchestra, NBC-TV also presented Offenbach's "RSVP" Thursday from 11 P.M. to midnight. This was the second in the current series of operas in English under the combined production-direction of Samuel Chotzinoff and Peter Herman Adler.

I can't say I liked it as well as the first opera of this series, "Pagliacci", although beyond that I won't go since the great Toscanini has already chuckled his over-all approval of "RSVP", and I don't intend to lock horns with him.

Originally titled "Mr. Cauliflower", "RSVP" is one of the 90 musical theatre works with which Offenbach diverted Parisian audiences late in the last century. Neither its libretto nor its score are momentous in any respect, nor was either so intended. Actually, "RSVP" is a satire or burlesque on the typical Italian opera of the period, in which the reluctant father of the desirable soprano is the "heavy," and the penniless musician is the tenor and constant object of his wrath.

As a light musical and comic divertissment, then, it was well done in every way (Kirk Browning is an excellent TV director), although nobody, not even Toscanini, can tell me the opening wasn't much too talky.

Larry Weber, as Stuart Offenbach, the son of the composer, was supposed to establish the light mood of the peice but I think a much better purpose would have been instructed to briefly relate pertinent facts about Offenbach and "RSVP", which, for example, got its first public showing in this country Thursday night.

The cast included Virginia Haskins, soprano; Paul Franke, tenor; George Irving, baritone, and Paul Ukena, among others, all, as Toscanini has already attested, good voices.

JAMAICA, N. Y.
LONG ISLAND PRESS
NOV 3 - 1951

Radio and Television

Fiedler's 'Pops' Pinch-Hits; Rates Bravos

By JOHN LESTER

The world-famous Boston Pops Orchestra subbed for the equally famous Boston Symphony last night, NBC-TV, 8 to 8:30, when symphony conductor Charles Munch was suddenly taken ill.

The "Pops" group, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, made an unexpected world premiere on television. It was an event that cried out for repetition.

This was real television with four (my count) cameras covering the 60-odd piece orchestra from every possible angle and with an intelligence born of a sound knowledge of music, the orchestra and Maestro Fiedler. All those who have declared in the past that photographing an orchestra in concert in this way is "static" television and, therefore is to be avoided should give up once and for all.

This was an excellent half-hour of TV, in every way.

Fiedler opened the premiere program with "The Princess Elizabeth March," in honor of Princess Elizabeth's current visit in this country. "Aspana" followed and then an "encore" number for which the Pops is noted, "The Syncopated Clock."

After commentary by Ben Grauer and a brief Red Feather appeal, the program concluded with the heavier selections, a medley of Richard Strauss waltzes and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkeries."

Bravo, Boston Pops.
Bravo, Arthur Fiedler.
Bravo, NBC-TV.
And tonight, Toscanini with more of the same.

It was quite a week for more classical things on television.

In addition to last night's presentation of the Boston Pops Orchestra, NBC-TV also presented Offenbach's "RSVP" Thursday from 11 P. M. to midnight. This was the second in the current series of operas in English under the combined production-direction of Samuel Chotzinoff and Peter Herman Adler.

I can't say I liked it as well as the first opera of this series, "Pagliacci", although I won't go beyond that since the great Toscanini has already chuckled his over-all approval of "RSVP," and I don't intend to lock horns with him.

Originally titled "Mr. Cauliflower," "RSVP" is one of the 90 musical theatre works with which Offenbach diverted Parisian audiences late in the last century. Neither its libretto nor its score are momentous in any respect, nor was either so intended. Actually, "RSVP" is a satire or burlesque on the typical Italian opera of the period, in which the reluctant father of the desirable soprano is the "heavy," and the penniless musician is the tenor and constant object of his wrath.

As a light musical and comic divertissment, however, it was well done in every way.

TODAY'S TIPS

Eastern televiewers can see the Illinois-Michigan game via NBC-TV today at 2:15.

Toscanini's opening concert of the season will be on NBC-TV at 6:30 P. M.

Jimmy Durante tops the "All-Star Revue" tonight at 8, NBC-TV. Margaret Truman is his guest.

Try a new show tonight, "The Whistling Wizard," with the Baird Puppets, CBS-TV, 11 to 11:30 P.M.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 4 - 1951

Symphony to Have 5 Open Rehearsals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will again open five of its rehearsals to the public in the course of the season for the benefit of the many students in the schools and colleges of greater Boston who are unable to hear the orchestra in a sold-out season. They will be the final rehearsal in each of five weeks on November 29, December 13, January 9, February 28 and March 27 (Thursdays, except Wednesday, January 9), beginning at 7:30. Charles Munch will conduct each except the first at which Pierre Monteux will be the guest. The soloist of the week will be heard in some cases, and February 28 devoted to Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with chorus and orchestra. These are actual rehearsals in which the conductor stops the orchestra to give directions and repeat passages

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Munch Ill, Burgin Leads American Premiere of Foss' Piano Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch came down with a touch of grippe, so Richard Burgin had to take over the conducting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight. This meant he had to absorb in a hurry the whole Lukas Foss' Second Piano Concerto, due for its American premiere with the composer as soloist.

Nor, according to memory, had Mr. Burgin conducted Debussy here before, so it was reasonable to change the program, replacing "Printemps" and "Iberia" with Brahms' Fourth Symphony, a familiar repertoire piece. Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz" remains as scheduled.

In addition to his solid competence as conductor, Mr. Burgin has that special and valuable gift of being able to step in on an emergency and carry off a concert with great elan and success. I have known him to do it time and again. Yesterday was one of them. The novelty seemed to go very well, and Weber and Brahms were thoroughly satisfying, both as orchestral execution and interpretation.

Written in Italy

Lukas Foss' Second Piano Concerto, written in Italy this past year while he was working on a Prix de Rome, is essentially the best concert-symphonic piece he has yet done. It shows increased salience, clarity and organization of ideas, a settling down of his personal style, a brilliant advance in orchestration and combining piano with orchestra.

Where the Concerto needs revision is in its length, which is about one-third too much. Like many another composer, Mr. Foss was tempted by the persuasive devil of over-development and over-elaboration. That is no cause for alarm, but it does distort the musical architecture and asks too much of an audience's patience. It has the further effect of slowing down the progress of the music, interrupting its prevailing motion, and making you think that the work, for the moment, is up a blind alley.

Shorter the Better

This is a prevailingly light concerto, most attractive rhythmically, harmonically and pianistically, and full of melody. It has, too, an occasional touch of easy-going popular mood. But the whole point of this manner is fine adjustment of length to ideas. In general, the shorter the better.

I think it happens with every composer that he just has to write at least one piece, no matter how it turns out. While the work by itself may not win him immortal glory, the fact of its creation has advanced him, technically and expressively, on his creative road. With Lukas Foss, I suspect that this Second Piano Concerto is just such a crucial score. It may not be a masterpiece, but I am certain it has done something for his creative process. He played the solo part nimbly all the way, and with spectacular effect in certain pages. He richly deserved the cordial reception which resulted.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 4 - 1951

Boston Symphony Rehearsals Again Open to Students

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will again open five of its rehearsals to the public in the course of the season for the benefit of the many students in the schools and colleges of Greater Boston who are unable to hear the orchestra in a sold-out season.

They will be the final rehearsal in each of five weeks on Nov. 29, Dec. 13, Jan. 9, Feb. 28 and March 27 (Thursdays, except Wednesday, Jan. 9), beginning at 7:30. Charles Munch will conduct all but the first at which Pierre Monteux will be the guest. The soloist of the week will be heard in some cases, the rehearsal of Feb. 28 will be devoted to Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with chorus and orchestra.

WAKEFIELD, MASS.
ITEM
NOV 2 - 1951

To Televise Boston Symphony

Tonight at 8 o'clock, WBZ-TV will televise the "Boston Symphony Orchestra" directed by its regular conductor Charles Munch, from the Boston Opera House.

This will be the first time that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the leading orchestras of the world, has been televised from Boston.

The program will be produced by Ernest Walling from the National Broadcasting Company and will be directed by Tom Sawyer of WBZ-

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 1 - 1951

New Federal Tax Rise Takes Effect Today

Starting today, federal taxes go up another notch. The personal income tax felt by the majority of people in the form of withholding tax is being upped about 12 per cent; the excise tax on cigarettes goes up another cent; the gas tax a half cent; taxes on liquor, automobiles, household equipment and other articles get sizable boosts.

While anything that reduces income and raises prices today is felt poignantly, the individual who depends on his pay is taking it on the chin less heavily than the corporations and those who derive some or all of the income from dividends. The increase in the corporation tax and the imposition of an excess-profits tax have already had a marked downward effect on the net earnings of companies making their quarterly reports.

There is, however, a reduction along some lines that is partial compensation: Taxes on electricity, baby lotions, and house trailers are abolished, as is the 20 per cent admission tax to high school athletic contests, most benefit performances for churches, educational organizations, or charitable institutions, operatic performances and symphony concerts. This last will be of particular interest to Berkshire County because of the Tanglewood Festival.

There has been much criticism of Congress for failing to raise more than half the amount asked for by President Truman. Congress seems to us much less vulnerable on this point than on others; its behavior here indicated recognition that taxes are reaching the saturation point. They cannot be increased any more without harming the economy or arousing strong resentment. The President and Congress, Democrats and Republicans, all are to blame. There is much talk of economy, but every item has its congressional bloc defending it; the only really devoted worker for economy in either house is Senator Douglas of Illinois—who got nowhere. There must be room in non-military expenditures, such as the rivers and harbors appropriations, for savings. As for the military budget itself, if we are to remain solvent, it must be kept within bounds. The military has little idea of money and the word "enough" is not in its vocabulary.

But with combined local, state and federal taxes in many cases amounting to nearly a third of total income, it is time to call a halt

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
NOV 3 - 1951

Open Rehearsals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will again open five of its rehearsals to the public in the course of the season for the benefit of the many students in the schools and colleges of greater Boston who are unable to hear the Orchestra in a sold-out season. They will be the final rehearsal in each of five weeks in November 29, December 13, January 9, February 28 and March 27 (Thursdays, except Wedesday, January 9), beginning at 7:30. Charles Munch will conduct each except the first at which Pierre Monteux will be the guest. The soloist of the week will be heard in some cases, and February 28 devoted to Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with chorus and orchestra. These are actual rehearsals in which the conductor stops the orchestra to give directions and repeat passages. Tickets for the series are being distributed through the schools and colleges. Any seats remaining untaken will be sold to the public after November 15.

[26]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the continued indisposition of Charles Munch, Richard Burgin is conducting the current pair of Symphony concerts; and this time only one number of the program has been changed. Instead of beginning yesterday with the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Redemption," the associate conductor put in its place Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," that unaccountably had not been played at the regular concerts since 1936. After it came, as originally scheduled, Haydn's Cello Concerto in D major and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Gregor Piatigorsky playing the solo cello part in both and Joseph de Pasquale joining him as solo viola in the tone poem of Strauss.

If all concerts under Mr. Burgin's direction could proceed as smoothly and to such generally happy outcome as this one, we need not ask for a better conductor. It was good to hear the orchestra playing once more in a fashion so completely relaxed. This was our Boston Symphony not a changeling. And of course it was good to have Mr. Piatigorsky. Richard Strauss himself said years ago that whenever "Don Quixote" was played he wished it would be possible for Mr. Piatigorsky to assume the role of chief protagonist. No one seems to understand it as completely as he does; no one else is capable of making any one of the countless musical and musico-dramatic details so compelling.

This is not just a piece of music; it is a tonal drama, without stage or actors, but a drama, nevertheless. Yesterday its progress was vividly conveyed by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, by Mr. Piatigorsky as the Don, and Mr. De Pasquale as his tubby squire, Sancho Panza. Not in a long time have we heard so fine a performance of "Don Quixote." By the way, the program book was in error in saying that it was Mr. Piatigorsky who played the solo cello here in this work in March, 1950.

Apparently it has not been settled to everyone's satisfaction that Haydn, not Anton Kraft, was the author of this D major Concerto, but whoever composed it (and it probably was Haydn), it is a charming piece, and yesterday it went delightfully. Delightful, too, was the performance of Mendelssohn's Overture. With Mendelssohn we must now pick and choose, but certain things are too good to be passed up. We have not heard "Fingal's Cave" at a Symphony concert since 1933 or "The Fair Melusine," Mendelssohn's own favorite among his overtures, since 1906. I don't suppose anybody plays the ophicleide today, though Symphony Hall has one in its collection of ancient and obsolete instruments. However, the big bass tuba, used yesterday in Mendelssohn's Overture, does not produce the effect that the composer had in mind. Its tone is too heavy, for one thing, and it cannot so well suggest the donkey's bray of Bottom.

MUSICIANS GUESTS

Two

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
NOV 15 1951

Boston Honors Koussevitzky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Charles Munch dedicated the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Carnegie Hall last night to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. The program opened appropriately with Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music (K. 477) and included Honegger's Fifth Symphony and Tchaikowsky's Sixth, both aptly fitting the occasion.

The Honegger work belonged to this program as one of the works written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Though not quite the equal of the French composer's Third and Fourth Symphonies, it sustains interest and creates atmosphere. Predominantly somber and disturbed, it reflects Honegger's feelings about the world in which he lives. The writing is artful and communicative.

A singularly moving interpretation of the Tchaikovsky found Munch and the orchestra in excellent form. The concert was quite up to standard; that is to say in the top rank of symphonic organizations.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 11 1951

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Until music got into the romantic phase in the early 19th century, it was marked by a certain conformity and uniformity, and much the same thing has happened in our own new-classic day, one of those swings of the pendulum that keep art alive. Too much of anything, whether classicism or romanticism, requires a corrective, and it has never failed to appear when it was most needed. To get back to this matter of uniformity, it was not always easy in the centuries preceding the 19th to distinguish not only the music of one composer from another but even to spot the country that produced it. You could confuse many musicians by shuffling phonograph records of the English Purcell, the French Couperin, the Italian Corelli (or Vivaldi) and the German Handel. I won't say there are no differences, but they are differences of degree rather than of kind. And the same thing is true of the music of such periods as the Gothic, the Medieval, the Renaissance, the Rococo and even the classic. Mozart sounds a good deal like Haydn, and Boccherini, or Gretry, like the two of them.

* * *

What really happened in the 19th century was not just romanticism, it was individualism, unless that be merely two names for the same thing, and individualism not merely of men, but of whole nations. There soon came to be marked differences between the music of Germany, France and Italy, and when the other nations got into the picture they had their collective idioms, while the several composers of those lands had their personal ones.

* * *

All this gave an immense richness and variety to music, a variety that is not esteemed by our new musical abstractionists, who think it is quite okay if you cannot tell from the sound of a piece where the composer hails from. Well, perhaps it is. We were due for a change and we got it.

* * *

What started me on this tack was the publication in the Boston Symphony program book of Nov. 9 and 4 of an extract from the recently published diary of Romain Rolland, in which the eminent French author, who was a musicologist on the side, tells of Richard Strauss' first encounter with the "Pelleas and Melisande" of Debussy. This was in 1907. Strauss had gone to Paris to hear his "Salome," and while in the French capital he attended a performance of "Pelleas," which had been produced four years before and which he knew only from the piano score.

* * *

Strauss and Debussy were at that time not only the leading composers of their respective countries; they were the top composers of the world. What we call modernism hasn't put in an appearance and the respective leaders of romanticism and impressionism had no rivals but each other. Nevertheless these two were poles apart in their esthetic approach. The processes of nationalism and individualism had finally resulted in the advent of two masters who had nothing in common, unless it was a certain predisposition toward illustrative rather than absolute music, that was part of the spirit of the time.

* * *

Strauss was forthright. His "Salome," like some of the tone poems that had preceded it, was full of blood and thunder. He used a large orchestra for all it was worth. He courted literalism. He was not afraid of a banal phrase, a commonplace turn of melody. His harmony had a lot of the Old Adam in it. Debussy, on the other hand was all for reticence and understatement, for orchestral half tints. His melodies were elusive, his harmonies subtle and strange. He hated the commonplace with every fibre of his being. Quite naturally the reticences of "Pelleas" left Strauss mystified and cold. "But," he said to Rolland. "I, I am a musician, and I understand nothing." He wanted action in the music as well as on the stage, and liked best the parts where the music asserts itself, as if the scene where Colaud pulls Melisande about by the hair. Yes, it was all "fine" but he desired more than fineness. If he had written it, he would have done it otherwise. Well, we can be thankful that he did not and also that Debussy did not try to do a "Rosenkavalier."

* * *

Debussy, as it happened, knew more of Strauss than Strauss did of Debussy. He was likewise the more open minded of the two. Since he was for a time a practicing critic, he has left us his verdict on certain works by his great contemporary. If he recoiled from their excesses, he, at least, recognized the genius behind them.

* * *

Since we will hear the tone poem from Mr. Monteux at next week's Symphony Concerts, I would like to quote, as a masterpiece of "impressionistic" criticism, Debussy's summing up of "Till Eulenspiegel": "This piece might almost be called 'An hour of original music in a lunatic asylum.' The clarinets leap in frenzied curves, the trumpets everlastingly choke and the horns, forestalling a latent sneeze, hasten to rejoin: 'God bless you!' while a big drum goes boom! boom! apparently emphasizing the antics of the clowns. One wants either to shout with laughter or to shriek with pain. Then follows the startling discovery that everything is in the right place; for, if the double-basses blew down their bows and the trombones fiddled on their brass tubes with an imaginary bow, or if Nikisch perched himself on the knee of a programme seller, it would not be in the least surprising. Meanwhile there is no gainsaying the fact that genius is shown at times in this work, above all in the amazing orchestral assurance, the mad rhythm that sweeps us along from beginning to end and forces us to share in all the hero's merry pranks."

* * *

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 10 1951

MUSIC

Piatigorsky Symphony Soloist in Strauss and Haydn; Burgin Conducts

By CYRUS DURGIN

Gregor Piatigorsky, undoubtedly the biggest cellist in the world, and one of the finest, is soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week in the Haydn Concerto and "Don Quixote," by Richard Strauss. Richard Burgin conducts in place of Charles Munch, still not sufficiently recovered from illness to take on two concerts, though he was slated to appear briefly on last evening's telecast from Symphony Hall. The first number of the program has been changed from the symphonic piece out of Cesar Franck's "Redemption" to the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture.

Yesterday's concert was quite satisfactory, from start to finish, characterized by admirable response from the orchestra to Mr. Burgin's demands, and a general polish of execution and style which for the thousandth (or hundred thousandth!) time bespoke the calibre of Boston's tonal glory and the stature of Mr. Burgin. Yet, in all exactness, these performances must be specified as having been highly superior rather than spectacular, for there were no virtuoso fireworks, orchestrally speaking.

Mr. Piatigorsky's interpretation of the enormously clever and difficult score by Strauss has become well-known here over the years. Also over the years, I suspect, it has become a little casual, even a little careless, for there were times yesterday when Mr. Piatigorsky's phrasing did not coincide with what Strauss marked in the score. Not that there was any real distortion, just untidiness in little things.

The same was true to a degree in the Haydn Concerto: now and again a conspicuous note that fell short of the pitch, and an occasional minute but perceptible difference in tempo between orchestra and soloist. Now this may be pettifogging criticism, but it is added for the sake of the record and because from Mr. Piatigorsky, one of the world's great masters of the cello, near-perfection is expected.

At any rate, all his old vigor and eloquence were present, together with that rich, satiny tone that he can make thin as a reed or wide as a church door. The "role" of Sancho Panza was done superbly by Joseph De Pasquale, the Boston Symphony's excellent first viola. There was abundant applause for all hands, the afternoon long.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 15 1951

Boston Symphony

Season's First Concert Here in Memory of Koussevitzky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Charles Munch; first New York concert of the season last night; program in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Masonic Funeral Music (K. 477).....Mozart
Symphony No. 5.....Honegger
Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique).....Tchaikovsky

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall was also its first here since Serge Koussevitzky's death last June, and Charles Munch and his musicians commemorated his eminent predecessor with an eloquently appropriate program. Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music is a suitable memorial tribute to any great musician. The two symphonies which followed both had an association with Dr. Koussevitzky; the Honegger work was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and the Tchaikovsky Pathetic Symphony was often played here by this orchestra during the quarter-century of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship. Mr. Munch asked the audience to stand in silence after the performance of the Mozart work.

Memorable playing and communicative interpretation characterized the concert throughout its course. Mr. Munch evidently admires Honegger's fifth symphony, heard last night for the third time here in nine months. It deserves repetition, on its own merits as well as on the general principle that any contemporary work of consequence should be given a good chance of winning its way with its audiences; for the reviewer, yesterday's second hearing gave a greater appreciation of its merits. These include inventiveness, clarity of structure and scoring, a wide range of color and, in spite of the prevailing elegiac purport of the music, emotional variety. There is pungent dissonance, especially at the outset, but also lyricism and, along with the expressive unity of the work as a whole, a contrast of stressful and contemplative moods.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony called attention to the fact that its continuing appeal does not depend solely on its immediate emotional persuasiveness, but on the merits of the music itself as a masterpiece of individual tragic expression. Mr. Munch's interpretation was convincing, carefully wrought in dynamic, expressive and structural detail, but also spacious and large in scale; its emotional force was undeniable and passion and tragedy were present, but not beyond control. The orchestra's playing observed its best standards of tone quality, clarity, balance and responsiveness in all three works of this well chosen, coherent and contrasted program.

[27]

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 13 1951

Munch Leads Symphony At Bushnell Hall

Boston Orchestra Is First to Play Here In 1951-52 Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, was presented in the first concert of the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium Monday night. The program:

Fantastic Symphony ..... Berlioz
Leonore Overture, No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Death And Transfiguration ..... Strauss

Charles Munch remains our most baffling conductor. He will do you up a work so handsomely and right, as unto the Queen's taste. And he will follow it with another so heroically out of focus that it is hard to believe both performances arose in the same head and heart.

This he did again in leading the Boston Symphony at the Bushnell Memorial last night. His reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" brought the house up cheering, it was done with such brilliance, such discernment, such sensibility. On the orchestra, it was transparent, resonant.

In contrast to Serge Koussevitzky's monodic approach, all parts in the writing were given free, clear voice. The detailing Mr. Munch worked out with special care, affection and justice, and yet all were kept in perspective. In temper, you thought that ah! here was the elegance, the wonderful balance between reserve and affectiveness which constitute the best tradition in French music-making. And although certainly Mr. Munch was not averse to flash and crash in the right, Berlioan spots, one felt that he relished most the reflective, melancholic and delicate sentiments more, and that was all to the good, for Berlioz and the listener.

Stuff, and Nonsense

It was, in short, the sort of reading for which a conductor can become famous, and the orchestra, once over the occupational ailments that come in opening cold on a symphony, gave it brilliant performance. In return, the audience whipped up a bravura performance of its own, beating its paws and firing off "Bravo's." Here, everybody said, was stuff, real stuff.

Well, whether it was the reception that put the subsequent tabasco in Mr. Munch's blood, or a hangover of the Berlioz spirit, or genuine conviction is of course hard to say, but his playing of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture was something right off the deep end. It was a frenzy of exaggerated contrasts in tempi, in dynamics, in seatiments. So slow were the slow passages that the orchestra continually rushed the beat; as players inevitably will do when they instinctively disagree with it. And so high were the fast tempi that the orchestra skidded around every corner Certainly there is nothing about Beethoven's work that should make a conductor leap up and down on the podium, or shout loud enough to be heard back in the house.

All the Transfiguration

The Strauss saw Mr. Munch in a continuing state of molten eruption. It is obviously a work which he feels extraordinarily deeply. In the first place, he switched the program around last night, so that the "Death and Transfiguration" should be last, and not the Berlioz. He is reported to have said that the Strauss poem is so "solemn" that nothing else could properly be played after it.

(Editor's Note This paragraph is inserted after this piece has already been written, to accommodate a later, contradictory report which says that Mr. Munch who has recently been suffering a virus infection, placed the symphony first on the program as he felt his indisposition might not allow him to complete the entire concert.)

And in the second place, his own reactions to the music, even as he evoked it from the orchestra, were more than patent in his gestures and expressions. With agony etched in his face, he begged the players for "heart" in the sadder passages and clutched at his own breast. And when the music was transfigured, it shone in his face and with happy smiles he sought to enkindle the safe seraphic response from his men.

That it was a perfervid, incandescent and huge performance of "Death And Transfiguration" was obvious to eye and ear. But the task of making it one to the spirit also, was as far as this listener went a losing one. All Mr. Munch's effort could not disabuse me of the feeling that the Strauss work is horrifyingly meretricious, garish and mawkish. The orchestra played it very badly in all points of precision, especially those of ensemble and of pitch. Whether they had been driven to despair by the enormity of Mr. Munch's demands or by Strauss, we shall never know. T.H.P.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

NOV 15 1951

Music

Koussevitzky Honored by Symphony

By ROBERT BAGAR.

This extra-heavy symphonic week brought us last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, for its first local concert of the season. As you might expect—I know I did—the program at Carnegie Hall was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

To open proceedings Mr. Munch had selected the Mozart "Masonic Funeral Music," a work composed as a memorial to a pair of fellow Freemasons, the Duke Georg August von Mecklenburg Strelitz and Franz Count Esterhazy von Galantha.

There was an additional ritual of earlier tribute, this to the memory of Natlia Koussevitzky, the playing of Honegger's Fifth Symphony which he wrote for the Koussevitzky Foundation. It was given its premiere by the Bostonians last season.

Has Compelling Drive.

This composition reminded one of the Honegger of "Pacific 231" in some respects. For it has a compelling drive, particularly in the second and final movements. Also, this forging quality of the work, besides its considerable dissonance (though never objectionable), recalls Stravinsky's "Perouchka" music. There is no resemblance at all, insofar as the actual notes and harmonic structure are concerned. Rather it is the spirit, the sizzling, electrical character of musical figurations that brought to my mind a partial similarity to the pieces mentioned.

Its performance, at any rate, was an ingratiating one, though the large audience, applauding it well, did not blow, if you'll pardon the expression, its collective top over it.

* * *

"Tyl Ulenspiegel"—a Ballet.

Richard Strauss' justly celebrated tone poem came up in a balletic version by George Balanchine at the City Center last evening. Also its title rather flaunted an uncustomary spelling.

The scenario is based on a novel by Charles de Coster, in which Tyl is conceived as a liberator of Flanders, then suffering under the yoke of Spain. In a word, with Jerome Robbins the inimitable, to impersonate Tyl, the ballet is a super-brilliant tour de force for his gymnastic and comic abilities.

He duels, he plays pranks on high persons and low, in fact, he begins a feud when a mere child with Philip II of Spain. All this, with the scintillating music of Strauss, the remarkable dancing by the New York City Ballet, and magnificent settings and costumes by Esteban Frances, not to exclude Jean Rosenthal's effective lighting, added up to a thoroughly enjoyable evening in the dance theater, Leon Barzin conducted the orchestra beautifully.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fifth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto in D ..... Haydn
"Don Quixote," op. 35 ..... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"Well," said a fleeting acquaintance as we all filed out of Symphony Hall after the concert yesterday afternoon, "today we can all go home with a smile."

She was, I am sure, reproaching me for having thoroughly enjoyed Lukas Foss' Piano Concerto last week, and this program, containing as it did three pieces everybody has heard a dozen times before, offered the ear no contemporary musical agitations, whatever. So her home-going smile was doubtless quite natural although, in view of the fact that Don Quixote had quietly expired before her eyes and ears only a moment or two before, a little unseemly.

I say before her eyes as well as ears because the role of Don Quixote, in Strauss' familiar theme and variations, was again being played by Gregor Piatigorsky, who combines his great technical gift as a cellist with an equal gift as an actor. Indeed, he conveys every misadventure of the poor deranged Don with an astonishing range of facial and physical registrations.

When the Don gallops into a flock of sheep believing them to be the savage hordes of the Emperor Alifanfaron and is rewarded for his pains by being stoned by the shepherds, Mr. Piatigorsky's countenance reflects the valor of the mission. When Quixote is knocked senseless by the Pilgrims, whom he imagined to be a band of ruffians, Mr. Piatigorsky's pained amazement at the turn of events is marvelous to behold. And when at last the sorry knight's mind clears and he meditates peacefully on his demise in an elegiac D major, and dies, the cellist's own collapse is the saddest thing imaginable.

FOREMOST CELLIST

Obviously, having been doing this famed piece for years and being, in the first place, the foremost solo cellist of the day, Mr. Piatigorsky doesn't do all this at the expense of his musical performance. His technique appears so effortless (save when a little effort lends a little excitement to the occasion), so schooled, so meticulous, so experienced and so all-encompassing, that it is easy to assume playing the cello is a relatively simple operation. This is anything but true; no solo instrument but the French horn is so difficult to manage and, if improperly managed, so revealing of its player's deficiencies, as the cello. So Mr. Piatigorsky's playing is the last word in contemporary achievement.

The trouble is there isn't a wide enough repertoire for the cello to stimulate and inspire a man of Mr. Piatigorsky's technical and re-creative equipment. How many times he has played this work, as well as the Haydn Concerto that preceded it, would be a little embarrassing to ask. Yet there is little reward in bringing out contemporary works; nobody cares much about hearing them and, assuming they weren't terribly well liked, Mr. Piatigorsky would doubtless take the blame. Inasmuch as the fortunes for the virtuoso solist are such that he can go in no direction but down, he would be ill advised to risk a contemporary concerto that, in any case, would hardly employ the instrument in its great capacity to sing.

The wonder, then, is that Mr. Piatigorsky never fails to inform the same old things with all the ardor and urgency of a man who is bringing them out for the first time. It is the mark of his stature that he never lets down, never conveys ennui, never ceases to find and project something new and vital. It may be added that Joseph De Pasquale, doing the viola role of Sancho, never played more beautifully; his Sancho was in every respect the equal of his pathetic master. And it may be further added that both the Haydn and the Strauss were orchestrally perfection under Mr. Burgin's self-effacing direction. The Overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," though thrice-familiar as a Pops offering, was given a magical performance, incidentally. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on the 23d under Pierre Monteux.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 15 1951

Boston Symphony Plays at Carnegie

By JOHN BRIGGS

Last evening Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played their first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. It was the orchestra's first appearance here since the death of Mr. Munch's great predecessor, the irascible and beloved Serge Koussevitzky. Accordingly, Mr. Munch requested orchestra and audience to rise in silent tribute to the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky following the performance of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music."

The black-clad musicians and audience stood up to honor the memory of the conductor whose name is most closely linked with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A lady in my vicinity whispered, in an unmistakably town-and-country voice:

"Veddy impressive, rahlly."

I thought so, too.

Mr. Munch programmed last evening one of the last works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony. I found it long-winded, rather pretentious and indescribably boring. Its musical materials are trite and commonplace. They are not what we generally think of as musical themes; they are abstract patterns of sound, cryptic motifs reiterated over and over. This is sterile music, if it can be considered music at all. The score is put together with great competence, for Mr. Honegger is a craftsman of long experience. One feels that the composer has a great deal of technical facility, but little to express with it.

After the Honegger piece, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony made the most of its opportunity to demonstrate that it has not lost the ability to produce a tone of superlatively brilliant color.

Music and Dance Tonight

"Rigoletto," Metropolitan Opera, 8:30.

Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, Dorothy Dow soloist, Carnegie Hall, 8:45.

Gladys Swarthout, mezzo-soprano; Beveridge Webster, pianist; Burl Ives, folksinger; Hufstader Singers, Town Hall, 8:40.

New York City Ballet, premiere of "Apollo," City Center, 8:30.

...heater on Dec. 5

Boston Symphony

Season's First Concert Here in Memory of Koussevitzky

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Charles Munch; first New York concert of the season Wednesday night; program in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Masonic Funeral Music (K. 477) ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 5 ..... Honegger
Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique) ..... Tchaikovsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall was also its first here since Serge Koussevitzky's death last June, and Charles Munch and his musicians commemorated his eminent predecessor with an eloquently appropriate program. Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music is a suitable memorial tribute to any great musician. The two symphonies which followed both had an association with Dr. Koussevitzky; the Honegger work was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and the Tchaikovsky Pathetic Symphony was often played here by this orchestra during the quarter-century of Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorship. Mr. Munch asked the audience to stand in silence after the performance of the Mozart work.

Memorable playing and communicative interpretation characterized the concert throughout its course. Mr. Munch evidently admires Honegger's fifth symphony, heard Wednesday night for the third time here in nine months. It deserves repetition, on its own merits as well as on the general principle that any contemporary work of consequence should be given a good chance of winning its way with its audiences; for the reviewer, Wednesday's second hearing gave a greater appreciation of its merits. These include inventiveness, clarity of structure and scoring, a wide range of color and, in spite of the prevailing elegiac purport of the music, emotional variety. There is pungent dissonance, especially at the outset, but also lyricism and, along with the expressive unity of the work as a whole, a contrast of stressful and contemplative moods.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony called attention to the fact that its continuing appeal does not depend solely on its immediate emotional persuasiveness, but on the merits of the music itself as a masterpiece of individual tragic expression. Mr. Munch's interpretation was convincing, carefully wrought in dynamic, expressive and structural detail, but also spacious and large in scale; its emotional force was undeniable and passion and tragedy were present, but not beyond control. The orchestra's playing observed its best standards of tone quality, clarity, balance and responsiveness in all three works of this well chosen, coherent and contrasted program.

Duluth Hotel Fire Routs 40

DULUTH, Minn., Nov., 15 (AP)

[2?]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 16 1951

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Impressively In Koussevitzky Memorial Program

By Alice Eversman

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, honored his predecessor, the late Serge Koussevitzky, by dedicating to his memory last night's concert in Constitution Hall. The playing of Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music, K. 477," as first number was in the nature of a memorial service and at its end, by Mr. Munch's request, the audience rose to its feet for a minute of silent tribute. The spirit of Koussevitzky was evoked further by the performance of the last work commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Honegger's "Symphony No. 5," and of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, a favorite of the late music director.

The Boston musicians and their conductor seemed in closer accord last night than ever before. The effort previously shown by the men to achieve Mr. Munch's desires was absent and the leader himself was more controlled and decisive in his directing. The result was music making of the finest order, immediately visible in the performance of Mozart's "Funeral Music."

The gracious dignity of this music is solemn without being heartending. It is one of the composer's noblest works, where sorrow is made to be uplifting. Its voicing is given first to the wind instruments in a beautiful chorale that is expanded with great beauty through the other division of the orchestra. It was reverently played. The last local performance of the "Funeral Music" was in 1937, when Dr. Hans Kindler programmed it for the National Symphony.

Honegger's symphony in its modern speech fitted in well with the grief motive of the two other numbers, for it is a personal work, filled with introspective reflections of a sombre nature. The first movement is especially so and part of the Allegretto. The radius of thought is limited in these sections, with no waves of excitement or pronounced climaxes and, as if summing up the fruitlessness of the cogitations, each movement reaches finality with a single, soft drum-beat.

The writing is quite extraordinary, beginning with the rich textured chords that announce the first theme. Throughout, the opening movement retains this striking quality of sound like thick velvet touched, at all times, with an arresting aura of dissonance. The second movement has an odd liveliness to it that has no joy, and which is checked for a moment by solemn measures reminiscent of the atmosphere of the opening movement. The final Allegro marcato is a wild, defiant outburst that, after a tumultuous display, subsides gaspingly to the concluding drum-tap.

This recurrent use of a single note from the drum has some special significance for the composer, for he has inscribed it under the title of the manuscript which is now in the possession of the Library of Congress. The genuine feeling in this symphony is strongly communicative, despite the fact that there are no moments when the listener can bask in a simple emotional expression. Its construction is remarkably compact and more opulent in color than other of Honegger's works. The orchestra played it magnificently, following a clearly devised plan and with appreciation of its strange emotional intensity. The audience was greatly impressed and the symphony meant something to it, judging by its reaction.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" was envisioned dramatically by Mr. Munch. At the same time, its tragic utterances were stark without any melting quality, and no wings were given to the triumphant ending of the third movement. Mr. Munch's viewpoint is different. As finely detailed as it was, there were points of interpretation and of tempi that inevitably were compared to those of Koussevitzky whose memory was commemorated. Except for these elements that could not be overlooked, the performance had great power, and the experienced and gifted musicians of the orchestra played with superb tone and with the most polished musicianship.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 18 1951

FOSS PIANO SOLOIST AT CARNEGIE HALL

He Introduces Own Concerto With Boston Symphony—Brahms Work Offered

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Charles Munch, conductor. Soloist: Lukas Foss, piano. Carnegie Hall.

Leonore Overture No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 2 (New York premiere) ..... Lukas Foss
Symphony No. 4 ..... Brahms

The Concerto by Lukas Foss is a brand-new work. It received its world première in Europe last October, was introduced to Boston last week, in Brooklyn on Friday and Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The score is dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

It is the product of a young composer still in the process of finding himself, torn between the necessity of being "modern" and the instinct to write in a post-romantic manner. What ensues is an uneasy compromise that is neither exactly modern nor romantic.

There is talent all through the music, even if Mr. Foss has not subdued his elements into a sequential pattern. There is also a less agreeable type of the "wrong note" school of modernism together with a lack of pertinent melodic material. The first movement was hard put to sustain itself because of a basic lack of thematic nourishment.

Mr. Foss' developments sounded episodic, with a concentration on motific fragments rather than much of an attempt at architectural solidity. The last movement started as one of those toccata-like kinetic affairs, with a touch of jazz, that all young modern composers turn out as competently (and as similarly) as a machine that makes ball bearings.

Now that Mr. Foss has got this work out of his system, he should be all the better for it. One hopes that he will again concentrate on an idiom that is expressive of himself as well as of the influences that surround him.

He played his Concerto with the skill that one has come to expect of him as a pianist, and Mr. Munch worked very well as partner to the solo role. In the more familiar Beethoven and Brahms works, the conductor adhered to his norm.

Mr. Munch does not care too much about the details if his conception of the line emerges. It did, yesterday, with urbane and civilized results. Mr. Munch's Brahms is rather a citizen of the world than the bourgeois from Hamburg conceived by many other conductors.

H. C. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 18 1951

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Charles Munch; soloist, Lukas Foss, composer-pianist. The program: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 2 (first Manhattan performance) ..... Foss Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98....Brahms

Large, Unripe and Shapeless

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under Charles Munch, gave us two sound old chestnuts and one green fruit. The green fruit, very large and difficult of digestion, was Lukas Foss's Piano Concerto No. 2. The ripe nuts were Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. All were presented beautifully; and Mr. Foss played his own concerto in very grand style indeed.

* * *

Lukas Foss has been known here since his teens as a musician of unusual aptitudes. His serious aspirations and his skill in conducting, piano playing and composition have built confidence in his future among musicians. That confidence continues, awaits each new work from him with interest. But fulfillment of youthful promise hangs back. On the verge of thirty, Mr. Foss remains gifted, promising, immature as a composer, begins to disappoint.

* * *

His Second Piano Concerto, recently composed, is hard to accept as a work of serious artistic intentions, though such intentions are clearly present. Exactly what they are is not so clear. The piece starts and stops constantly in its forty-minute duration, hesitates, stumbles, goes on again, fades out, fades in, interrupts itself, repeats itself, and all in a manner unexplained by any plot or program. The composer, in fact, acknowledges in his program note no such plot. This listener thought he detected in the last of the three movements an impish desire to tease, a prankish mood, that justified some of the surprise patterns; but he found nothing in the expressive character of the other two movements (one declamatory and one meditative) to account for their discontinuity. Neither did any of the thematic material suggest such a local-train-making-all-stops manner of composition.

Much of this material recalls familiar modern works by Bartok, Copland and Prokofiev. Its harmonization seemed to your reporter relatively casual, its interval relations and metric structure lacking in tension. Some of the orchestral scoring was adroit, and the piano figurations most engaging. The finale, indeed, or at least the first few minutes of it, is a charming toccata with light orchestral accompaniment and makes a most brilliant effect. Later it stops and starts again, and takes a long time getting to its journey's end.

* * *

The relation of the solo instrument to the orchestra throughout the work seems not to be based on a very clear artistic conception. At times there is contrast and dialogue, as in a classical concerto. At other times the orchestral parts seem tacked on to a piano piece that could have done as well without them. The piece is full of ingenious detail but deplorably weak in its over-all plan. It shows talent but has no style, makes here and there a delightful effect of sound but virtually no coherent communication. It is exasperating from the immaturity of great gifts. If Foss could only write music as straightforwardly, as professionally as he plays the piano, the world would be richer by a talent come to fruition. I suppose we must be patient and go on waiting. But he does worry us all, and the new concerto doesn't help a bit.

Lukas Foss

John Brook, Boston

Soloist in his own piano concerto

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 51

Postlude

Boston Symphony in Tribute to Koussevitsky

By Paul Hume

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid tribute last night to the memory of Serge Koussevitsky.

In its first Constitution Hall concert since the death of the great Boston leader on June 4, the orchestra played Masonic Funeral Music by Mozart, the fifth symphony by Honegger, and the sixth symphony, the Pathetique, by Tschaikowsky.

The new Honegger symphony was particularly appropriate, since it was the last score commissioned by the Koussevitsky Foundation. Completed only last December, the original manuscript now is in the Library of Congress, where the Koussevitsky Foundation has its headquarters.

Mozart's music was given a simple, impressive reading in keeping with its rich solemnity. The Honegger is a work of immense vigor. Its themes are vital and the manner of their development is highly skilled.

Brilliant contrapuntal writing of the scherzo-like second movement leads to a final section of tremendous sweep. The steady pounding of strings is balanced against, and overtopped by brass chords that create real excitement. The symphony had a secure and virtuoso account from the entire orchestra and its conductor.

The obvious gifts of Munch in some scores makes his waywardness in other the more unaccountable. The popular Tschaikowsky symphony opened with two movements of striking regularity, almost as though they were being played down. There were abberations in tempo, but on the whole the music followed accustomed patterns.

The two final movements, the march, and the brooding adagio were torn to shreds. Other conductors have given this music the stamp of their own inclinations without distorting the composer's clear meaning. We do not ask for a version like Toscanini, Furtwangler, or Koussevitsky. But we do ask for a version that conforms to Tschaikowsky's directions. What we were given was violent overaccentuation, hysterical changes of speed, a thorough and wilful contradiction of the spirit of the symphony.

Munch no doubt has his reasons for such a performance. He did not make them clear.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

NOV 18 1951

Boston Symphony Rehearsals Again Open to the Public

Five open rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be available to the general public at season rates, as well as to students of the schools and colleges of Greater Boston. These rehearsals will not only afford an app rtunity to witness the great orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, at work, but will provide an opportunity to hear famous soloists rehearsing with the orchestra if, as is probable, they appear on these particular dates.

These include Monique de la Bruchollerie, the Belgian pianist about to make her first visit to America; William Primrose, the viola virtuoso, and the solo singers in Berloiz' "The Damnation of Faust," which will have its final preparation with chorus at the last open rehearsal.

The open rehearsals will begin next Thursday, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, and will also be given on Thursday, Dec. 13, Wednesday, Jan. 9, and Thursday, Feb. 28, and March 27 at 7:30 p. m. Tickets for the series having been distributed through the colleges, seats remaining are now on sale at the box office at $7.50 for the series of five, or $2 for each rehearsal.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 16 1951

Munch and Boston Put New Life in Tschaikowsky 6th

Things move so fast these days that memory quickly gets hazy, but it seems to me that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never played as well here under its new conductor, Charles Munch, as it did last night at Constitution Hall.

There were many good things and some disturbing ones, too, in previous Boston Symphony concerts under Mr. Munch. Last night, however, conductor and orchestra were in perfect accord, and the result was an extremely happy one for the capacity audience.

The Mozart Masonic Funeral Music, played in memory of the late Serge Koussevitsky and followed by a silent tribute on the part of the audience, was deeply moving. The Honegger 5th Symphony was played with stunning virtuosity, altho it is difficult to find the "tragic import" in it noted by the program annotator. It is a lively work, colorful in a Prokofieffian sort of way but it rarely cuts below the surface.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 that closed the program proved to be the high point of the evening. This familiar work had fresh charm as Mr. Munch unfolded it. To him it is robust and romaitic rather than "pathetic." The orchestra performed it superbly.

—MILTON BERLINER.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Munch Leads the Orchestra in Koussevitzky Memorial Here —Mozart Work Offered

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting. Carnegie Hall, Concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Mozart ..... Masonic Funeral Music
Honegger ..... Symphony No. 3
Tchaikovsky ..... Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch opened the first New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall with the performance of Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, for a quarter of a century the leader of the organization upon which he left so indelible an impression. Mr. Munch asked that the audience rise after the music for a minute of silent tribute to the man and sovereign artist who had served music so faithfully.

But more of the concert than this opening was a Koussevitsky memorial. The second performance of the evening was of the last score commissioned by the Natalie Koussevitzky Foundation that Koussevitzky received before he died. He intended to play the work last summer at Tanglewood, but rather than delay presentation to the public, he passed it immediately to Mr. Munch, who presented it here and in Boston last season.

Very Serious Work

It is not easy to believe that the symphony, which is numbered Honegger's Third, could have been presented with more devotion, or more effectively. It is not a score of the obvious sort, but a very serious work in highly individual vein. The writing is entirely polytonal. The music of the first part is mystical, if not ecclesiastical, in a way that curiously reminds one of Cesar Franck, though Franck would never have indulged in these idioms.

There is a further formal resemblance to Franck's symphony in the mixture of the scherzo and the andante elements of the second movement form. This is academic detail. What is felt in the music is a lofty and tragical spirit, solitary and intense. The highly dramatic finale ends enigmatically, as all the movements end, with the same mysterious repeated note, a D. This is music not to be lightly considered, or dismissed with a cursory estimate on short acquaintance. As the years go by it may well prove to be one of the most significant creative tributes to the memory of the musician responsible for its existence.

Mr. Munch ended with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony, which he gave a warm and nobly dramatic reading. It was an interpretation carefully proportioned in a way that served to make the more eloquent the music's intensely emotional utterance. What a symphony it is and how remarkably one's realization grows, with repeated hearings of its originality of form and matter, its shaking sincerity and flooding inspiration.

It is the sixth symphony of Tchaikovsky, and the third of his symphonies that are widely played, and the first symphony in which he fully found himself. And there is little in music history more "pathetic" than the untimely passing of so greatly gifted a master, who left so much unsaid.

Munch Recuperating From Illness in N.

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is [illegible] a New York hotel [illegible] infection.

[illegible] the 60-year-old maestro [illegible] in attendance. Bos[illegible] associates gave assurance last [illegible] he is recuperating "satis[illegible]

Pierre Monteux, who has been [illegible] conductor this week, will direct the orchestra at the reg[illegible] scheduled concerts next week.

MUSIC

Perfect Afternoon at the Symphony, With Monteux Conducting

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was just about a perfect afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert today, with Pierre Monteux making his first appearance in the current series during his current term as guest conductor.

It was a perfect afternoon—nearly that as you are likely to get in this life—because there was so much polish, elegance and completeness in the way everything was played. There were no extreme effects, nothing forced or exaggerated, nothing scamped or underplayed. This sort of music-making is possible only with a great conductor and a great orchestra.

The program, too, was remarkably well chosen, ranging from the Respighi transcription of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue, through Mozart's "Scotch" Symphony to Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Richard Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel." Each of these pieces has considerable merit.

As a conductor of the most intelligent and sensitive musicianship, Pierre Monteux, distinguished by a moderation perhaps not personally his own, but which Monteux is not a rousing interpreter of "Till," for example, has little excitement with other conductors. But the sheer beauty of the uninterrupted line of Mozart, the neatness with which every detail of the score was unfolded, left nothing to be desired in compensation.

On the other hand, it was amazing how the Monteux touch" brought out the warming glow to Mendelssohn's rather faded old Symphony. Perhaps it was because no spectacular was attempted. The work less vivacious than the "Italian" Symphony, more spirited than the Mozart, took on the illusion of freshness. Or perhaps it was the clarity, almost a transparency, so dominant a feature of the whole work, that did the trick. Generally speaking, weight and solidity are the performance of Romantic music. With Monteux there is no weight and no thickness, but the specific gravity and the texture are natural and appropriate to the composition. This was vividly illustrated in the Bach-Respighi transcription, a work natively massive, which, as Monteux reads it, has everything going on, the most forceful proof of this versatility came with the symphonic excerpts from the Hindemith opera "Mathis der Maler." This is astringent, linear, un-sentimental, sharply etched music, inescapably of the modern temper. Such music requires, for its re-creation, not only a virtuoso orchestra, but conducting that is technically direct and impersonal of expression. This music cannot be "interpreted," it just has to be played, with high regard for details and the over-all line. Then it emerges as a modern masterpiece. Yesterday it sounded exactly like that.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 18 1951

DR. LEICHTENTRITT, MUSIC EXPERT, DIES

Former Lecturer at Harvard, Composer of Many Works, Was Author of Biographies

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17—Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt, well known musicologist, died here last Tuesday afternoon in a nursing home, after a long illness, at the age of 77. A sister resides in Cambridge.

Once Pupil of J. K. Payne

Dr. Leichtentritt, who was born in Pleschen, near Posen, Poland, came to this country in 1889 and studied from 1891 to 1894 at Harvard, where he was a pupil of J. K. Payne in composition. He continued his music studies in Paris and at the Berlin Royal High School for Music.

From 1898 to 1901 he studied the history of music, philosophy, esthetics, classical and modern literature, and art at the University of Berlin, from which he received a Ph. D. degree in 1901. His thesis was on "Reinhold Keiser in His Operas."

In 1901 he became a teacher of composition, musical history and esthetics at Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, Berlin, and began contributing to many German periodicals. He also acted as music critic for the Berlin Vossische Zeitung. During the first World War he served with the German Army.

Barred from professional activties with the rise of Hitlerism, he returned to the United States and in 1933 was appointed lecturer on music at Harvard University. He also lectured at Radcliffe College and New York University.

Edited Hasse's "Miserere"

Dr. Leichtentritt edited several volumes of "Denkmaler deutscher Tonkunst," selected works of Hieronymus Praetorius and Andreas Hammerschmidt, thirty-six old German part-songs and Hasse's "Miserere." He rewrote and completed the fourth volume of Ambros' "History of Music," dealing with Italian music from 1550 to 1650.

He was a contributor to "The International Cyclopedia of Music and Musicians," THE NEW YORK TIMES and many magazines.

His works include: "Chopin," a biography; "Deutsche Hausmusik aus vier Jahrhunderten," "Geschichte der Motette," "Musikalische Formenlehre," "Ferruccio Busoni," a biography; "Handel," a biography; "Everybody's Little History of Music," "Music, History and Ideas," "Serge Koussevitzky: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music," and "Musical Form," the last-named having been published this year.

Dr. Leichtentritt's musical compositions include two operas, a symphony, a symphonic suite, symphonic variations on a Siamese fan dance, a concerto grosso, two quintets, three string quartets, a piano trio, sonatas for piano solo, for violin, for viola and for cello, thirty-two variations for piano, piano etudes and almost 100 songs.

Also a Goethe cycle for voice and piano or orchestra, a cantata from the canticle for contralto and orchestra, "Eine Sommertag" cycle of ten poems for women's choruses and orchestra, and a transcript of Monteverdi's "Lament d'Arianna" for contralto and soprano solo, chorus and piano or orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
POST NOV 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a splendid gesture to bring Pierre Monteux back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony last season and a further step in the right direction to engage him in that capacity for the present one. Mr. Monteux conducted the concert of last Tuesday and that of yesterday afternoon and he will remain on the job through a week from tomorrow when he repeats the program of yesterday and this evening. As proof of the internationalism of music, the French-born conductor is offering at this sixth pair of concerts an all-German program. And let it be said right now that his French blood did not prevent him from giving the right pace and accent, the proper mood and spirit to Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, as orchestrated by Respighi, the "Scottish" Symphony of Mendelssohn, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The last-named composer has fared pretty well this season. Thus far, we have heard "Death and Transfiguration" from Mr. Munch, "Don Quixote" from Mr. Burgin and now "Till" from Mr. Monteux. Like "Death and Transfiguration" and unlike "Don Quixote," "Till" does not lean too heavily on its program. Except for the scene of the Rogue's trial and his death on the gallows, the piece makes sense as music per se, and that is what program music should do.

The same is true of Hindemith's so-called symphony. It does one no harm to have seen the Gruenewald paintings or at least a reproduction of them, yet you can virtually forget them and enjoy the "Angelic Concert," the "Entombment" and the "Temptation of St. Anthony" for the spendid music that they are. We cannot tell yet which works of Hindemith will survive, but certainly this is one that is bound to live. It has melodic strength, it is firmly built and we can only marvel at the composer's contrapuntal skill.

The third programmatic piece, Mendelssohn's "Scottish," exacts even less from the listener in this respect. We can remember with profit that the introduction was inspired by the composer's visit to Holyrood, with its touching reminders of Mary Queen of Scots. We can think, if we wish to, of the storm in the coda of the first movement as taking place on a Scottish heath, and see the warlike clans in the finale. The Symphony stands up as music—to the extent that it does stand up. The first movement and the Scherzo, the one really Scottish movement, are still all right; the Adagio and the finale have begun to fade, though the A major passage tacked on to the latter still sounds. And it is probably true that, in spite of its fine points, the work as a whole is inferior to the "Italian." And speaking of things Italian, one can question the taste in Respighi's orchestration of the Bach Passacaglia; it is almost too inflated. But the music, as music, is magnificent, and that is what really matters.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the sixth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor ..... Bach-Respighi
Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 56 ..... Mendelssohn
"Mathis de Maler" ..... Hindemith
Till Eulenspiegel ..... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Pierre Monteux returned yesterday afternoon to give us one of the most typical examples of the contemporary symphonic concert it would be possible to imagine.

Everything was entirely in order: The program contained one "modern" work in the Hindemith (though it's now old enough and familiar enough to disturb no one), two favorite old standbys in Mendelssohn's grateful little Scottish Symphony and Strauss' unendingly satisfying "Till" and, as a traditional curtain-raiser, Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue in Resphigi's orchestral transcription. Nobody could possibly listen to this program and go home feeling he hadn't been musically requited.

Next, the orchestra was in absolutely the top of its form. Even the most acute ears could have detected nothing sufficiently out of order to be worth the mention. The technical aspects of the playing in every choir, indeed, every chair, were as near perfection itself as so large an ensemble could ever produce in live concert.

Then Mr. Monteux himself was at the peak of his form, though it is much to be doubted he is ever anything else. Thus the orchestral textures were perfectly integrated, the balances were incomparably sensitive, the clarity of voice from top to bottom and from inside out were no less then crystalline, the tone qualities warm and radiant throughout and the climaxes powerful but never out of control. It was, in short, the ultimate in the big-time live concert of our times.

It is at this point the music critic usually inserts the inevitable "but" or to knock the whole thing down flat. There is no "but" in this notice, and to point out that for all its soundness the concert was not a really stimulating one as a musical experience must not be construed so.

It could hardly be otherwise for the visiting conductor to fail to do the things he knows best and best knows the audience loves best. So it may merely be said here that to live with this sort of a program week in and week out would prove pretty tiresome and advance the cause of music not one inch. On the contrary, I am sure it would, in the end, kill the living symphony concert for good and all.

Having noted this, let me once again mention the incredible musicianship of Pierre Monteux. His style is entirely without mannerism; he stands solidly planted on the conductor's stand, his feet slightly apart. He may, on occasion, lean forward a little or turn slightly to face his string choirs (it may be mentioned he re-seated the orchestra, second violins to the right outside, cellos to the left inside, etc.), but there is never a trace of physical emotion. He does what he does with his stick, and his baton technique is probably without parallel today.

Mr. Monteux's program next week offers no less than eight pieces, five by Wagner and three by Debussy. Nobody can seem to remember how long it is since a program containing this many pieces has been heard at the regular concerts, but I'd venture to guess at least 30.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 25 1951

PIERRE MONTEUX conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in 27 years.

Monteux Will Conduct Symphony Here

By P. B. H.

PIERRE MONTEUX, veteran conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra and former conductor of the Boston Symphony will return to Providence Tuesday night for the first time in 27 years as guest conductor of the Bostonians in their second concert of the season here. It will begin at 8:15 o'clock in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

As the major item on the program, Monteux has chosen Igor Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," a work which he probably saved from oblivion after it caused a near riot during its premiere performance as a ballet score in Paris on May 29, 1913.

Conducted Premiere

Monteux conducted the premiere and the stormy reception it received from the audience only confirmed his opinion that the Stravinsky opus had merit. As conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he gave the work its first performance in Boston in 1924. The same year, he conducted it again in Paris, with the Diaghileff Ballet Russe. This time, the audience was more orderly.

The Paris premiere has been characterized as one of the great "scandals" in musical history. Although "Le Sacre" has been heard in this country more often as a concert piece it was originally a ballet. As such it stirred conservative musical Parisians to their depths when first produced. Many were baffled and displeased at the "new" kind of music.

The scene at the premiere of the ballet, at the Theater des Champs Elysees May 29, 1913, was an extraordinary one both in sight and sound. While the ballet was being performed by the Diaghileff troupe, the music could scarcely be heard for the shouting and hisses that prevailed over the demonstrations of those in favor.

Excitement Described

Carl Van Vechten, who was present, wrote of a young man who sat behind him that "the intense excitement under which he was laboring, thanks to the potent force of the music, betrayed itself presently when he began to beat rhythmically on the top of my head with his fists." Other forms of excitability took place. Scorn and bitterness were expressed in some of the reviews.

Stravinsky was all for withdrawing the ballet at the evidence of dislike by the more demonstrative part of the audience. "How can you tell they didn't like it when they couldn't hear it?" Monteux is said to have replied.

The conductor suggested that the ballet be revised in concert form and in that version he performed it for the first time in Paris the year following the premiere.

At that time the applause is said to have been enthusiastic. In the meantime, during the 1913 season, the ballet was presented five times in Paris. London saw it for the first time in July of the same year, at the Drury Lane Theater. There were scattered hisses but the applause was more audible.

Had Fleeting Vision

The turn of history has quieted the storms over "Le Sacre" and it is now considered one of Stravinsky's greatest compositions. How the inspiration came to him to compose it is told by Stravinsky himself in his autobiography. "One day when I was finishing the last pages of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' in St. Petersburg," he writes, "I had a fleeting vision which came to me as a complete surprise, my mind at the moment being full of other things.

"I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring."

That gave him his theme which is expressed in the English translation of the title, "The Rite of Spring."

Stravinsky in New York

Stravinsky, incidentally, is now in New York. He returned Thursday elated over triumphs abroad with his new opera, "The Rake's Progress," and will conduct one of his ballet scores, "The Fairy's Kiss," at an all-Stravinsky evening of the New York City Ballet Company at the City Center tonight. Both the City Opera Company and the Metropolitan Opera Company are said to be bidding for "The Rake's Progress."

Monteux, at 76, is the dean of symphony conductors in this country. Born in Paris in 1875, he had served a rigorous apprenticeship and achieved prominence as a musician when he became a conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1919. He succeeded Henri Raboud who presided over the Bostonians for one year after the departure of the controversial Dr. Karl Muck.

Monteux left Boston in the spring of 1924 — just why has never been satisfactorily explained — and it wasn't long before he was engaged to conduct the San Francisco Orchestra — then a struggling organization whose days appeared to be numbered. Under his baton, it has become one of the nation's foremost symphony groups, particularly famous for its recordings.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 25 1951

Monteux in Boston

Pierre Monteux, who was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular conductor between 1919 and 1924, will close three weeks as its guest leader with its second trio of New York concerts, in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 8, and in Brooklyn Friday night, Dec. 7. It was originally planned for the Bostonians' regular leader, Charles Munch, to occupy Mr. Monteux' podium in San Francisco during the fortnight beginning last Monday. But Mr. Munch, who had to miss a pair of Boston concerts early this month, has been suffering from a virus infection. Alexander Hilsberg replaced him in San Francisco last week, and Andre Kostelanetz will conduct there next Friday and Saturday. Mr. Hilsberg will conduct the New Orleans Symphony on Tuesday, Dec. 4, and Izler Solomon and Artur Rodzinski will be in charge of that orchestra on the next two Tuesdays before the return of its regular leader, Massimo Freccia.

Mr. Monteux will devote his Carnegie Hall program for Dec. 5 to Debussy's "Jeux," "Gigues" and excerpts from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" and music from Wagner's "Parsifal," "Götterdämmerung," "Siegfried" and "Tannhäuser." The program for the Saturday matinee consists of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus" and Pastoral Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
NOV 25 1951

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

AMONG recent RCA victor record releases are a number worth underscoring. All the works are familiar items in the orchestral repertory, but each record has some significance attached to it. As for performances, they are all the last word in recording technique nowadays, so that the practice of re-recording has become fashionable.

Notable is the performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting. Ever challenging work since that evening in May, 1913, when Monteux conducted the world premiere, "The Rite of Spring" has grown more mellow to our ears even as Monteux's performance has somewhat mellowed through the years. The authority remains, making this newest recording a most desirable acquisition.

With Monteux's retirement announced at the end of the season, the re-recording of Brahms' Second Symphony with the San Francisco Symphony is apt. There has always been a strong Brahmsian quality about Monteux's interpretation. This one clarifies it.

* * *

RCA Victor's special tribute to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky brings two records of outstanding performances of his by the Boston Symphony. Under the label "Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Edition" have appeared Sibelius's Second Symphony and the combination of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss's "Don Juan." Koussevitzky's special affinity for Sibelius makes this interpretation of the Second Symphony significant. It is a wonderful performance.

Curiously enough "Don Juan" has been duplicated by the same company with a performance by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony. It, too, is coupled with Wagner; this time, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey." The choice between these two records is a matter of personal taste, but Boston Symphony sounds mellower than the NBC Symphony in this release.

* * *

Speaking of Wagner, the recording of the "Love Duet" and "Isolde's Narrative and Curse" from "Tristan and Isolde" brings the great voice of Kerstin Flagstad in all its opulence. The performances are with the Philharmonia Orchestra. Elizabeth Hongen assists with the Narrative and Curse, Set Svanholm and Constance Shaklock in the Love Duet.

To be included in this listing are the three Debussy Nocturnes performed by Stokowski and his symphony orchestra with the Robert Shaw Chorale assisting in the infrequently heard "Sirenes." Another interesting record combines Yehudi Menuhin and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch in Bruch's famous Concerto in G Minor.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
NOV 27 1951

Ansermet Takes Over For Charles Munch

Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning next month, as a substitute for Charles Munch, who is ill.

The Swiss conductor, who will the orchestra Dec. 10, was issued the invitation by Munch. Ansermetmade a guest appearance as the Symphony's conductor in January, 1949. Pierre Monteux' guest appearances as conductor of the orchestra will end in New York Dec. 8.

Munch is under medical advice to rest because of a circulatory a recent virus infection.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 27 1951

Ansermet To Substitute For Munch As Conductor

Boston, Nov. 27—(AP)—Ernest Ansermet, noted Swiss conductor, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra after December 10 as substitute for Charles Munch, who is ill with a circulatory ailment.

A spokesman for the orchestra said last night Ansermet agreed to take over the concerts at the completion of Pierre Monteux's guest appearances on December 10.

Ansermet's previous appearance here was as a guest conductor in January, 1949.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 27 1951

MUNCH PLANS LONG REST

Ansermet to Fill In for Conductor With Boston Symphony

Charles Munch, who contracted a virus infection after his last concert here with the Boston Symphony on Nov. 15, has been ordered by his physician to take "a long rest." To replace him after Pierre Monteux's guest appearances this week and next, orchestra officials have engaged the Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet.

Mr. Ansermet will complete the concerts of this year and possibly lead concerts in January, depending on when Mr. Munch is well enough to return to the podium. Mr. Ansermet was able to accept the engagement because this year he has taken time off from his own group, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, in order to write a book.

News of Mr. Munch's illness was announced on Nov. 19 when he was forced to cancel his two-week guest engagement with the San Francisco Symphony.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 27 1951

Ernest Ansermet to Conduct in Boston

Boston—(UP)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will fly to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of music director Charles Munch.

Ansermet accepted an invitation to lead the orchestra following the last guest appearance of Pierre Monteux in New York Dec. 8. He will fly from Geneva Dec. 4 to fill in for Munch, who is suffering from a circulatory disturbance which resulted from a virus infection.

Ansermet first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe and in 1919 founded his own orchestara de la Suisse Romande. He conducted the Boston Symphony once before as a guest in January, 1949.

[31]

HARTFORD, CONN.

1951

Ansermet of Switzerland to Lead Symphony During Munch's Illness

[illegible] Ansermet has accepted the invitation of Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take over the concerts of his orchestra following Pierre Monteux's guest appearances, which will end in New York on Dec. 8.

ERNEST ANSERMET

Munch is under medical advice to rest for a substantial period because of a circulatory disturbance which has developed after a recent virus infection.

Ansermet, who has visited this country to lead our principal orchestras as guest in the last four seasons, conducted the Boston Symphony in January, 1949. He first visited this country as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and in 1918 founded his own Orchestre de la Suisse Romande. He has since appeared as guest in many parts of the world.

The distinguished Swiss conductor will fly from Geneva on Dec. 4, and have his first rehearsal in Boston on Monday, Dec. 10.

Ansermet for Boston

Ernest Ansermet has accepted the invitation of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take over the concerts following Pierre Monteux's guest appearances which will end in New York on Dec. 8. The distinguished Swiss conductor will fly from Geneva on Dec. 4 and have his first rehearsal in Boston or Monday, Dec. 10. Mr. Munch has been advised to rest a substantial period for physical reasons.

Ansermet, who has visited this country to lead principal orchestras as guest in the past four seasons, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January, 1949. He first visited this country as conductor of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, and in 1918 founded his own Orchestre de la Suisse Romande. He has since appeared as guest in many parts of the world.

HONORARY CHIEF

Fire Commissioner Michael T. Kelleher, right, makes Pierre Monteux, San Francisco Symphony Orchestra conductor, next to him, honorary chief of the Boston fire department. At left is Arthur Fielder, Boston Pops conductor, who has been made honorary chief of the San Francisco fire department, and Boston Fire Chief John V. Stapleton. Monteux and Fiedler are "sparks," and everybody is having a good time!

Munch Ill, Can't Conduct Bostonians for a Month

Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be unable to conduct the orchestra until late in December because of illness, a representative disclosed yesterday.

Mr. Munch is suffering from a virus infection, it was explained. Because of his illness he did not conduct the orchestra's Boston concerts on Nov. 2, 3, 9 and 10 but returned to the podium for the New York concerts on Nov. 14, 16 and 17. It was explained that resumption of his duties before complete recovery had contributed to a recurrence of the illness.

Ernest Ansermet, founder and conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, will fly to New York from Switzerland next week to conduct the orchestra until January—or longer, if necessary, it was explained. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston organization's next concerts at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 8 and on Dec. 7 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

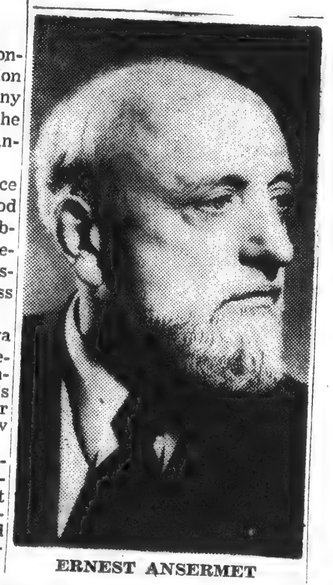
Munch Sick, Ansermet to Substitute

Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a substitute for the ill Charles Munch, it was announced last night.

Munch is under medical advice to rest for a substantial period because of a circulatory disturbance which developed after a recent virus infection. Munch issued the invitation to the Swiss conductor.

Ansermet will fly from Geneva Dec. 4, and will have his first rehearsal with the orchestra Monday, Dec. 10. Pierre Monteux's guest appearances as conductor of the orchestra will end in New York Dec. 8.

Ansermet made a guest appearance as the Symphony's conductor in January, 1949. He first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and in 1918 founded his own Orchestra de la Suisse Romande.



ERNEST ANSERMET

MUNCH PLANS LONG REST

Ansermet to Fill In for Conductor With Boston Symphony

Charles Munch, who contracted a virus infection after his last concert here with the Boston Symphony on Nov. 15, has been ordered by his physician to take "a long rest." To replace him after Pierre Monteaux's guest appearances this week and next, orchestra officials have engaged the Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet.

Mr. Ansermet will complete the concerts of this year and possibly lead concerts in January, depending on when Mr. Munch is well enough to return to the podium. Mr. Ansermet was able to accept the engagement because this year he has taken time off from his own group, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, in order to write a book.

News of Mr Munch's illness was announced on Nov. 19 when he was forced to cancel his two-week guest engagement with the San Francisco Symphony.

MUSIC

Splendid Wagner and Debussy by Pierre Monteux at Symphony

Seventh program in the Friday-Saturday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux guest conductor. Wagner: Prelude to "Parsifal"; Debussy: Two Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Wagner: Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, and Siegfried's Death Music from "Gotterdammerung"; Debussy: "Gigues"; "Jeux"; Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

By CYRUS DURGIN

You never can tell. On paper, a program devoted to familiar Wagner and less familiar Debussy had not looked especially interesting. In fact, it seemed a little too comfortable, like old shoes. But when that program came to actual performance, by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, it proved one of the most captivating, even exciting, concerts of the recent past. The reason is plain: splendid playing by the virtuosi of this orchestra, and superlative conducting by a great master of the art.

Mr. Monteux had not done the obvious thing of giving half to Wagner and half to Debussy, but had arranged the various pieces so that they formed more or less of an expressive continuity. It is said that one of Mr. Monteux's favorite composers is Wagner (the other being Brahms), and that is altogether believable in the light of his readings yesterday.

For the incense-laden Prelude to "Parsifal" is dragged, the effect is terribly weakened. But Mr. Monteux took it at just the right pace, and the dedicated majesty of the music was renewed. Once again here as in every composition, the conductor's insistence upon an absolutely clear texture of sound and upon the utmost refinement of ensemble, were pleasurably felt and of the greatest importance. Equally important was his instinct for exactly correct speed.

There is something primal and of the fresh morning of the legendary world in the music of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring." They are qualities more sensed than discerned. But they are there, and they have survived too frequent performance in the case of these familiar orchestral excerpts, and the soiling mud of nonsensical quasi-ideological notion which were read into the "Ring" during the ghastly nightmare of the Hitlerian years.

Received without such blemish, and done with such triumphant mastery as Mr. Monteux brought to them, these excerpts are once again new and muscular, heroic and exalted. Never in my memory was the Death Music of Siegfried made so exciting. As for the "Tannhauser" Overture, that faded victim of 10,000 desultory readings glowed and shimmered, its bright colors and its young passion restored.

What with the "Saint Sebastian" excerpts, "Gigues" and "Jeux," this was a very large amount of Debussy for one afternoon, especially since they are all of much the same style, having been composed within three consecutive years. Wagner, contrariwise, was represented by three distinct styles.

Nonetheless, as you would expect from so Gallic a Frenchman, they were done with verve and delicacy, strength and fire, according to the various demands of the composer, who, it does no harm to repeat, was no languid painter of amorphous pastels. Best of all, Debussy's oftentimes intricate and always subtle rhythms were firmly and deftly traced.

In short, another practically perfect afternoon.

ERNEST ANSERMET

For a time the Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to have a new conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The virus infection from which Charles Munch has suffered durilng the past few weeks, and that kept him from conducting two pairs of Symphony concerts, has developed into a circulatory disturbance that his medical advisers say calls for a substantial period of rest.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York with Pierre Monteux, who has been conducting here for a fortnight. On its return to Boston, Mr. Ansermet will take over, meeting the players for his first rehearsal on Monday, Dec. 10, and conducting the concerts of Dec. 14 and 15. However, the distinguished Swiss maestro, who came to Boston in 1915 with the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, will not be leading the Symphony for the first time, since he was here as guest for a week in January, 1949, and was most favorably received by press and public. Born in Vevey, Switzerland, in 1883, Mr. Ansermet started out to be a mathematician, believing that his lack of skill on any musical instrument prevented him from following a musical career, but solved that problem by becoming a conductor.

Although Mr. Ansermet did not appear with the Boston Symphony until the 1948-49 season, which was Dr. Koussevitzky's final one, he had directed other American orchestras in the two previous seasons and he has guested in this country since that time. In 1918 he founded his own Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, and the excellent recordings made by this fine organization, under his direction, are familiar to record collectors. Mr. Ansermet is something of a specialist in modern music, notably that of Stravinsky, but he is at home in music of all schools.

Ansermet Takes Over For Charles Munch

Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning next month, as a substitute for Charles Munch, who is ill.

The Swiss conductor, who will the orchestra Dec. 10, was issued the invitation by Munch. Ansermetmade a guest appearance as the Symphony's conductor in January, 1949. Pierre Monteux' guest appearances as conductor of the orchestra will end in New York Dec. 8.

Munch is under medical advice to rest because of a circulatory a recent virus infection.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Pierre Monteux ended his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in April, 1924, the last piece on his final program was the Overture to "Tannhauser." No doubt, the performance was as fine as the one we heard from him yesterday afternoon. After all this time, it would be difficult to be certain. But at least, that of yesterday, was the soundest one that we have heard at the Symphony Concerts since.

Mr. Monteux followed that great Wagnerian, Karl Muck, and even if his Wagner performances were all that they should have been, we were not going to be greatly impressed with the fact. I won't say that Koussevitsky never did Wagner well, but he often missed the boat. Nor was Mr. Munch's one venture with him a happy one. Be that as it may, yesterday Mr. Monteux appeared in this Wagner-Debussy program as a veritable prophet of the German music dramatist. The other Wagner numbers on this seventh program are the Prelude to "Parsifal" and two excerpts from "Goetterdammerung": the Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey sequence and the Death Music of Siegfried, while Debussy is represented by two excerpts from Act I of "The Marytyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and by "Gigues" and the ballet, "Jeux."

In the matter of interpretation and performance Mr. Monteux was quite as successful with the music of his countryman as he was with that of Wagner. If the former came off second best, it was because he was represented by some of his lesser works. "La Mer" or the Nocturnes, or the Prelude to the "Faun" would have stood up better in comparison with the Wagner numbers in between which these other Debussy pieces were sandwiched. However, there is a certain kinship between the "Saint Sebastian" music and "Parsifal," the mysticism of the one owing not a little to that quality in the other, and if "Gigues" and "Jeux" are not the first-rate Debussy, they are both fascinating studies in orchestral timbres and in rhythm—their melodic content, in other words, is slight.

This fortnight under Mr. Monteux has been a joy. There has been some demurring that his programs have not contained more in the way of contemporary novelty, though he has given us both Hindemith and Stravinsky. He has, however, presented things that lots of people like to hear. And he has let us see just how well our orchestra can play and how well it can be made to sound. There were many moments of astonishing tonal beauty in yesterday's concert. Mr. Monteux has a perfect ear. He has flawless taste. He seems to sense how each composer really intended to have his music played. His command of the orchestra is so absolute and secure that the men are perfectly at their ease and can, therefore, give of their best, which is exactly what they have done; in the first Tuesday concert, in last week's Friday-Saturday pair and in the concert of yesterday. Mr. Monteux being who he is, tonight's concert should be the same thing right over again. The distinguished guest takes leave of us tomorrow, repeating the program that he offered a week ago. We could ask for nothing better than to have him back next year.

[32]

Herald Dec. 2

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the seventh concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Wagner ..... Prelude to "Parsifal"
Debussy..Excerpts from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"
Prelude: The Court of the Lilies
Dance of Ecstasy and Finale
Wagner...Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung"
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey
Siegfried's Death Music
Debussy.....'Gigues," Images No. 1; "Jeux," Poeme Danse
Wagner.....Overture to "Tannhauser"

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was in April, 1924. The occasion was the final concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season. On the program were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

When it was over, as Earle Johnson relates it in his "Symphony Hall, Boston," "several thousand admirers shook the conductor's hand on the flower- and flag-decked stage during a two-hour informal reception; the trustees, Major Higginson's widow, Charles Loeffler and others beside him."

Yesterday afternoon the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" once again brought a symphony concert to a close, but this time the stage was not decked with flowers and flags, nor was there an informal reception of several thousand admirers. For times have changed; sentimental public displays of emotion are out of fashion. Yet the audience's emotions must have been about the same as they were on that April afternoon 27 years ago.

For this was once again a farewell to Pierre Monteux, one of the towering giants of music in our day and virtually the last of a race of musician-conductors who place the inspiration of the composer and the virtuosity of the orchestra above their own. Times have changed in that respect, too; audiences today, bred on the more incandescent choreographic style of conducting are not likely to prefer Monteux's stolidity. Nor, for that matter, are they likely to recognize in it the veritable prodigy of musicianship that it is; we shall doubtless not see the like of Monteux's baton technique, the incomparable clarity of his orchestral textures and the unchallenged taste of his musical conceptions for some time to come.

Yesterday, in a semi-Pops program alternating Wagner with Debussy, Wagner got much the better of it save in the marvelous excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," which represent Debussy at the absolute peak of his inspiration. "Gigues" makes a pleasant impression, as indeed does the concert version of "Jeux," the ballet music to a tennis game. Yet neither offers too much substance especially when contrasted with the heavier proclamations of Wagner.

"Jeux," in fact, for all its charming sound effects, its piquancies and elegant humor, much needs the ballet; as a concert piece it seems over-refined, spun-out, even fussy. Its final bars, however, with their witticisms, make their point sufficiently to leave an impression far more favorable than unfavorable.

As for the Wagner pieces, I find myself at a loss for further impressions as they are all done with such regularity everywhere they are thrice familiar. They don't exactly bore, as in-person performances of them are infrequent at these concerts, for it is always interesting to see how they go. And it may be said they went wonderfully well yesterday. The brasses have seldom been so imposing, the strings so brilliant and so rapturous. But Wagner's gigantic utterances rather pass one by these days; the heroic emotions of grief in the Funeral Music, the pious Amens of Parsifal and the pompous conceits of Tannhauser seem pretty contrived and self-conscious. This is not to say they still don't make their effect; you can't employ 110 men as Wagner does and put your audience to sleep. Its mind may wander to note that Santa Claus, according to a program advertisement, plays the cello left handed, but Wagner is still in command.

And so, with the Overture to Tannhauser, Pierre Monteux once again takes his leave of Boston. But if he'll only promise to come back to us once more, we'll see what we can do about decking the hall with flags and flowers. There's no one we'd rather do it for, of that he may be very sure!

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES
NOV 16 1951

Education Theme Of New Boston Station

BOSTON— (INS) —Full length "live" performances of one of the world's great symphony orchestras are being channeled into the homes of New Englanders by a new Boston radio station.

Through the facilities of WGBH, a high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are within the hearing range of an estimated 208,000 families.

The station, which has its studios in Symphony Hall, is operated with the advice and cooperation of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

The council's members include the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern and Tufts.

The station's aim is to offer programs of general education for all groups in the community. In addition to the symphony, WGBH presents:

1. Comprehensive interpretations of world news and events.
2. Full-length dramatic productions.
3. A children's hour.
4. Forums on world affairs with distinguished New England scholars and scientists.
5. Poetry readingsd by note poets.
6. Regular college or extension courses recorded in the classrooms.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 21 1951

MUSIC

Pierre Monteux Returns as Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux returned last night to the orchestra of which, nearly a generation ago, he was regular conductor. His sojourn this time as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony will extend two full weeks. The first program of his present series he divided between Beethoven of the "Coriolanus" Overture and "Pastoral" Symphony, and Stravinsky of the "Sacre du Printemps."

The secret of Pierre Monteux' quality—if, indeed, there is any secret, for his conducting is completely open—is a baton technic of absolute mastery. No conductor ever looked more reposeful from the rear, and few confine themselves to the sparing gestures which characterize Monteux. All the work is done at rehearsal, and Monteux's activity during an actual concert consists largely of reminding 100-odd men of interpretive lines and details already laid out.

The less perceptive listener, therefore, is likely to regard this sort of conducting as comparatively tame. But if you listen with your ears instead of your eyes, you will find a great deal of vitality in Monteaux's conducting, and a wealth of beautifully ordered detail. Take the two Beethoven scores of last night: the agitated Overture was tense but not lurid, dramatic but never exaggerated. The tempi in the Symphony were always moderate, the music sang, the orchestration was transparent as spring water, and the whole performance had a truly classic exactitude of style and expression.

But the big moment came with Stravinsky's once scandalous ballet music. Monteux's performance of it must be the last word, for he was its first conductor, he knows it in every bar and conducts it without score. This is a masterpiece of recreative musicianship wherein the composer is fully and faithfully served. I have heard Stravinsky conduct the "Sacre" and I am sure he cannot do it so well.

The orchestra was in good form last night, and played admirably. Mr. Burgin suffered a broken string in a crucial portion of the "Sacre," but soon swapped his instrument for the violin of Mr. Tapley, and thus played on to the end. Incidentally, the audience, which filled Symphony Hall, rose upon Mr. Monteux's first entrance, proof positive of the mingled esteem and affection felt for him in Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 15 1951

MUNCH ELECTED

Boston, Nov. 15. —(AP) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been elected a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, the conservatory announced today.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 14 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS BRILLIANCE IN FIRST CONCERT

The Boston Symphony made its first seasonal invasion here last evening to give the second program of the Woolsey series. Charles Munch, who has been ailing of late, has evidently regained his strength for he conducted the entire concert in his customary dynamic fashion. In the works presented, the program was a typical one with both familiar and unfamiliar music included. In the first category, there were Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3 and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony while the Lukas Foss Piano Concerto, No. 2 represented the contemporary music interest.

With regard to the renditions of the two familiar offerings last evening, which to me were brilliantly performed though studded occasionally with "extremes" in tempi and dynamics, I would like to recall some pertinent remarks by the distinguished conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos. In a talk given in Sprague Hall earlier this year, the conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra pleaded for a more human approach on the part of listeners at a musical performance.

Mr. Mitropoulos said that there were "prima donnas" in audiences (critics included) as well as in the ranks of conductors and performers. He derided the current concern with "tempi and a composer's intentions" on the part of all concerned. This reviewer is heartily in accord with those sentiments.

The Boston Orchestra is a virtuoso group and as such it is capable of doing things in performance that would spell disaster for most other symphonic orchestras. It is only natural that Mr. Munch, as did his predecessor, Serge Koussevitsky, should take advantage of the collective virtuosity at his disposal for obtaining the added brililance and greater contrasts which some often label "distortion." To my way of thinking, the latter term should be applied only if there is a resultant lack in precision, timing, or unevenness in meter. There were none of these faults last evening or to use an expression of the jazz players, the Boston musicians really "cut the stuff."

As for the new Foss concerto, which featured the composer as the soloist last evening, the performance excited small enthusiasm in this listener. While a fair appraisal of the work is hardly possible at a single hearing, it's thematic interest seems negligible and the development rather disjointed. Mr. Foss is a most talented young man but on the basis of this musical concoction which appears to be made up of equal parts of Bartok and Hindemith with a dash of Stravinsky, I would say that his greatest abilities at the moment are at the keyboard. If his composing abilities ever catch up with his pianistic talents, watch out! As a youthful exhibitionist at present, Mr. Foss would seem to be endeavoring to "kill one bird with two stones." Last evening, the bird turned out to be something of a "turkey."

G. E. A.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 20 1951

Notes and Footnotes

PAUL HUME, music critic of the Washington Post who caused Harry Truman so much trouble over Margaret's singing, is at it again. He's hitting closer to the Berkshires, too. Last week the Boston Symphony gave a memorial concert there in tribute to their late director, Koussevitzky. Mr. Hume didn't like some of it, notably, Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, directed by Charles Munch. Says Mr. Hume, "What we were given was violent over-accentuation, hysterical changes of speed, a thorough and willful contradiction of the spirit of the symphony." What Mr. Munch has to say isn't known. Perhaps he'll get H.S.T. to ghost-write another letter to Mr. Hume.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 18 1951

MORE LISZT ON DISKS

Two Symphonic Poems and Piano Works Emphasize Composer's Importance

TO the growing number of Liszt's symphonic poems on records a new pair can be added—Tasso (No. 2) and The Battle of the Huns (No. 11). Mercury has provided the recording, with the Munich Philharmonic directed, respectively, by Adolf Metternich and Kurt Eichhorn.

Neither work is much played today; and, in all truth, they sound pretty old-fashioned. This despite pages of pure genius that anticipate Tchaikovsky ("Francesca da Rimini") and Strauss (any number of symphonic poems). The point is that Liszt conceived those ideas before anybody else and they must have hit the 1850's with a shattering impact. Not for nothing was Liszt considered one of the composers of the future.

Even if the historical importance of these two scores overweighs their actual musical worth, they remain ample testimony to a genius that needed only a little more discipline to have been a supreme master.

The Munich Philharmonic performances are idiomatic enough, but certainly the thin, unresonant quality of the recording is not much help.

As a composer of piano music, Liszt was on absolutely certain ground. Even if one may disagree with what he has to say, there is no denying that his manner of presentation is ever-fascinating. Vladimir Horowitz has recorded for Victor a group of Liszt's piano pieces—the Funérailles, Sonetto del Petraca No. 104 and the Valse Oubliée. Also present is Horowitz' arrangement of the Rákoczy March, the fifteenth of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. For sheer pianistic legerdemain the Rákoczy is unsurpassed. Well, almost unsurpassed: one thinks of things like the recent "Stars and Stripes Forever" or the old Victor ten-inch disk by Horowitz of the E flat Paganini-Liszt Etude.

Koussevitzky Memorial

Victor has issued two disks commemorating the late Serge Koussevitzky. One of those disks, with the Boston Symphony, containing the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius, is as close to definitive as anything can possibly be in this world of fluctuating interpretive values. The Sibelius No. 2 always was one of the conductor's specialties and here, aided by one of the most luscious-sounding recordings that Victor has ever made, the results are magnificent—a fitting tribute to Koussevitzky's memory.

On the other disk Koussevitzky is heard, again with the Boston Symphony, in a coupling of Strauss' Don Juan (previously available in a 45 r.p.m. album) and Wagner's Siegfried Idyll. Equally superb performances and tonal splendor ensue. And if Koussevitzky's "Don Juan" were not enough, Victor has released another version of the score—Toscanini's, with the N. B. C. Symphony. Wagner's Siegfried's Rhine Journey is on the reverse of the disk. This listener has no "Don Juan" preference. Both interpretations are on the highest level.

Other popular orchestral works recently released include Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor, played by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia) in a performance that well suits the plangent quality of the music; Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony on a Decca ten-inch disk, with Fritz Riegger and the Munich Philharmonic presenting a sound, reliable reading; and a coupling on Decca of Mozart's Prague Symphony (NWDR Symphony conducted by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt) with Mozart's Rondo in D (K. 382) as played by Wilhelm Kempff, piano, and the Dresden Philharmonic under Paul van Kempen. The readings are good; but the first movement of the symphony is heard in E flat instead of D.

H. C. S.

In the Popular Field

Kings and Queens of Boogie Woogie (Decca, ten-inch) is a showcase of that deceptively simple piano style which, in masterful hands becomes outrageously, hypnotically complex. And those hands are here, belonging to Meade "Lux" Lewis, Albert Ammons, Pete Johnson, Cleo Brown, Honey Hill and Dot Rice.

The first-named knocks out his most famous numbers, Honky Tonk Train and Yancey Special with his incredible bounce and variety in the right hand decorations. Ammons does a slow one, Kaycee on My Mind; Miss Brown does a virtuoso travesty on a Pine Top Smith composition. It's a lively collection.

Another pianist—who can play boogie woogie too, but who prefers to move with the times—is Mary Lou Williams. She plays Handy Eyes (her name for "St. Louis Blues") with some advanced phraseology, a touch of humor and a wistful bit of sentiment. On the reverse is a less original job Sposin' (Circle, 78 r.p.m. single).

C. H.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
NOV 23 1951

In a one-time-only program, Channel 4 at 10 tonight presents the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing a concert from the Massachusetts city. Charles Munch conducts the famous musical aggregation in the Egmont Overture by Beethoven and Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole." Ernest Walling is in charge of the special television production.

Musically, video seems to be looking up, with a number of performers of high talent scheduled to be heard and seen in forthcoming new programs.

Dinah Shore begins a twice-weekly, 15-minute show at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday over Channel 4. First "Dinah Shore Show" will be seen at a Hollywood party for press and entertainment world moguls Tuesday afternoon (4:30, live time to the East). West Coast viewers see the new show that evening by "quick kinescope."

On Dec. 7 at 10 p.m., the first of a projected new TV series alternately to star Ezio Pinza and Dennis Day will begin on Channel 4. The premiere, originating in New York, will be all Pinza's, with Jane Froman, singer, as guest.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
NOV 10 1951

Change Made In Conductors

Illness has caused Charles Munch of Boston, regretfully to cancel his San Francisco Symphony guest conductor engagement. Therefore the Opera House concerts next Thursday and Saturday nights will be conducted by Alexander Hilsberg, long an associate of Eugene Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

[33]

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

NEW YORK HEARS A SOLEMN MEMORIAL TO KOUSSEVITZKY

By W. G. ROGERS

NEW YORK, Nov 17—(UP)—A symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last week was turned into a stirring memorial service.

"We have dedicated this program to the memory of our great leader . . . Serge Koussevitzky," Charles Munch announced from the platform before he picked up his baton to conduct the Boston Symphony Tuesday night.

This was the orchestra's first visit here since the death last June of Koussevitzky, who had been its conductor for a quarter of a century. His successor, Munch, was beginning his third year.

The program chosen for this solemn occasion consisted of Mozart's Masonic Funeral March; Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which had been commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation; and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique."

After the Mozart, the audience stood for a minute of silence.

The mood of exaltation shown by conductor and musicians and felt deeply by the audience was most marked by Munch's splendid reading of the "Pathetique."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Washington, N.Y. Concerts Memorials to Dr. Koussevitzky

LENOX—Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood until his death last summer, has returned to her home, Seranak on Bald Head Mountain, after attending memorial concerts dedicated to her famed husband in New York and Washington.

The concerts given last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Charles Munch conducting, carried identical programs in the two cities. Mr. Munch programmed Mozart's Masonic funeral music, Honegger's Symphony No. 5 and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6. All three works were performed at the Tanglewood concerts last season.

Honegger's fifth symphony was for a few weeks the last score commissioned by the Natalie Koussevitzky Foundation that Dr. Koussevitzky received before his death. The late conductor intended to play the work last summer at Tanglewood but when he became ill in Arizona before coming east to Brookline, he passed the composition to Mr. Munch who presented it in Boston and later programmed it at Tanglewood.

The original manuscript, Mrs. Koussevitzky said, is now in the Library of Congress where the Koussevitzky Foundation has its headquarters.

Mrs. Koussevitzky plans to remain at her home here until the middle of January. She will then go to her winter home in Arizona until April when she will go abroad

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 16 1951

Rites Set Tomorrow For Violinist Grunberg

BOSTON—Funeral services for Maurice Grunberg, 64, former first violinist with the Boston and Detroit Symphony Orchestras, will be held here tomorrow afternoon. Grunberg, a resident of Brookline, died at a Boston hospital on Wednesday.

A native of Boston, the violinist was the son of the late Samuel and Bessie Celia Grunberg. He attended the Boston Latin School and, following his graduation from Harvard in 1907, he performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 11 years. Then he served one year with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

From 1921 to 1934, he was a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, later playing with the symphony orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia Broadcasting System. He retired in 1940.

Grunberg is survived by his widow, Violet Bishop Grunberg; and a sister, Mrs. Charles S. Cohen of Brookline.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 20 1951

Munch, Ill, Cancels Coast Chore

BOSTON, Nov. 19 (UP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been forced by illness to cancel his appearance as guest conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Munch was to have started a two-week engagement in San Francisco today, while Pierre Monteux, of the San Francisco Symphony, took over as guest leader here.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 19 1951

THE MAIL BAG

UN Doing Big Job Well

To the Editor of The Herald:

There is a letter in the Nov. 14 Herald to the effect that the U.N. is a failure.

We Americans are very impatient. When people rant and rail against the U.N. no one stops to think that it has taken this country 176 years to get to the place we are. We consider ourselves well off, and wonder why other nations don't do right off as we do.

Here we have, in the U.N., 51 nations, meaning 51 different kinds of people, trying (and some are not trying) to meet on common ground. I, personally, declare it can't be done under a great number of years. I don't expect to be alive when we find out what the common ground may be. It may be found out quite by accident.

I should like to see Russia out of it, but if she were, you must remember, her "satellites" would go, too. Then, indeed, there would be a divided world, and probably war.

To us, Russia is proceeding with an all wrong attitude, and it is proved by the fact that she cuts all communications with the outside world with her man in the street. If she felt she were really doing right by her people she would be glad of all "foreign" contact. She would say with pride, "Come any time and see how we do things." But she isn't proud, she is afraid. If we could wake to that fact, that Russia is afraid of us, I think many of the things we do would be different.

M. B. MATHER.

Waltham.

Larger Concert Hall

To the Editor of The Herald:

It has long been an unsolvable problem as to how the large musical organizations of our country—the symphony orchestra, ballet, opera companies—might pay their own way by means of box office sales. It appears that the trouble lies not in lack of enthusiasm on the part of the public, but rather in the mere and simple lack of space facilities for handling a bigger gathering. If Symphony Hall, the Boston Opera House, and even our local drama theatres could hold several hundred more persons, there would be enough money derived to pay all expenses.

Year after year after year the art-loving people of New England have contributed generously to fill the financial gap of large proportions. In one fell swoop, why not call upon these people, and others who can offer even a dollar or less, to contribute one final extra-generous amount as a down payment on a new hall which might seat 4000 or more? From then on, the increased attendance would pay for the building on a yearly long term arrangement. The overflow audiences who are now turned away from the Boston Symphony concerts, the Met Opera, the ballet, and the popular musical shows would make the difference. . . .

JAY SHELDON.

Brookline.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
NOV 19 1951

BOSTON. — (AP) — Seventy-six-year-old Pierre Monteux today rehearsed the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led from 1919-1924. Monteux, now San Francisco Symphony conductor, came here to exchange as guest conductor for three weeks with Charles Munch, director of the Boston orchestra. But Munch will not conduct in San Francisco. His doctors have advised him to take a complete rest to recover from a virus infection.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 21 1951

Boston Symphony Features Piatigorsky

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Cellist Gregor Piatigorsky was soloist with the Boston Symphony this week. Richard Burgin again conducted in place of Mr. Munch who was still recuperating from the grippe.

The soloist was heard in the Haydn Cello Concerto and "Don Quixote," by Richard Strauss. He was assisted in the latter by the Symphony's own violist Joseph de Pasquale. It was fine playing all the way for Mr. Piatigorsky, although marked here and there by small inconsistencies of both tempo and pitch.

* * *

THE HAYDN CONCERTO was exquisite in the hands of the cellist, although here again flawless pitch was not altogether scrupulously maintained. The Strauss seemed to suffer more, however, from this malady and sometimes soloist and orchestra were not always united. Mr. Piatigorsky's tone was the same as ever, capable of producing every mood and passion summoned by its master. The assistance rendered by Mr. de Pasquale was fine in every way.

Boston loves its New England Opera Theater and it shows its appreciation by means of the most practical method possible—a packed house. The inimitable Boris Goldovsky and his younger singers opened their season with Puccini's bittersweet "La Boheme."

These productions in popular English leave little to be desired either musically or dramatically. They have all the forethought of 'good theater." The voices of the company, which have never been bad, improve each season under the tutelage of Goldovsky, and his assistants.

* * *

OUTSTANDING members of Boheme" cast were Nancy as Mimi, Do[illegible]doy drawing card was Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata." In the Beethoven piece Mr. Szigeti's mettle was tested by a broken string, which he stopped to repair, and a slipping peg, which he endured. From an audience standpoint, however, the afternoon was enjoyable.

—F. S.

TEXARKANA, ARK.
GAZETTE
NOV 22 1951

Education Is Theme Of Boston Station

Boston, Nov. . . . (INS) — Full length "live" performances of one of the world's great symphony orchestras are being channeled into the homes of New Englanders by a new Boston radio station.

Through the facilities of WGBH, a high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are within the hearing range of an estimated 208,000 families.

The station, which has its studios in Symphony Hall, is operated with the advice and co-operation of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

The council's members include the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston — Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern and Tufts.

The station's aim is to offer programs of general education for all groups in the community. In addition to the symphony, WGBH presents:

1. Comprehensive interpretations of world news and events. 2. Full-length dramatic productions, 3. A children's hour. 4. Forums on world affairs with distinguished New England scholars and scientists. 5. Poetry readings by noted poets. 6. Regular college or extension courses recorded in the classrooms.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 10 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the continued indisposition of Charles Munch, Richard Burgin is conducting the current pair of Symphony concerts; and this time only one number of the program has been changed. Instead of beginning yesterday with the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Redemption," the associate conductor put in its place Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," that unaccountably had not been played at the regular concerts since 1936. After it came, as originally scheduled, Haydn's Cello Concerto in D major and Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Gregor Piatigorsky playing the solo cello part in both and Joseph de Pasquale joining him as solo viola in the tone poem of Strauss.

If all concerts under Mr. Burgin's direction could proceed as smoothly and to such generally happy outcome as this one, we need not ask for a better conductor. It was good to hear the orchestra playing once more in a fashion so completely relaxed. This was our Boston Symphony not a changeling. And of course it was good to have Mr. Piatigorsky. Richard Strauss himself said years ago that whenever "Don Quixote" was played he wished it would be possible for Mr. Piatigorsky to assume the role of chief protagonist. No one seems to understand it as completely as he does; no one else is capable of making any one of the countless musical and musico-dramatic details so compelling.

This is not just a piece of music; it is a tonal drama, without stage or actors, but a drama, nevertheless. Yesterday its progress was vividly conveyed by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, by Mr. Piatigorsky as the Don, and Mr. De Pasquale as his tubby squire, Sancho Panza. Not in a long time have we heard so fine a performance of "Don Quixote." By the way, the program book was in error in saying that it was Mr. Piatigorsky who played the solo cello here in this work in March, 1950.

Apparently it has not been settled to everyone's satisfaction that Haydn, not Anton Kraft, was the author of this D major Concerto, but whoever composed it (and it probably was Haydn), it is a charming piece, and yesterday it went delightfully. Delightful, too, was the performance of Mendelssohn's Overture. With Mendelssohn we must now pick and choose, but certain things are too good to be passed up. We have not heard "Fingal's Cave" at a Symphony concert since 1933 or "The Fair Melusine," Mendelssohn's own favorite among his overtures, since 1906. I don't suppose anybody plays the ophicleide today, though Symphony Hall has one in its collection of ancient and obsolete instruments. However, the big bass tuba, used yesterday in Mendelssohn's Overture, does not produce the effect that the composer had in mind. Its tone is too heavy, for one thing, and it cannot so well suggest the donkey's bray of Bottom.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 24 1951

Munch Recuperating From Illness in N. Y.

Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is convalescing in a New York hotel from a virus infection.

Although the 60-year-old maestro has two nurses in attendance, Boston associates gave assurance last night that he is recuperating "satisfactorily."

Pierre Monteux, who has been guest conductor this week, will direct the orchestra at the regularly scheduled concerts next week.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 15 1951

Munch Elected Trustee

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been elected a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, it was announced yesterday by Harrison Keller, director of the Conservatory.

Symp

The B Monteux concert
Hall ye
Wagner
Debussy.

Prelud
Dance
Wagner.

Daybre
Siegfri
Debussy.

Wagner.

It w casion
Boston
the sea
Beetho bussy's Carpen
ambula
Wagne
Whe
Johnso phony thousa ductor' flag-de hour in tees, M Charles him."

Yeste
ture to once a concert
the sta flowers an info thousar have cl display fashion tions n same a afterno

For t well to towerir day ar race o place t poser orchest have cl audien incand of con prefer for that recogn igy of shall c of Mon
incomp chestra challen concept

Yeste
gram Debuss better excerpt
St. Sel
Debuss
his insp pleasan does th
the bal
Yet nei stance

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 24 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a splendid gesture to bring Pierre Monteux back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony last season and a further step in the right direction to engage him in that capacity for the present one. Mr. Monteux conducted the concert of last Tuesday and that of yesterday afternoon and he will remain on the job through a week from tomorrow when he repeats the program of yesterday and this evening. As proof of the internationalism of music, the French-born conductor is offering at this sixth pair of concerts an all-German program. And let it be said right now that his French blood did not prevent him from giving the right pace and accent, the proper mood and spirit to Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, as orchestrated by Respighi, the "Scottish" Symphony of Mendelssohn, Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The last-named composer has fared pretty well this season. Thus far, we have heard "Death and Transfiguration" from Mr. Munch, "Don Quixote" from Mr. Burgin and now "Till" from Mr. Monteux. Like "Death and Transfiguration" and unlike "Don Quixote," "Till" does not lean too heavily on its program. Except for the scene of the Rogue's trial and his death on the gallows, the piece makes sense as music per se, and that is what program music should do.

The same is true of Hindemith's so-called symphony. It does one no harm to have seen the Gruenewald paintings or at least a reproduction of them, yet you can virtually forget them and enjoy the "Angelic Concert," the "Entombment" and the "Temptation of St. Anthony" for the spendid music that they are. We cannot tell yet which works of Hindemith will survive, but certainly this is one that is bound to live. It has melodic strength, it is firmly built and we can only marvel at the composer's contrapuntal skill.

The third programmatic piece, Mendelssohn's "Scottish," exacts even less from the listener in this respect. We can remember with profit that the introduction was inspired by the composer's visit to Holyrood, with its touching reminders of Mary Queen of Scots. We can think, if we wish to, of the storm in the coda of the first movement as taking place on a Scottish heath, and see the warlike clans in the finale. The Symphony stands up as music—to the extent that it does stand up. The first movement and the Scherzo, the one really Scottish movement, are still all right; the Adagio and the finale have begun to fade, though the A major passage tacked on to the latter still sounds. And it is probably true that, in spite of its fine points, the work as a whole is inferior to the "Italian." And speaking of things Italian, one can question the taste in Respighi's orchestration of the Bach Passacaglia; it is almost too inflated. But the music, as music, is magnificent, and that is what really matters.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 27 1951

Munch Ill, Can't Conduct Bostonians for a Month

Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be unable to conduct the orchestra until late in December because of illness, a representative disclosed yesterday.

Mr. Munch is suffering from a virus infection, it was explained. Because of his illness he did not conduct the orchestra's Boston concerts on Nov. 2, 3, 9 and 10, but returned to the podium for the New York concerts on Nov. 14, 16 and 17. It was explained that resumption of his duties before complete recovery had contributed to a recurrence of the illness.

Ernest Ansermet, founder and conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, will fly to New York from Switzerland next week to conduct the orchestra until January—or longer, if necessary, it was explained. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston organization's next concerts at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 8, and on Dec. 7 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

NORTH ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CHRONICLE

NOV 27 1951

TO SUBSTITUTE

BOSTON (INS)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning [illegible] as a substitute for Charles Munch, who is ill. Guest Conductor Pierre Monteux will conclude his assignment with the Boston unit Dec. 8 in New York.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 24 1951

MUSIC

Perfect Afternoon at the Symphony, With Monteux Conducting

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was just about a perfect afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday, with Pierre Monteux making his first appearance in the "regular" series during his current visit as guest conductor.

This was a perfect afternoon—or as nearly that as you are likely to get in this life—because there was so much polish, elegance and correctness in the way everything was played. There were no extreme tempos, nothing forced or exaggerated, nothing scamped or understated. This sort of music-making is possible only with a great conductor and a great orchestra.

The program, too, was remarkably varied, ranging from the Respighi orchestration of Bach's C minor Passacaglia and Fugue, through Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" to Richard Strauss of "Till Eulenspiegel." Each of these pieces has its own solid merit.

As a conductor of the most intelligent and sensitive musicianship, controlled by a moderation peculiarly and personally his own, Mr. Monteux is not a rousing interpreter. "Till," for example, has had more excitement with other conductors. But the sheer beauty of sound, the uninterrupted line of the music, the neatness with which this tricky score was unfolded, were full compensation.

On the other hand, it was amazing how the "Monteux touch" brought an unusual, warming glow to Mendelssohn's rather faded old Symphony. Perhaps it was because nothing spectacular was attempted that this work, less vivacious than Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, though more spirited than the "Reformation," took on the illusion of new life. Or perhaps it was the pervading clarity, almost a transparence, so dominant a feature of Monteux's work, that did the trick.

Generally speaking, weight and thickness dull the performance of orchestral music. With Monteux there is no weight and no thickness, save the specific gravity and the texture natural and appropriate to each composition. This was vividly apparent in the Bach-Respighi transcription, a work natively massive, yet in which, as Monteux reads it, you can hear everything going on.

But the most forceful proof of Monteux' versatility came with the three symphonic excerpts from the Hindemith opera "Mathis der Maler." This is astringent, linear, un-sentimental, sharply etched music, inescapably of the modern temper. Such music requires, for its re-creation, not only a virtuoso orchestra, but conducting that is technically direct and impersonal of expression. This music cannot be "interpreted," it just has to be played, with high regard for details and the over-all line. Then it emerges as a modern masterpiece. Yesterday it sounded exactly like that.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 24 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the sixth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor ..... Bach-Respighi
Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 56 ..... Mendelssohn
"Mathis de Maler" ..... Hindemith
Till Eulenspiegel ..... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Pierre Monteux returned yesterday afternoon to give us one of the most typical examples of the contemporary symphonic concert it would be possible to imagine.

Everything was entirely in order: The program contained one "modern" work in the Hindemith (though it's now old enough and familiar enough to disturb no one), two favorite old standbys in Mendelssohn's grateful little Scottish Symphony and Strauss' unendingly satisfying "Till" and, as a traditional curtain-raiser, Bach's G minor Passacaglia and Fugue in Resphigi's orchestral transcription. Nobody could possibly listen to this program and go home feeling he hadn't been musically requited.

Next, the orchestra was in absolutely the top of its form. Even the most acute ears could have detected nothing sufficiently out of order to be worth the mention. The technical aspects of the playing in every choir, indeed, every chair, were as near perfection itself as so large an ensemble could ever produce in live concert.

Then Mr. Monteux himself was, at the peak of his form, though it is much to be doubted he is ever anything else. Thus the orchestral textures were perfectly integrated, the balances were incomparably sensitive, the clarity of voice from top to bottom and from inside out were no less then crystalline, the tone qualities warm and radiant throughout and the climaxes powerful but never out of control. It was, in short, the ultimate in the big-time live concert of our times.

It is at this point the music critic usually inserts the inevitable "but" or to knock the whole thing down flat. There is no "but" in this notice, and to point out that for all its soundness the concert was not a really stimulating one as a musical experience must not be construed so.

It could hardly be otherwise for the visiting conductor to fail to do the things he knows best and best knows the audience loves best. So it may merely be said here that to live with this sort of a program week in and week out would prove pretty tiresome and advance the cause of music not one inch. On the contrary, I am sure it would, in the end, kill the living symphony concert for good and all.

Having noted this, let me once again mention the incredible musicianship of Pierre Monteux. His style is entirely without mannerism; he stands solidly planted on the conductor's stand, his feet slightly apart. He may, on occasion, lean forward a little or turn slightly to face his string choirs (it may be mentioned he re-seated the orchestra, second violins to the right outside, cellos to the left inside, etc.), but there is never a trace of physical emotion. He does what he does with his stick, and his baton technique is probably without parallel today.

Mr. Monteux's program next week offers no less than eight pieces, five by Wagner and three by Debussy. Nobody can seem to remember how long it is since a program containing this many pieces has been heard at the regular concerts, but I'd venture to guess at least 30.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

NOV 27 1951

Ansermet of Switzerland to Lead Symphony During Munch's Illness

Ernest Ansermet has accepted the invitation of Charles Munch,

ERNEST ANSERMET

the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take over the concerts of his orchestra following Pierre Monteux's guest appearances, which will end in New York on Dec. 8.

Munch is under medical advice to rest for a substantial period because of a circulatory disturbance which has developed after a recent virus infection.

Ansermet, who has visited this country to lead our principal orchestras as guest in the last four seasons, conducted the Boston Symphony in January, 1949. He first visited this country as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and in 1918 founded his own Orchestre de la Suisse Romande. He has since appeared as guest in many parts of the world.

The distinguished Swiss conductor will fly from Geneva on Dec. 4, and have his first rehearsal in Boston on Monday, Dec. 10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

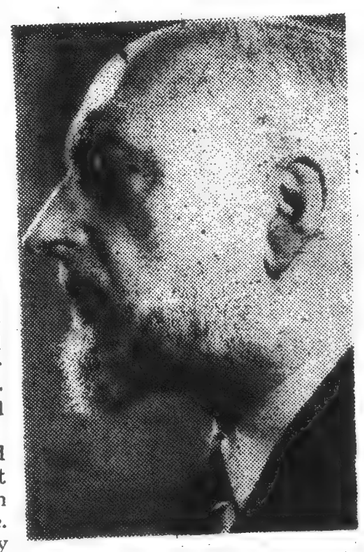
NOV 27 1951

Ansermet to Conduct While Munch is Ill

Boston, Nov. 27.—(UP)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will fly to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of music director Charles Munch.

Ansermet accepted an invitation to lead the orchestra after the last guest appearance of Pierre Monteux in New York, Dec. 8. He will fly from Geneva Dec. 4 to fill in for Munch, who is suffering from a circulatory disturbance which resulted from a virus infection.

Ansermet first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe and in 1919 founded his own orchestra, de le Suisse Romande. He conducted the Boston Symphony once before as a guest in January, 1949.



Ernest Ansermet

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 25 1951

'Big' Works Are Featured In This Month's Recordings

By RUDOLPH ELIE

In a flurry of pre-Christmas releases designed for the "big" market, the recording companies have come up this month with a number of standard classics in equally big performnaces. Of these, clearly, Victor's LP recording of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux ranks with the finest examples of both performance and recording to be issued so far. The labors attendant on recording this work, which Monteux himself introduced to a startled world in 1913, are already as legendary as the first performance, but the results are hardly open to dispute. It is truly the last word, and one of the best recordings in recent years, marked by a prodigious orchestral virtuosity and recording technique.

TWO "DON JUANS"

For reasons obscure to me, Victor is now out with a version of Strauss' "Don Juan" by Toscanini and the NBC orchestra and one by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. The first is coupled with Siegfried's Rhine Journey, the second with the Siegfried Idyll. The Koussevitzky version is louder, more hot-blooded and generally more exciting than the Toscanini version, which is clearer but a little pallid. The choice, however, really lies in which you like best, the Rhine Journey or

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

Lion's Roar Can't Scare Boston Symphony Players

Famed Orchestra Has Many Strange Sound Effects Called for by Composers, Including Washboard, Slapstick, Church Bells, Train Rail and Whistle

By GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

IT may be a bit of a surprise to lovers of classical music, the folks who crowd Symphony Hall week in and week out through the winter season, to learn that along with the conventional instruments of that distinguished body of musicians known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they have heard a wide range of lesser-known noise makers ranging all the way from a hunk of scrap metal to the slapstick of the old-time clown.

These curious props of a symphony orchestra are called for by composers and must be provided by the learned musical scholar Leslie J. Rogers, officially known as the librarian of the orchestra.

Mr. Rogers gets the job because in checking the music to be played he learns the instruments and noise makers prescribed by the composer and it is up to him to see that they are at hand at concert time.

Once landed at Symphony Hall by Rogers the various props are turned over to the custody of that very busy man Harvey Genereux, stage manager for the orchestra. He sees that everything needed is on the big stage, both at Symphony Hall and on every stage along the way when the orchestra is on the road.

The men of the percussion section, the drum beaters in less classical lingo, get the job of playing anything that falls outside the regular departmental listing of symphony instruments.

From Simon Sternburg, who plays the side drums, came most of the information regarding the many curious articles that have been enlisted to complete the orchestration of symphony selections.

SCRAP METAL

There was, for instance, the lion's roar machine, and a very lusty lion-voice it is, too. That was called for in "Jungle, A Symphonic Movement," by Werner Josten.

The hunk of scrap metal previously mentioned consisted of a section of railroad rail, and it had to be precisely 14 inches long. It was requested by Daniele Amfitheatrof for his "American Panorama." The why of the 14 inches was never explained, but he got what he asked for.

One of Sternburg's toughest assignments was the working of a telegrapher's key in Samuel Barber's "Air Corps" symphony. One of the things Mr. Sternburg had neglected in the course of his musical education was telegraphy. However, Robert Lanning Humphrey, a former Post writer, now connected with Symphony, and once a dot-and-dash man himself, supplied the lessons and all went well.

A much easier assignment was the procurement of a child's washboard used in Stravinski's "Rite of Spring."

In Philip James' "Station WGZBX," performed in 1933, several typewriters were called for. Mr. Sternburg doesn't remember much about them except that he didn't and couldn't have played them. Nobody in percussion did, and although several players remember them as part of the score, nobody seems to know who played them or where.

There was a nightingale whistle called for in Respighi's "Pines of Rome." And on a former occasion, the necessary bird calls were supplied by an offstage phonograph, presumably operated by the ever-efficient stage manager, Mr. Genereux.

GONGS, RATTLES

Henry Eicham's Javanese music, which had quite a run at Symphony at one time, introduced what Mr. Sternburg described as "a whole box of queer items." They included gongs and odd bits of specially shaped wood and hollow bowls of various sizes. Yes, poor Simon had to play them all. But fortunately, only one at a time.

A ratchet rattle was called for in Musorgski's "Pictures at an Art Exhibit," which also required the musical services of a burlesque comedian's slapstick to help the required harmony along.

A dangling sheet of metal, similar to the "thunder machine" used backstage in olden days, lent added tonal wealth to a selection called "Soviet Iron Foundry."

Honegger's once-popular modern composition, "Pacific 231," required a regulation locomotive whistle, but so far as anybody in percussion can remember, nobody ever asked for a steamboat whistle!

For Gershwin's notable orchestral contribution, "An American in Paris," which called for Paris taxi horns, some thoughtful person, seeing the number announced, brought in some genuine Parisian taxi horns. That was for the Pops, however, as Symphony has not yet added this particular Gershwin number to its repertoire, although it has done others with distinction.

NO CANNON

While other orchestras have reportedly used real cannon in the playing of Tchaikovsky's "Overture 1812," the more staid Boston Symphony has contented itself with supplying the necessary boom-booms with the regulation timpani of the percussion section.

Charles Loeffler called, and not in vain, for the addition of a harmonica for his tone poem, "Memories of My Childhood," but nobody remembers playing the durned thing. Somebody must have, for everybody heard it.

A cowbell ding-donged its nonmellifluous contribution to the playing of "The Domestic Symphony," of Richard Strauss, and wire brushes played what may have been an exciting part in another of Mahler's symphonies.

Chinese temple blocks have been used to represent the rapid movement of horses on several occasions, and, at the Pops, a pop-gun, quite appropriately, is a regular part of the orchestra lineup when Fiedler conducts "Pop Goes the Weasel."

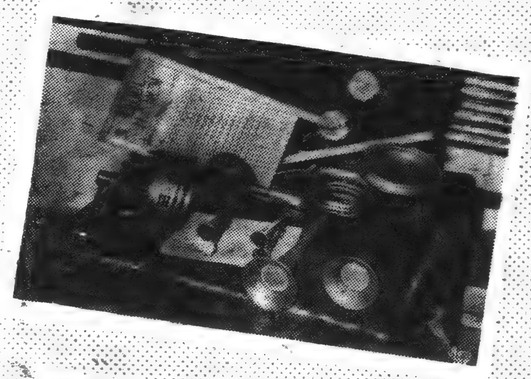
A wind machine has appeared at Symphony on several programs, notably in the "Ein Heldenleben" of Richard Strauss.

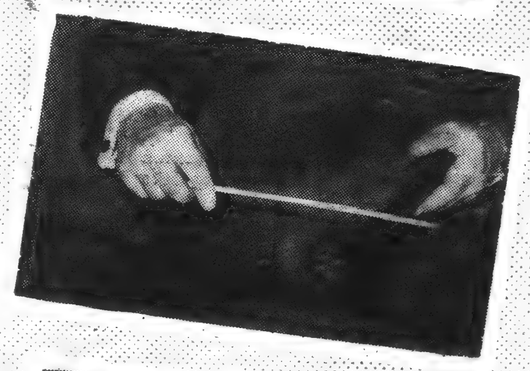
And, due to Conductor Charles Munch's objection to the use of tubular chimes for the church bells called for in Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," the orchestra now boasts ownership of two genuine French country church bells cast for its especial needs and procured by a member of the orchestra, Louis Speyer, while on a trip to France between seasons.

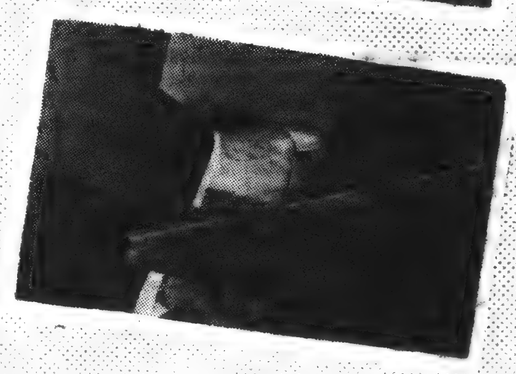
George Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony, tells an amusing story of one prop he once had to invent while on tour with an orchestra he directed in Europe. "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, was to be played and upon arrival it was discovered that the xylophone, which was used to represent the rattling of the bones of the dancing skeletons of the piece, had been left behind.

Henschel started to improvise the needed noise makers. He borrowed a pair of drumsticks from the percussion section and darted from chair to chair trying out the results of rapping the sticks against the chair slats. Finally he found a chair that yielded the proper bone-rattling tones and the day was saved.

(Above) Arthur Fiedler, left, with popgun used in "Pop Goes the Weasel," and Simon Sternburg showing rattle he has used several times.







(Top to bottom) Tiny cymbals used in Javanese music, Lion's roar with handle, and other odd symphony "instruments," notched stick used in Brazilian music, and slapstick called for in "Pictures at an Art Exhibit."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 28 1951

Music

Monteux Conducts Boston Symphony After Long Absence

By RUTH TRIPP

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the second concert of the series and his appearance as guest conductor marked his return here after an absence of 27 years. Veterans Memorial Auditorium was filled to capacity and the audience gave the eminent conductor an ovation.

The concert proved to be something of an intangible collector's item. Monteux brought us his choicest selection in the playing of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." He was the conductor to introduce this controversial music to the musical world at its first performance in Paris in 1913, when the Diaghilev Ballet danced these "Pictures of Pagan Russia." It was as if the music were being heard for the first time last evening, so completely did Monteux turn every facet of the brilliant orchestration to the light. His conducting without score was a tour de force and the manner in which the orchestra responded to his subtle direction was only possible because of their amazing virtuosity.

Every little phrase of the woodwinds was spoken with the most effective inflection. The great burden of discord fell to the strings and their task was to make the background of sound, curiously awry, for the startling effects of the other sections. The brass was flagrantly bold. The percussion spoke with the most understandable vocabulary. There was no mistaking its pagan rhythmic insistence. Stravinsky's music is still controversial but as Pierre Monteux interprets it, whatever there is of interest and beauty is brought out.

The first part of the program, Beethoven's "Overture to Coriolanus" and his Symphony No. 6 in F major were thoroughly delightful. Here again, no score was used. The delicacy of tone and artistry of phrasing in the "pastoral" symphony were exquisite. The melodious themes, in the simplicity of their exposition were indeed restful. In retrospect, this part of the program was delightfully old-fashioned and highly desirable.

There were undoubtedly many members of the audience who would recall Pierre Monteux at his farewell appearance here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Another ovation was given him at that time, over a quarter of a century ago. The rafters of old Infantry Hall rang with applause as he accepted the gift presented to him. The late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, then president of Brown University, made the gracious and dignified presentation speech for the committee and one of my most vivid recollections of the occasion is of the humble manner in which Pierre Monteux took the small bronze replica of the statue, "Invocation to the Great Spirit," which stands in front of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. Monteux still retains his humble manner. It carries with it the assurance of great accomplishment and the triumph which he scored last evening was a tribute to this fact.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1951

TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Boston, Nov. 26.—(AP)—Ernest Ansermet, noted Swiss conductor, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a substitute for Charles Munch, ill with a circulatory ailment, it was announced tonight. Ansermet will take over the concerts at the completion of Pierre Monteux's current guest appearances on Dec. 10.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 27 1951

Munch Is Ill; Can't Conduct BSO for a Month

NEW YORK — Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be unable to conduct the orchestra until late in December because of illness, a representative disclosed yesterday.

Munch is suffering from a virus infection, it was explained. Because of his illness he did not conduct the orchestra's Boston concerts on Nov. 2, 3, 9 and 10 but returned to the podium for the New York concerts on Nov. 14, 16 and 17. It was explained that resumption of his duties before complete recovery had contributed to a recurrence of the illness.

Ernest Ansermet, founder and conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, will fly to New York from Switzerland next week to conduct the orchestra until January—or longer, if necessary, it was explained. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Boston organization's next concerts at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 8 and on Dec. 7 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 27 1951

Swiss To Conduct Boston Symphony

BOSTON (UP)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will fly to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra during the illness of Music Director Charles Munch.

Ansermet accepted an invitation to lead the orchestra following the last guest appearance of Pierre Monteux in New York, Dec. 8. He will fly from Geneva, Dec. 4, to fill in for Munch, who is suffering from a circulatory disturbance which resulted from a virus infection.

Ansermet first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe and in 1919 founded his own orchestra De la Suisse Romande. He conducted the Boston Symphony once before as guest in January, 1949.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 27 1951

ANSERMET TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, Nov. 27 (UP)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will fly to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of music director Charles Munch.

Ansermet accepted an invitation to lead the orchestra following the last guest appearance of Pierre Monteux in New York Dec. 8. He will fly from Geneva Dec. 4 to fill in for Munch, who is suffering from a circulatory disturbance which resulted from a virus infection.

Ansermet first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe and in 1919 founded his own Orchestra de la Suisse Romande. He conducted the Boston Symphony once before as a guest in January 1949.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
NOV 28 1951

***

Maestro Is Ill

We are sorry to learn that illness has temporarily stilled the baton of conductor Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although he is accused of getting "too much" out of his musicians, his fame, and for our part his brilliance, rests in his ability to pluck latent tonal qualities from previously untaxed performers. He is one of the best in the business, a fact in accordance with the Boston Symphony's tradition. We join thousands in wishing him speedy recovery.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 27 1951

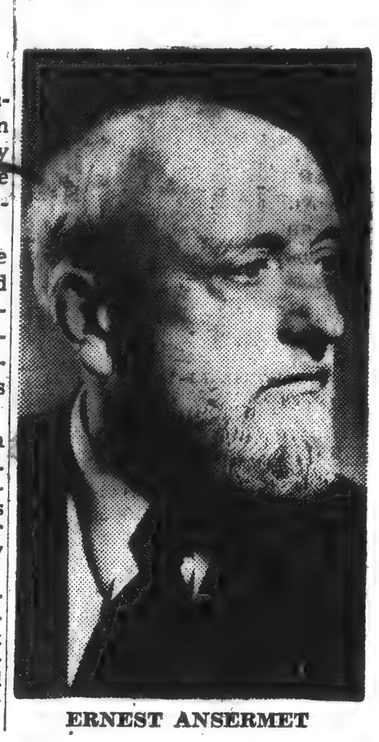
Munch Ill, Ansermet to Substitute

Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a substitute for the ill Charles Munch, it was announced last night.

Munch is under medical advice to rest for a substantial period because of a circulatory disturbance which developed after a recent virus infection. Munch issued the invitation to the Swiss conductor.

Ansermet will fly from Geneva Dec. 4, and will have his first rehearsal with the orchestra Monday, Dec. 10. Pierre Monteux's guest appearances as conductor of the orchestra will end in New York Dec. 8.

Ansermet made a guest appearance as the Symphony's conductor in January, 1949. He first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and in 1918 founded his own Orchestra de la Suisse Romande.



ERNEST ANSERMET

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 27 1951

ERNEST ANSERMET

For a time the Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to have a new conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The virus infection from which Charles Munch has suffered durilng the past few weeks, and that kept him from conducting two pairs of Symphony concerts, has developed into a circulatory disturbance that his medical advisers say calls for a substantial period of rest.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York with Pierre Monteux, who has been conducting here for a fortnight. On its return to Boston, Mr. Ansermet will take over, meeting the players for his first rehearsal on Monday, Dec. 10, and conducting the concerts of Dec. 14 and 15. However, the distinguished Swiss maestro, who came to Boston in 1915 with the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, will not be leading the Symphony for the first time, since he was here as guest for a week in January, 1949, and was most favorably received by press and public. Born in Vevey, Switzerland, in 1883, Mr. Ansermet started out to be a mathematician, believing that his lack of skill on any musical instrument prevented him from following a musical career, but solved that problem by becoming a conductor.

Although Mr. Ansermet did not appear with the Boston Symphony until the 1948-49 season, which was Dr. Koussevitzky's final one, he had directed other American orchestras in the two previous seasons and he has guested in this country since that time. In 1918 he founded his own Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, in Geneva; and the excellent recordings made by this fine organization, under his direction, are familiar to record collectors. Mr. Ansermet is something of a specialist in modern music, notably that of Stravinsky, but he is at home in music of all schools.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1951

MUSIC

Monteux Conducts Boston Symphony Here After Long Absence

By RUTH TRIPP

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the second concert of the series and his appearance as guest conductor marked his return here after an absence of 27 years. Veterans Memorial Auditorium was filled to capacity and the audience gave the eminent conductor an ovation.

The concert proved to be something of an intangible collector's item. Monteux brought us his choicest selection in the playing of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." He was the conductor to introduce this controversial music to the musical world at its first performance in Paris in 1913, when the Diaghilev Ballet danced these "Pictures of Pagan Russia." It was as if the music were being heard for the first time last evening, so completely did Monteux turn every facet of the brilliant orchestration to the light. His conducting without score was a tour de force and the manner in which the orchestra responded to his subtle direction was only possible because of their amazing virtuosity.

Every little phrase of the woodwinds was spoken with the most effective inflection. The great burden of discord fell to the strings and their task was to make the background of sound, curiously awry, for the startling effects of the other sections. The brass was flagrantly bold. The percussion spoke with the most understandable vocabulary. There was no mistaking its pagan rhythmic insistence. Stravinsky's music is still controversial but as Pierre Monteux interprets it, whatever there is of interest and beauty is brought out.

The first part of the program, Beethoven's "Overture to Coriolanus" and his Symphony No. 6 in F major were thoroughly delightful. Here again, no score was used. The delicacy of tone and artistry of phrasing in the "pastoral" symphony were exquisite. The melodious themes, in the simplicity of their exposition were indeed restful. In retrospect, this part of the program was delightfully old-fashioned and highly desirable.

There were undoubtedly many members of the audience who would recall Pierre Monteux at his farewell appearance here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Another ovation was given him at that time, over a quarter of a century ago. The rafters of old Infantry Hall rang with applause as he accepted the gift presented to him. The late Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, then president of Brown University, made the gracious and dignified presentation speech for the committee and one of my most vivid recollections of the occasion is of the humble manner in which Pierre Monteux took the small bronze replica of the statue, "Invocation to the Great Spirit," which stands in front of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. Monteux still retains his humble manner. It carries with it the assurance of great accomplishment and the triumph which he scored last evening was a tribute to this fact.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
NOV 27 1951

Swiss To Lead Boston Symphony

Boston, Nov. 27—(UP)—Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor, will fly to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the illness of music director Charles Munch.

Ansermet accepted an invitation to lead the orchestra following the last guest appearance of Pierre Monteux in New York Dec. 8. He will fly from Geneva Dec. 4 to fill in for Munch, who is suffering from a circulatory disturbance which resulted from a virus infection.

Ansermet first visited the United States as conductor of the Ballet Russe and in 1919 founded his own Orchestra de la Suisse Romande. He conducted the Boston Symphony once before as a guest in January 1949.

[37]

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

[illegible] program [illegible] fine program [illegible] "Tannhauser" [illegible] forgave was as fine as the one we heard from him yesterday afternoon. After all this time, it would be difficult to be certain. But at least, that of yesterday was the soundest one that we have heard at the Symphony Concerts since.

Mr. Monteux followed that great Wagnerian, Karl Muck, and [illegible] if his Wagner performances were all that they should have been, we were not going to be greatly impressed with the fact. I won't say that Koussevitsky never did Wagner well, but he often missed the boat. Nor was Mr. Munch's one venture with him a happy one. Be that as it may, yesterday Mr. Monteux appeared in this Wagner-Debussy program as a veritable prophet of the German music dramatist. The other Wagner numbers on this seventh program are the Prelude to "Parsifal" and two excerpts from "Goetterdammerung": the Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey sequence and the Death Music of Siegfried, while Debussy is represented by two excerpts from Act I of "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and by "Gigues" and the ballet, "Jeux."

In the matter of interpretation and performance Mr. Monteux was quite as successful with the music of his countryman as he was with that of Wagner. If the former came off second best, it was because he was represented by some of his lesser works. "La Mer" or the Nocturnes, or the Prelude to the "Faun" would have stood up better in comparison with the Wagner numbers in between which these other Debussy pieces were sandwiched. However, there is a certain kinship between the "Saint Sebastian" music and "Parsifal," the mysticism of the one going not a little to that quality in the other, and if "Gigues" and "Jeux" are not the first-rate Debussy, they are both fascinating studies in orchestral timbres and in rhythm. Their melodic content, in other words, is slight.

This fortnight under Mr. Monteux has been a joy. There has been some demurring that his programs have not contained more in the way of contemporary novelty, though he has given us both Hindemith and Stravinsky. He has, however, presented things that lots of people like to hear. And he has let us see just how well our orchestra can play and how well it can be made to sound. There were many moments of astonishing tonal beauty in yesterday's concert. Mr. Monteux has a perfect ear. He has flawless taste. He seems to sense how each composer really intended to have his music played. His command of the orchestra is so absolute and secure that the men are perfectly at their ease and can, therefore, give of their best, which is exactly what they have done; in the first Tuesday concert, in last week's Friday-Saturday pair, and in the concert of yesterday. Mr. Monteux being who he is, tonight's concert should be the same thing right over again. The distinguished guest takes leave of us tomorrow, repeating the program that he offered a week ago. One could ask for nothing better than to have him back next year.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 1 - 1951

MUSIC

Splendid Wagner and Debussy by Pierre Monteux at Symphony

Seventh program in the Friday-Saturday series, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux guest conductor. Wagner: Prelude to "Parsifal"; Debussy: Two Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Wagner: Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, and Siegfried's Death Music from "Gotterdammerung"; Debussy: "Gigues," "Jeux"; Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

By CYRUS DURGIN

You never can tell. On paper, a program devoted to familiar Wagner and less familiar Debussy had not looked especially interesting. In fact, it seemed a little too comfortable, like old shoes. But when that program came to actual performance, by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, it proved one of the most captivating, even exciting, concerts of the recent past. The reason is plain: splendid playing by the virtuosi of this orchestra, and superlative conducting by a great master of the art.

Mr. Monteux had not done the obvious thing of giving half to Wagner and half to Debussy, but had arranged the various pieces so that they formed more or less of an expressive continuity. It is said that one of Mr. Monteux's favorite composers is Wagner (the other being Brahms), and that is altogether believable in the light of his readings yesterday.

If the incense-laden Prelude to "Parsifal" is dragged, the effect is terribly weakened. But Mr. Monteux took it at just the right pace, and the dedicated majesty of the music was renewed. Once again, here as in every composition, the conductor's insistence upon an absolutely clear texture of sound and upon the utmost refinement of ensemble, were pleasurably felt and of the greatest importance. Equally important was his instinct for exactly correct speed.

There is something primal and of the fresh morning of the legendary world in the music of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring." They are qualities more sensed than discerned. But they are there, and they have survived too frequent performance in the case of these familiar orchestral excerpts, and the soiling mud of nonsensical quasi-ideological notion which were read into the "Ring" during the ghastly nightmare of the Hitlerian years.

Received without such blemish, and done with such triumphant mastery as Mr. Monteux brought to them, these excerpts are once again new and muscular, heroic and exalted. Never in my memory was the Death Music [illegible] made so exciting. As for the "Tannhauser" Overture, that faded victim of 10,000 desultory [illegible] glowed and shimmered, its bright colors and its young passion restored.

What with the "Saint Sebastian" excerpts, "Gigues" and "Jeux," this was a very large amount of Debussy for one afternoon, especially since they are all of much the same style, having been composed within three consecutive years. Wagner, contrariwise, was represented by three distinct styles.

Nonetheless, as you would expect from so Gallic a Frenchman, they were done with verve and delicacy, strength and fire, according to the various demands of the composer, who, it does no harm to repeat, was no languid painter of amorphous pastels. Best of all, Debussy's oftentimes intricate and always subtle rhythms were firmly and deftly traced.

In short, another practically perfect afternoon.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1951

CATHALENE PARKER, mezzo-soprano, makes her local debut in Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the seventh concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Wagner ..... Prelude to "Parsifal"
Debussy..Excerpts from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"
Prelude: The Court of the Lilies
Dance of Ecstasy and Finale
Wagner...Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung"
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey
Siegfried's Death Music
Debussy.....''Gigues,'' Images No. 1; ''Jeux,'' Poeme Danse
Wagner.....Overture to ''Tannhauser''

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was in April, 1924. The occasion was the final concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season. On the program were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

When it was over, as Earle Johnson relates it in his "Symphony Hall, Boston," "several thousand admirers shook the conductor's hand on the flower- and flag-decked stage during a two-hour informal reception; the trustees, Major Higginson's widow, Charles Loeffler and others beside him."

Yesterday afternoon the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" once again brought a symphony concert to a close, but this time the stage was not decked with flowers and flags, nor was there an informal reception of several thousand admirers. For times have changed; sentimental public displays of emotion are out of fashion. Yet the audience's emotions must have been about the same as they were on that April afternoon 27 years ago.

For this was once again a farewell to Pierre Monteux, one of the towering giants of music in our day and virtually the last of a race of musician-conductors who place the inspiration of the composer and the virtuosity of the orchestra above their own. Times have changed in that respect, too; audiences today, bred on the more incandescent choreographic style of conducting are not likely to prefer Monteux's stolidity. Nor, for that matter, are they likely to recognize in it the veritable prodigy of musicianship that it is; we shall doubtless not see the like of Monteux's baton technique, the incomparable clarity of his orchestral textures and the unchallenged taste of his musical conceptions for some time to come.

Yesterday, in a semi-Pops program alternating Wagner with Debussy, Wagner got much the better of it save in the marvelous excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," which represent Debussy at the absolute peak of his inspiration. "Gigues" makes a pleasant impression, as indeed does the concert version of "Jeux," the ballet music to a tennis game. Yet neither offers too much substance especially when contrasted with the heavier proclamations of Wagner.

"Jeux," in fact, for all its charming sound effects, its piquancies and elegant humor, much needs the ballet; as a concert piece it seems over-refined, spun-out, even fussy. Its final bars, however, with their witticisms, make their point sufficiently to leave an impression far more favorable than unfavorable.

As for the Wagner pieces, I find myself at a loss for further impressions as they are all done with such regularity everywhere they are thrice familiar. They don't exactly bore, as in-person performances of them are infrequent at these concerts, for it is always interesting to see how they go. And it may be said they went wonderfully well yesterday. The brasses have seldom been so imposing, the strings so brilliant and so rapturous. But Wagner's gigantic utterances rather pass one by these days; the heroic emotions of grief in the Funeral Music, the pious Amens of Parsifal and the pompous conceits of Tannhauser seem pretty contrived and self-conscious. This is not to say they still don't make their effect; you can't employ 110 men as Wagner does and put your audience to sleep. Its mind may wander to note that Santa Claus, according to a program advertisement, plays the cello left handed, but Wagner is still in command.

And so, with the Overture to Tannhauser, Pierre Monteux once again takes his leave of Boston. But if he'll only promise to come back to us once more, we'll see what we can do about decking the hall with flags and flowers. There's no one we'd rather do it for, of that he may be very sure!

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1952

Our Orchestra's Fame

To the Editor o the Herald:

I sometimes wonder if Bostonians fully appreciate the present, international fame of their symphony orchestra. Thanks in part to the U. S. Information and Educational Services of the Department of State, which lends transcriptions to radio stations abroad, and thanks in part to the commercial distributors of phonograph records, I doubt if a day now goes by in almost any part of the world when an announcer does not say, in some language, "We shall now hear such-and-such work played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky," or, as the case may be, "by the Boston Pops Orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler."

Here in Israel the government radio station, Kol Israel, devotes most of Shabbath (Saturday) morning to the playing of classical records. Nearly always the program includes at least one work performed by the Boston Symphony. At several other times during the week we are likely to hear some lighter numbers played by Mr. Fiedler's band. The result is that Boston is now as well known to modern Israelis as, let us say, cities like Jerusalem and Beersheba were to the Bible-reading Puritans who founded Boston three centuries ago!

Boston has a precious institution in its orchestra which has now also become, through the wonders of electric recording and radio broadcasting, the city's most influential advertisement. It is reassuring to know that under Charles Munch's leadership it is in good hands.

LEONARD WARE,
Public Affairs Officer, U. S. Embassy, Tel Aviv.

Monteux in Second Week with Symphony

Monitor Dec. 1

Compositions by Wagner and Debussy Share Program

By Harold Rogers

It seemed at the outset—when Pierre Monteux chose equal portions of Wagner and Debussy for the same program—that our noted guest conductor was fostering either a foolish whim or an act of genius. But when he conducted this program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, the correspondences between these Titans of German and French music became logically clear. Monteux was prompted by genius, of that there can be no doubt.

* * *

Each composer founded a school and brought it to a culmination that admitted of no further development. Each was an iconoclast, destroying nearly every tradition except a sense of tonality, but exhausting nearly every modulative device that tonality can be put to.

Their styles, however, are almost diametrically opposed. Yesterday's concert in Symphony Hall might be likened to the eating of Sauerbraten and potato pancakes with a charming companion who is perfumed with Chanel No. 5. The fragrances do not blend, but they are not offensive when mingled.

Monteux's Wagner is dry, divorced from emotionalism, and a pleasure to listen to. How resplendent were the brasses in the Prelude to "Parsifal," how opulent the cellos, how magnificent the Dresden amens!

Next we heard the shimmering textures of Debussy's music to the first act of Gabriele d'Annunzio's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien." Monteux apparently indicates more with the tip of his baton than he does in any other way. With it he inscribes each delicate nuance, each mounting crescendo. From this score he gave a vibrant reading of "The Court of the Lillies," the "Dance of Ecstasy," and the Finale.

* * *

Then to Wagner again with excerpts from "Götterdämmerung." The conductor achieved some marvelous subito pianissimo effects in "Daybreak"; and the dawn, as Mr. Kipling said, came up like thunder. James Stagliano's horn solos in "Siegfried's Death Music" were eloquently brought off, as were the orotund passages for the four Wagner tubas.

The post-intermission period opened with Debussy's "Gigues," a delicate dithyramb fashioned of spun glass, it would seem, the rhythms so fragile they shatter before they become too violent. This score was companioned by the equally gossamer "Jeux," the ballet Debussy wrote for Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, danced by Nijinsky. Monteux (who conducted the Paris première in 1913) brought the evanescent scintillations of this episode score into vivid focus.

* * *

Debussy's fragile music made way for the chanting pilgrims of the "Tannhäuser" Overture. Wagner, who seldom has his day in Symphony Hall, sang forth in all his bombastic glory. One ecstatic lady, during the final applause, exclaimed that it took her back 40 years. Monteux made the "Tannhäuser" a memory worth reviving.

[31]

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Pierre Monteux ended his five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in April, 1924, the last piece on his final program was the Overture to "Tannhauser." No doubt, the performance was as fine as the one we heard from him yesterday afternoon. After all this time, it would be difficult to be certain. But at least, that of yesterday, was the soundest one that we have heard at the Symphony Concerts since.

Mr. Monteux followed that great Wagnerian, Karl Muck, and even if his Wagner performances were all that they should have been, we were not going to be greatly impressed with the fact. I won't say that Koussevitsky never did Wagner well, but he often missed the boat. Nor was Mr. Munch's one venture with him a happy one. Be that as it may, yesterday Mr. Monteux appeared in this Wagner-Debussy program as a veritable prophet of the German music dramatist. The other Wagner numbers on this seventh program are the Prelude to "Parsifal" and two excerpts from "Goetterdammerung": the Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey sequence and the Death Music of Siegfried, while Debussy is represented by two excerpts from Act I of "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and by "Gigues" and the ballet, "Jeux."

In the matter of interpretation and performance Mr. Monteux was quite as successful with the music of his countryman as he was with that of Wagner. If the former came off second best, it was because he was represented by some of his lesser works. "La Mer" or the Nocturnes, or the Prelude to the "Faun" would have stood up better in comparison with the Wagner numbers in between which these other Debussy pieces were sandwiched. However, there is a certain kinship between the "Saint Sebastian" music and "Parsifal," the mysticism of the one owing not a little to that quality in the other, and if "Gigues" and "Jeux" are not the first-rate Debussy, they are both fascinating studies in orchestral timbres and in rhythm—their melodic content, in other words, is slight.

This fortnight under Mr. Monteux has been a joy. There has been some demurring that his programs have not contained more in the way of contemporary novelty, though he has given us both Hindemith and Stravinsky. He has, however, presented things that lots of people like to hear. And he has let us see just how well our orchestra can play and how well it can be made to sound. There were many moments of astonishing tonal beauty in yesterday's concert. Mr. Monteux has a perfect ear. He has flawless taste. He seems to sense how each composer really intended to have his music played. His command of the orchestra is so absolute and secure that the men are perfectly at their ease and can, therefore, give of their best, which is exactly what they have done; in the first Tuesday concert, in last week's Friday-Saturday pair and in the concert of yesterday. Mr. Monteux being who he is, tonight's concert should be the same thing right over again. The distinguished guest takes leave of us tomorrow, repeating the program that he offered a week ago. We could ask for nothing better than to have him back next year.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 1 - 1951

MUSIC

Splendid Wagner and Debussy by Pierre Monteux at Symphony

Seventh program in the Friday-Saturday series, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux guest conductor. Wagner: Prelude to "Parsifal"; Debussy: Two Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Wagner: Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, and Siegfried's Death Music from "Gotterdammerung"; Debussy: "Gigues," "Jeux"; Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

By CYRUS DURGIN

You never can tell. On paper, a program devoted to familiar Wagner and less familiar Debussy had not looked especially interesting. In fact, it seemed a little too comfortable, like old shoes. But when that program came to actual performance, by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, it proved one of the most captivating, even exciting, concerts of the recent past. The reason is plain: splendid playing by the virtuosi of this orchestra, and superlative conducting by a great master of the art.

Mr. Monteux had not done the obvious thing of giving half to Wagner and half to Debussy, but had arranged the various pieces so that they formed more or less of an expressive continuity. It is said that one of Mr. Monteux's favorite composers is Wagner (the other being Brahms), and that is altogether believable in the light of his readings yesterday.

If the incense-laden Prelude to "Parsifal" is dragged, the effect is terribly weakened. But Mr. Monteux took it at just the right pace, and the dedicated majesty of the music was renewed. Once again, here as in every composition, the conductor's insistence upon an absolutely clear texture of sound and upon the utmost refinement of ensemble, were pleasurably felt and of the greatest importance. Equally important was his instinct for exactly correct speed.

There is something primal and of the fresh morning of the legendary world in the music of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring." They are qualities more sensed than discerned. But they are there, and they have survived too frequent performance in the case of these familiar orchestral excerpts, and the soiling mud of nonsensical quasi-ideological notion which were read into the "Ring" during the ghastly nightmare of the Hitlerian years.

Received without such blemish, and done with such triumphant mastery as Mr. Monteux brought to them, these excerpts are once again new and muscular, heroic and exalted. Never in my memory was the Death Music of [illegible] made so exciting. As for the "Tannhauser" Overture, that faded victim of 10,000 desultory [illegible] glowed and shimmered, its bright colors and its young passion restored.

What with the "Saint Sebastian" excerpts, "Gigues" and "Jeux," this was a very large amount of Debussy for one afternoon, especially since they are all of much the same style, having been composed within three consecutive years. Wagner, contrariwise, was represented by three distinct styles.

Nonetheless, as you would expect from so Gallic a Frenchman, they were done with verve and delicacy, strength and fire, according to the various demands of the composer, who, it does no harm to repeat, was no languid painter of amorphous pastels. Best of all, Debussy's oftentimes intricate and always subtle rhythms were firmly and deftly traced.

In short, another practically perfect afternoon.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 1 - 1951

CATHALENE PARKER, mezzo-soprano, makes her local debut in Jordan Hall next Wednesday evening.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the seventh concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Wagner ..... Prelude to "Parsifal"
Debussy..Excerpts from "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"
Prelude: The Court of the Lilies
Dance of Ecstasy and Finale
Wagner...Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung"
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey
Siegfried's Death Music
Debussy.....''Gigues.'' Images No. 1; ''Jeux.'' Poeme Danse
Wagner.....Overture to "Tannhauser"

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was in April, 1924. The occasion was the final concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season. On the program were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

When it was over, as Earle Johnson relates it in his "Symphony Hall, Boston," "several thousand admirers shook the conductor's hand on the flower- and flag-decked stage during a two-hour informal reception; the trustees, Major Higginson's widow, Charles Loeffler and others beside him."

Yesterday afternoon the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" once again brought a symphony concert to a close, but this time the stage was not decked with flowers and flags, nor was there an informal reception of several thousand admirers. For times have changed; sentimental public displays of emotion are out of fashion. Yet the audience's emotions must have been about the same as they were on that April afternoon 27 years ago.

For this was once again a farewell to Pierre Monteux, one of the towering giants of music in our day and virtually the last of a race of musician-conductors who place the inspiration of the composer and the virtuosity of the orchestra above their own. Times have changed in that respect, too; audiences today, bred on the more incandescent choreographic style of conducting are not likely to prefer Monteux's stolidity. Nor, for that matter, are they likely to recognize in it the veritable prodigy of musicianship that it is; we shall doubtless not see the like of Monteux's baton technique, the incomparable clarity of his orchestral textures and the unchallenged taste of his musical conceptions for some time to come.

Yesterday, in a semi-Pops program alternating Wagner with Debussy, Wagner got much the better of it save in the marvelous excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," which represent Debussy at the absolute peak of his inspiration. "Gigues" makes a pleasant impression, as indeed does the concert version of "Jeux," the ballet music to a tennis game. Yet neither offers too much substance especially when contrasted with the heavier proclamations of Wagner.

"Jeux," in fact, for all its charming sound effects, its piquancies and elegant humor, much needs the ballet; as a concert piece it seems over-refined, spun-out, even fussy. Its final bars, however, with their witticisms, make their point sufficiently to leave an impression far more favorable than unfavorable.

As for the Wagner pieces, I find myself at a loss for further impressions as they are all done with such regularity everywhere they are thrice familiar. They don't exactly bore, as in-person performances of them are infrequent at these concerts, for it is always interesting to see how they go. And it may be said they went wonderfully well yesterday. The brasses have seldom been so imposing, the strings so brilliant and so rapturous. But Wagner's gigantic utterances rather pass one by these days; the heroic emotions of grief in the Funeral Music, the pious Amens of Parsifal and the pompous conceits of Tannhauser seem pretty contrived and self-conscious. This is not to say they still don't make their effect; you can't employ 110 men as Wagner does and put your audience to sleep. Its mind may wander to note that Santa Claus, according to a program advertisement, plays the cello left handed, but Wagner is still in command.

And so, with the Overture to Tannhauser, Pierre Monteux once again takes his leave of Boston. But if he'll only promise to come back to us once more, we'll see what we can do about decking the hall with flags and flowers. There's no one we'd rather do it for, of that he may be very sure!

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1952

Our Orchestra's Fame

To the Editor o the Herald:

I sometimes wonder if Bostonians fully appreciate the present, international fame of their symphony orchestra. Thanks in part to the U. S. Information and Educational Services of the Department of State, which lends transcriptions to radio stations abroad, and thanks in part to the commercial distributors of phonograph records, I doubt if a day now goes by in almost any part of the world when an announcer does not say, in some language, "We shall now hear such-and-such work played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky," or, as the case may be, "by the Boston Pops Orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler."

Here in Israel the government radio station, Kol Israel, devotes most of Shabbath (Saturday) morning to the playing of classical records. Nearly always the program includes at least one work performed by the Boston Symphony. At several other times during the week we are likely to hear some lighter numbers played by Mr. Fiedler's band. The result is that Boston is now as well known to modern Israelis as, let us say, cities like Jerusalem and Beersheba were to the Bible-reading Puritans who founded Boston three centuries ago!

Boston has a precious institution in its orchestra which has now also become, through the wonders of electric recording and radio broadcasting, the city's most influential advertisement. It is reassuring to know that under Charles Munch's leadership it is in good hands.

LEONARD WARE,
Public Affairs Officer, U. S. Embassy, Tel Aviv.

Monteux in Second Week with Symphony

Monitor Dec. 1

Compositions by Wagner and Debussy Share Program

By Harold Rogers

It seemed at the outset—when Pierre Monteux chose equal portions of Wagner and Debussy for the same program—that our noted guest conductor was fostering either a foolish whim or an act of genius. But when he conducted this program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, the correspondences between these Titans of German and French music became logically clear. Monteux was prompted by genius, of that there can be no doubt.

* * *

Each composer founded a school and brought it to a culmination that admitted of no further development. Each was an iconoclast, destroying nearly every tradition except a sense of tonality, but exhausting nearly every modulative device that tonality can be put to.

Their styles, however, are almost diametrically opposed. Yesterday's concert in Symphony Hall might be likened to the eating of Sauerbraten and potato pancakes with a charming companion who is perfumed with Chanel No. 5. The fragrances do not blend, but they are not offensive when mingled.

Monteux's Wagner is dry, divorced from emotionalism, and a pleasure to listen to. How resplendent were the brasses in the Prelude to "Parsifal," how opulent the cellos, how magnificent the Dresden amens!

Next we heard the shimmering textures of Debussy's music to the first act of Gabriele d'Annunzio's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien." Monteux apparently indicates more with the tip of his baton than he does in any other way. With it he inscribes each delicate nuance, each mounting crescendo. From this score he gave a vibrant reading of "The Court of the Lillies," the "Dance of Ecstasy," and the Finale.

* * *

Then to Wagner again with excerpts from "Götterdämmerung." The conductor achieved some marvelous subito pianissimo effects in "Daybreak"; and the dawn, as Mr. Kipling said, came up like thunder. James Stagliano's horn solos in "Siegfried's Death Music" were eloquently brought off, as were the orotund passages for the four Wagner tubas.

The post-intermission period opened with Debussy's "Gigues," a delicate dithyramb fashioned of spun glass, it would seem, the rhythms so fragile they shatter before they become too violent. This score was companioned by the equally gossamer "Jeux," the ballet Debussy wrote for Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, danced by Nijinsky. Monteux (who conducted the Paris première in 1913) brought the evanescent scintillations of this episode score into vivid focus.

* * *

Debussy's fragile music made way for the chanting pilgrims of the "Tannhäuser" Overture. Wagner, who seldom has his day in Symphony Hall, sang forth in all his bombastic glory. One ecstatic lady, during the final applause, exclaimed that it took her back 40 years. Monteux made the "Tannhäuser" a memory worth reviving.

[38]

NOW let us see what Monteux has to say of his early impressions of the work.

"One day in 1912, after I had become the regular conductor for the Ballet Russe, Diaghileff summoned me to a tiny rehearsal room in a theatre of Monte Carlo where the Ballet was at that time appearing. We were to hear Stravinsky run through the score of his new work, Le Sacre du Printemps.

"With only Diaghileff and myself as audience, Stravinsky sat down to play a piano reduction of the entire score. Before he got very far I was convinced he was raving mad. Heard this way, without the color of the orchestra which is one of its greatest distinctions, the crudity of the rhythm was emphasized, its stark primitiveness underlined. . . . ."

And here Monteux becomes prescient: "My only comment at the end was that such music would surely cause a scandal."

AND a scandal was produced. That famous May night in the Theatre des Champs Ely-sees has become historic in fact and fiction. This is Monteux's own description of what took place:

HUME, From Page 1

"The audience remained quiet for the first two minutes. Then came boos and cat-calls from the gallery, soon after from the lower floors. Neighbors began to hit each other over the head with fists, canes, or whatever came to hand. . . . The end of the performance was greeted by the arrival of gendarmes."

Stravinsky recalls, "During the whole performance I was at Nijinsky's side in the wings." (Nijinsky choreographed the first Sacre.) "He was standing on a chair screaming 'sixteen, seventeen, eighteen'——Naturally the poor dancers could hear nothing by reason of the row in the auditorium and the sound of their own dance steps."

ROLAND-MANUEL, Ravel's principal biographer, says, "Ravel was seized with an enthusiasm for the Sacre which never abated. He took part in that memorable battle of the Sacre . . . While Florent Schmitt, in a voice of thunder, inveighed against 'those tarts of the sixteenth arrondissement,' a fashionable quarter in Paris, Ravel himself was at it hammer and tongs with one of the fair Bacchantes, who went as far as calling him 'a dirty——' because he had courteously asked her to be quiet . . ."

Debussy shouted, "Shut up, you fools," Diaghileff cried out, "Allow the performance to be finished, please," and Saint-Saens, a guest in Diaghileff's box, buried his head in his hands and kept repeating, "This is not music, it is insanity."

Nicolas Nabokov is authority for the fact that "some 50 people got undressed to the bone and landed in the Commissariat de Police."

TODAY David Diamond says of Stravinsky, "His is music of the longer time; it does not deal with fleeting hours." Carlos Chavez comments, "Now, 35 years after its premiere, no one dares raise his voice against Le Sacre. It is accepted as one of the most extraordinary pieces of music of all time."

And Pierre Monteux adds in benediction, "Time has caught up with Stravinsky. He has advanced musical expression tremendously and almost every contemporary composer owes him an acknowledged debt."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD

[Times-Herald Sketch by Brian Brown]

BOSTON BATONEER: Pierre Monteux will appear as guest conductor when the Boston Symphony comes to Washington for a concert Thursday night in Constitution Hall.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
DEC - 1951

Thursday Evening

Monteux To Premier 'Sacre' Here

By Paul Hume

THURSDAY evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall in a performance of Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, The Rite of Spring.

It will be the first time the greatest score yet written in this century has been heard in Washington, save through the medium of the phonograph record.

This is an event of immense magnitude. For it was this same Pierre Monteux who first conducted Sacre on May 29, 1913, in Paris, in a performance that precipitated a scandalous riot which "has never been surpassed, not even by the historical scandal of the first performance of Tannhauser" (also in Paris).

It was Monteux again who first conducted Sacre in America, during his sixth and last year as conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1924. And now, completing the cycle, Monteux, as guest conductor of the Boston orchestra for two weeks, will bring this music to Washington for the first time.

IT IS high time we had a reading of this great and once controversial music. No other musical masterpiece of similar stature, and there are very few in the entire literature, comes to mind that has not been heard here.

To have the benefit of Monteux, who, together with the composer himself, knows this score more intimately than any other person, gives the entire affair a unique accent.

Let us bring up the most pertinent data about Sacre, starting with Stravinsky's own remarks:

"One day, when I was finishing the last pages of The Firebird in St. Petersburg, I had a fleeting vision which came as a complete surprise . . . I saw in imagination a solemn pagan rite: sage elders, seated in a circle, watched a young girl dance herself to death. They were sacrificing her to propitiate the god of spring. Such was the theme of Le Sacre du Printemps."

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
DEC 5 - 1951

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Under Monteux Hailed in Concert Opening Griffith Series at the Mosque

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

For sheer magnificence of sound, there have been few concerts here recently to rival the program given last night at the Mosque Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert served as the opening event of the increasingly popular symphonic series of Griffith Music Foundation and was attended by an almost capacity audience.

Many of those present, regular patrons of past series, must have felt a sense of loss. Last night's program was to have been conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, whose death late last Spring severed a long relationship with the musical public of New Jersey.

The orchestra's regular conductor, Dr. Charles Munch, being ill at the moment, the New England group appeared under the guidance of Pierre Monteux, leader of the San Francisco Symphony for almost three decades. It was Monteux's first performance in Newark and his hearers gave him an ovation that should hasten his quick return.

Eloquence

Monteux proved to be one of the more striking figures to appear here as conductor, no taller than a cello in height and equipped with vast mustaches in the old time European tradition. His conducting style was of the utmost simplicity, but full of subtleties of expression that drew the highest eloquence from the musicians if not the utmost in precision.

The program was one long to be remembered. It held out no great promise during the opening selection, Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, a piece of no shattering moment, and played in similar vein.

But things looked up immediately upon the beginning of the next selection, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, known as the "Scotch." The orchestra took fire from the first chant-like bars, played on violas and oboe, and from there to the sweeping maestoso measures of the finale the work swept along with gusto, warmth and a breathtaking clarity. Particularly successful were the storm scenes that enter the closing pages of the opening allegro and the whimsical, elfin, bounced-bow measures of the scherzo.

The final portion of the program was all Wagner and all wonderful. Concisely selected to show three sides of the great Richard's nature, the works included Prelude to "Parsifal," the Dawn, Rhine Journey and Funeral Music from "Die Goetterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

It is difficult to believe that the Bostonians ever played better than in the long, sustained and powerful measures of the "Parsifal" prelude. The masses of tone piled one upon another, the brass choir responding to the strings and building up to a climax that lifted one's spirits.

The Rhine Journey and Siegfried's Funeral were equally successful in their way, as the various leitmotifs of the "Ring" came into being. From the most evanescent of soft tones to gigantic crashes that shook the hall, the music strode along with heroic grandeur. The "Tannhauser" prelude was a fitting end to an evening of great musical enjoyment.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 6 - 1951

AT THE MOSQUE

Monteux applauded

(Reprinted from Yesterday's Late Editions

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in the Mosque Theater last night will remain memorable for its Wagnerian music and for Pierre Monteux's conducting.

The Griffith Music Foundation sponsored the event as part of its orchestral series and a near capacity audience was profuse in its applause of the Boston musicians and their famous 76-year-old guest conductor.

The entire second half of the program was devoted to four of Wagner's outstanding works, including the Prelude to "Parsifal," Siegfriend's Rhine, Journey and Siegfriend's Death Music from 'Gotterdammung," and as a finale, the majestic overture to "Tannhauser."

Musicianship of quality and interpretive skill were in evidence throughout, from the more solemn intonation of the Parsifal opus to the last thrilling, inspiring tunes from the popular "Tannhauser."

The orchestra's opening selection was Beethoven's classic overture to "Coriolanus." Opus 62.

Then followed Felix Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, Opus 56, more familiarly known as the "Scotch" symphony because of its theme. The four movements reflected a variety of moods, all interpreted with dexterity, under Monteux's masterful direction. The second half of the fourth movement which brings the symphony to a grand climax was indeed indicative of the great skill of the famed composer. A. S.

TODAY

[39]

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
DEC 2 - 1951

Parker Lectures to Feature Verdi's "La Traviata"

Miss Jean Evans to Sing Role of Annina at Memorial Auditorium

By ALFRED W. BURKE

LOWELL—Miss Jean Evans of Brighton, gifted young soprano of opera, light opera, concert, radio and TV will sing the role of Annina in the Boston New England Opera company's production of Verdi's "La Traviata" to be given in the Moses Greeley Parker lecture series, on Sunday evening January 13, in the Memorial Auditorium

Miss Jean Evans

Added to all this has been her career in the field of writing. In this element of activity she has gained much attention and acclaim.

Turning first to Jean Evans, soprano, we find that she has been very much in demand. Her opportunities have been many, and all of them have enabled her to become one of New England's most promising and active young artists.

Her lifelong ambition for opera first led her to the starting point of all singers—years of study. Unlike many who have preceded her she desired a complete or as near possible background. Every element of musical substance gained her attention.

While developing her voice to the point of finish needed for opera she delved deeply into piano and even composition. The former brought her engagements throughout Boston. Among those most prominent were the Boston Press club and the USO circuit.

Music and Lyric

In the latter field she has done music and lyrics for commercial plugs in radio as well as arrangements for various types of musical programs.

However it is her singing that interests her most. She was thrilled and inspired at the opportunity of appearing in Jordan hall, with the Peoples Symphony orchestra as soloist and in the music festivals at Little Boar's Head under the baton of Fabien Sevitzky.

These were moments to be remembered. It is logical to state that she was more than successful. The engagement that followed spoke of her promise and talents.

Arthur Fiedler offered her an appearance with the "Pops." This in itself could be something to be recorded. Then almost before the echo of the final note had faded away she was selected by Charles Munch to appear with the Boston Symphony.

Recently she appeared as soloist with the Cecilia society in a coast-to-coast broadcast of an all Mozart program. Last but not least of these concert programs were several solo appearances with the Willis Page Chorale on network shows recording and in TV.

In radio she has been a network star for several years. Several large commercial shows claimed her talents. This has worked into TV where she has been guest on leading programs.

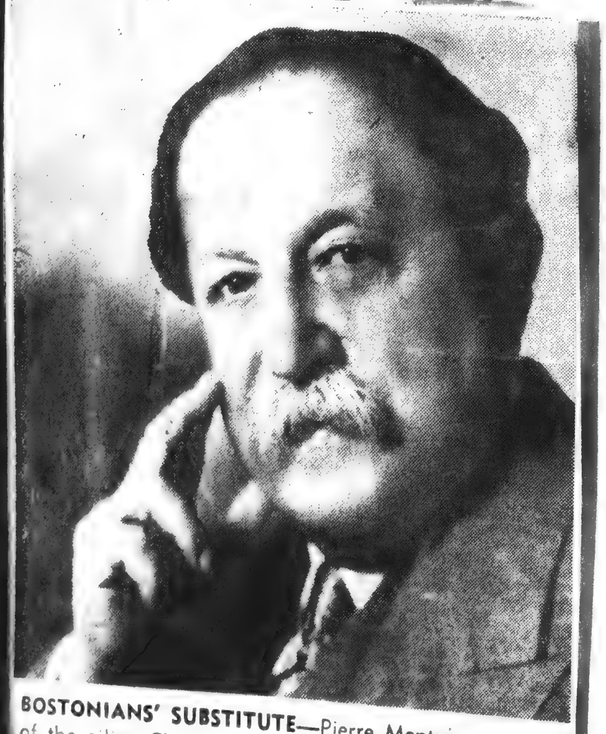
Acting has also been one of her many points of interest. Radio provided her an outlet in the form of the Kendall Weston Players. She has performed with the Boston College Dramatic society (she is a BC graduate) and in the Tufts College Arena theatre. Professionally she appeared as ingenue at the Lakeshire Summer theatre.

Completing her singing has been opera and light opera. Leads in the best known scores of both have gained a wide following for her.

Her writing? She is a featured writer on one of Boston's largest newspaper. She has been the gossip columnist of "Bang," official publication of the Newspaper Guild of Boston. Also important have been several radio scripts.

Though all of this claims a large part of her everyday activities she still prizes most her moments given up to studying operatic roles and rehearsing under the direction of her coach and teacher, Alfredo Anzalone, musical director of the Boston New England Opera company.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 8 [illegible]



BOSTONIANS' SUBSTITUTE—Pierre Monteux, in place of the ailing Charles Munch, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Friday evening at the Academy of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PROGRAM HERE

Monteux Is Guest Conductor as Orchestra Plays Works by Debussy and Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Carnegie Hall. Conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Prelude to Parsifal	Wagner
Excerpts from Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien	Debussy
Excerpts from Goetterdaemmerung	Wagner
Gigues; Jeux	Debussy
Overture to Tannhaeuser	Wagner

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux as guest leader, played a curiously assorted program last night in Carnegie Hall. This great musician, whose eclecticism is equalled by his interpretive insight, put before us in deliberately planned contrasts of the most extreme sort a series of standard pieces by Richard Wagner on one hand and other works, much more "precious," and much less known, by Debussy, on the other.

One could say that Debussy was the first great leader of the successful revolt against Wagnerism that took place in France at the end of the nineteenth century, as one can also say of Wagner that his music looms over that century and ours, too, in spite of the achievements of such masters as Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky and others who have escaped from under his shadow.

The reading of the "Parsifal" overture had the merit of directness, simplicity and absence of mystification. This is the music that reminded Nietsche of heraldic devices on an old shield. When it is done least obscurely, it is perhaps the most impressive. The familiar "Goetterdaemmerung" excerpt served to display anew the tonal splendors of the famous orchestra.

Singularly Archaic Music

Debussy's incidental music to the mystery play of Gabriel d'Annunzio, commissioned by Ida Rubinstein, as mimed by her as the martyred Saint at the première, of the work in 1911, is music of a singularly archaic and lapidary character. This at least is true, and convincingly true, of the first of the two excerpts Mr. Monteux played, with rarest understanding, last night. The music glows with rich, hard colors. D'Annunzio conceived of a presentation which should be suggestive of a figure in a stained glass window, and Debussy mirrored the concept in a species of pre-Raphaelite, though modern-textured music. This is the effect, at least, of Mr. Monteux's first excerpt. The second one has less salience and mood in the concert hall.

"Gigues" and "Jeux" both date from 1913. The freshest of the two pieces, and the one that conveys the most feeling, of a melancholy and restless kind, is Gigues, with its beautiful orchestration. It is fragmentary but there is continuity of mod and atmosphere if there is not a very vigorous thermatic organism. Mr. Monteux himself conducted at the première of "Jeux," the ballet that presented Nijinsky in a new role, on the night of May 15, 1913, in Paris. It was advantageous to hear this music as be revealed it to us.

But this Debussy is a very tired one, doing his best to pull himself up and write a score long enough for a short ballet. The spectacle is, or was, of a youth and two amorously inclined maidens, who finally exchange mutual kisses, and are then frightened off by a tennis ball that lands at their feet.

Music Reveals Feelings

The music shows how easily this precious trio could be frightened. They are a languid and a prematurely fatigued lot, and somewhat sad, somewhat distrait, about nothing. Indeed, the score is a sovereign example of how plausibly, if tiresomely, a very skilled composer can talk about nothing. Of this completely hollow effusion, this emaciated ghost of nonexistent ideas, Mr. Monteux gave a performance so adroit and exact that it almost substituted for the absence of living music. A great musician! A great master of the baton! Thereafter the audience had the contrast of the sturdy, dramatic and erotic Wagner of the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
DEC [illegible] 1951

Written at 21

'Scotch' Symphony, on Boston's Program Evokes True Moods of North Country

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

ONE of the rare opportunities to hear one of the masterpieces of Mendelssohn will be presented Tuesday night, when the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux will play the "Scotch" Symphony at the Mosque. It is a long and melodious work, full of rhythmical vivacity and interest.

When Mendelssohn wrote the composition, he was on firm ground. Already several other composers had taken Scotch themes for their music, notably Beethoven, who transcribed several songs of that nation for tenor and instrumental trio. Chopin also joined the movement, with a series of Ecossaises that are still found on piano programs.

✣ ✣ ✣

FOR such an extensive, varied and adult work as the "Scotch" Symphony (the No. 3 in A Minor), there can only be wonder that its composer was only 21 when he wrote it. Felix, one of the happiest and most productive of 19th Century composers, was born in 1809. It was in 1829, after a youth spent in study and travel under the most ideal circumstances, that Felix spent the Spring musical season in London in a welter of activities.

Feeling a yearning to tour to the North, he and a friend Klingemann set forth in July, passing through York and Durham and finally arriving in Edinburgh. There Mendelssohn attended the annual competition of pipers at the Theatre Royal and, doubtless, got the inspiration for the Highland Fling theme of the symphony's third movement.

While visiting Hollyrood Palace, where Rizzio was stabbed to death and where Mary was crowned, the composer hurriedly set down an 18-bar theme, which later became he slow introduction to the symphony. Those who have visited Hollyrood will recognize the mood —one of gentle melancholy, and brooding lamentation for the sad death of kings. The palace is a haunting place, overrun with ivy and dark with the blood and passions of a desperate era.

✣ ✣ ✣

MENDELSSOHN'S tour provided still another inspiration. After leaving Edinburgh, his party journeyed farther north to Stirling, Blair-Atholl and Tobermory, pausing at the Hebrides. Here, at Fingal's Cave, the waves crashing against the rocks turned themselves to music in Felix's mind and he scribbled down 20 measures of music which were used intact as the surf-like opening of the "Fingal's Cave" Overture.

The next year Felix was in Rome on another grand tour and settled down among the grandeurs of the ancient city's ruins, churches and galleries. The creative urge was strong, and he turned his hand to writing the "Reformation" Symphony, the "Scotch," the "Fingal's Cave" piece and the Fantasie in F Sharp Minor. The latter was published as the "Scotch Sonata." Most of these were finished that year.

✣ ✣ ✣

THE symphony itself has no program, as such. Rather is it a series of movements that suggest moods evocative of the fog-ridden, gray and sometimes forbidding atmosphere of the north country. These moods are introduced by a slow movement in A Minor, with the principal melodic burden taken by the violas and appropriate t the instrument's dark tone.

The mood quickens in the n movement, a flowing fast sect of considerable drama. The th section's bagpipe theme—or simile thereof—is played on clarinet with notable gayety in F Major. The andante follo with a broad, flowing theme major alternating with a regal cessional. The finale is in two pa a brusk, rapid section with fu proclivities and a definite Hi land lilt, which leads to a umphant, brilliant conclusion which the brass section reaches full glory.

PIERRE MONTEUX
French maestro who will conduct the Boston Symphony's first concert of the season Tuesday at 8:4 P. M. at the Mosque under Griffith Music Foundation auspices.

[40]

MUSIC

DEC 9 1951

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Guest conductor, Pierre Monteux. The program:
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68, "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven
"Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") ..... Stravinsky

For the Memory Book

STRAVINSKY'S "Rite of Spring" and Beethoven's Sixth, which made the meat of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, are both of them pastoral symphonies. Composed a century and five years apart (in 1813 and 1808) and each strikingly characteristic of its fine and national origins, these two works are remarkably becoming to each other on a program. Indeed, they were so paired when Pierre Monteax, who conducted yesterday afternoon, introduced the Stravinsky work to America nearly thirty years ago.

* * *

It was nearly forty years ago, in 1913, that he introduced the work at a ballet performance in Paris that is now history. The composer was thirty-one, the conductor five years older. Since that time many conductors have directed the "Rite," but it has remained nevertheless Monteux's piece. His knowledge of it and his rendering are for the whole world of music, at least during our lifetime, definitive, complete, final. That rendering yesterday with the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a perfection no less authentic than did the performance of the Beethoven "Pastorale" and of the "Coriolanus" Overture which preceeded the two dramatic landscapes. One was aware of a resemblance between the readings and the written scores that was so close, so convincing as to seem a complete identity. The way Monteux played all three pices is surely, for our time, the best way, the real way, the way they go.

* * *

The excelence I describe is partly a matter of lively sounds, clear blends, straightforward metrics, impeccable balances. But these matters are only the technics of conducting. Enlightenment, calm, the ease of ope and the compliance of control are another part of this conductor's authority. He presses nothing on you; but his offerings to the spirit, to the mind and to the sensuous ear are so abundant that complete acceptance, complete absorption are the result for this listener. That they were similarly experienced by a packed house was evident both during the concert (when one could have heard the proverbial pin drop) and after (when prolonged applause from a standing audience was witness of gratitude far from common).

* * *

It would be a major service to attempt describing in words the nature of yesterday's "Ride of Spring," since a recording of the work with the same conductor and orchestra, made last season, is available. The pormance in the flesh had more vibrancy, more life in it, as a concert performance always does. But that performance will not again be available soon. To cherish the record and to remember the performance will long be the privilege of this citizen and of many, many others, I am sure. Those are better than any talk.

Pierre Monteux

Who Conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 9 - 1951

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In this, his third year as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch has played in hard luck. He started the season in fine fettle, and in its third week he took the orchestra on a trip to the Midwest. In the course of that strenuous junket, he picked up a virus infection, and at the third pair of concerts, hastily put together after a late return from the Western journey, he looked somewhat the worse for wear. The following week he took to his bed, and Richard Burgin, as he has done at short notice so many times before, took over. He could not, however, work up all of Mr. Munch's program and felt obliged to substitute the ubiquitous Fourth Symphony of Brahms for the more-to-be desired "Iberia" and "Printemps" of Debussy.

* * *

The next week, Mr. Munch took the orchestra to New York, though he plainly should not have done so, since he had a relapse. Again Mr. Burgin replaced him and again the program was changed, and probably for the better, with Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" replacing the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Redemption." The next two pairs of concerts fell, as previously arranged, to Pierre Monteux, whose success with his old orchestra and public was sensational.

* * *

But now Mr. Munch was really ill, with a circulatory disturbance resulting from the aforesaid infection, and some conductor had to be found who could carry on during his enforced rest. In midseason the best men are likely to be tied up, but by a rare stroke of fortune, there was one who was not, the eminent Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The latter's regular orchestra is the Suisse Romande of Geneva that he himself founded in 1918. He also does a good deal of guest conducting, and we had him for a week in January, 1949, while his other American appearances have been numerous. In 1948-'51 he also led the NBC orchestra and those of Cleveland, Chicago, Dallas, Washington, Philadelphia, Montreal, and Havana.

* * *

During the present season, however, Mr. Ansermet had retired from conducting in order to complete a book upon which he has been working and that is said to promulgate a system of analysis, evolved by himself, whereby the meaning of music can be made clearer to listeners. As one who had the privelege of interviewing Mr. Ansermet when he was here three years ago, I can testify to his profound grasp of musical problems. In fact I don't mind saying that his seemed to me the keenest mind in that respect that I had encountered in my many meetings with conductors. Mr. Ansermet intended to be a mathematician and his intellect is razor sharp. Of the many significant statements he made that afternoon, during which he subjected contemporary music to a considerable going-over, I have treasured one in particular, perhaps because it was easier to digest than some of his other observations. Speaking of atonal or keyless music, as practiced by Schoenberg and his disciples, Mr. Ansermet suggested that intervals in such a system had quantity but no quality.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet was born in one of the beauty spots of the world, the town of Vevey on Lake Geneva. He pursued his mathematical studies in the University of Lausanne and at the Sorbonne in Paris. At the same time he studied music in

STRAVINSKY'S 'RITE' EXCITES ITS LISTENERS

Washington Times-Herald Dec. 7

First Performance Here In 21 Years

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

No riot was provoked in Constitution Hall last night by the first performance here in 21 years of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," tho violence both pro and con marked the Paris premiere of this music in 1912.

Pierre Monteux conducted that historic first performance for the Diaghilev Ballet. He also conducted last nights revival of the concert version being served by the Boston Symphony. It should be added at once that tho the performance created an excited reaction in the capacity audience and much shouting, the quite frantic applause seemed to be addressed to the venerable conductor and his expert collaborators, and only in a secondary way to the music.

Reptitions Received Calmly

This seems to have been the history of this once revolutionary composition. First performances excite the public. Repetitions are received more calmly. That happened in Paris when Monteux repeated the work in concert form in 1914. It happened in Philadelphia in 1922 when Stokowski gave the American premiere, and in Chicago, in 1926, when Stock and the Chicago Symphony did it twice. Stokowski and the Philadelphians did it here in 1930. Now the Bostonians have brought it to a second hearing in Constitution Hall to win cordial approval for the virtuosity of conductor and players, but only qualified recognition for the composer.

Much challenging music has been written since Stravinsky produced this score 39 years ago but all of the harmonic rhythmical and orchestral innovations of his successors are anticipated here. There is constant different keys simultaneously. The orchestral spectrum seems to have been exhausted for varied tone-color. Most striking of the Stravinsky innovations lie in the department of rhythm. Pulses of five, seven, or eleven are constantly mingled with more conventional beats.

What result is a dramatic sequence of pulsating sound effects, strung on slender melodic material, but telling vividly a story of pagan ritual in prehistoric Russia. It is strong food for the imagination of the listener who can paint savage pictures for himself to fit the elusive melody of the thudding rhythms that pound and belabor the senses.

Rare Pagentry of Sound

More impressive still is the enormous difficulty of the score. The rhythmical problems alone are bewildering. The adjustment of proportions becomes a series of adventures in the science and art of acoustics. The whole impression resolves itself into a pageantry of sound that is like nothing else in music. Stravinsky said that the art could go no farther in this direction. He never repeated the problems of "The Rite" but sought other expressive paths.

Monteux is a great master of orchestra. He conducted this fantastically difficult score from memory and the resulting performance was no less precise than that given Respighi's setting of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue or the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, the works which prefaced the Stravinsky opus.

At first glance this seemed a curiously made program; but there was logic as well as contrast in preceding the imagined primitiveness of Stravinsky with Beethoven's quotations of German peasant tunes and his tone-picture of peaceful and well ordered rural scenes. These, too, were beautifully realized.

AIR FORCE BAND PLAYS

[41]

CONCERT AND RECITAL

N.Y. Herald Trib - Dec. 7

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Guest conductor, Pierre Monteux. Concert Wednesday night with the following program:
Prelude to "Parsifal" ..... Wagner
Excerpts from Act I ("Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"): The Court of the Lilies; Dance of Ecstasy and Finale ..... Debussy
Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey; Siegfried's Death (from "Goetterdaemmerung") ..... Wagner
"Gigues"; "Jeux" ..... Debussy
"Tannhaeuser" Overture ..... Wagner

Monteux and Bostonians

For his guest appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night, Pierre Monteux devised a program that seesawed curiously to and fro between Wagner and Debussy. In view of Debussy's articulate anti-Wagnerism, the Carnegie Hall audience might have anticipated an evening of stark and welcome contrasts. But Debussy's outcry against Wagner was much like the outcry of the son against the domineering influence of the father. Try as he did to throw off the influence, there was the basic principle of color and atmosphere music that in some way determined his own style, though he succeeded admirably in counteracting the Wagnerian grandiosity and elephantine proportions.

How much Debussy still shared with his domineering musical forebear became apparent from the amount of music whose main purpose was to evoke and lengthen out mood. Both the "Parsifal" Prelude and the excerpts from Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" have a religio-mysticism wrought through Romantic nostalgia toward archaic patterns of the church modes. "Gigues" and "Jeux" of Debussy's late years have a fluid, ecstatic emotional content that is, in one sense at least, not far from the content of Daybreak and Siegfried's Rhine Journey.

Since "Jeux" was the greatest rarity on last night's list, it was the work for which I wanted to reserve my acutest attention. But its qualities had been so much anticipated by what had preceded that its freshness was undermined. The performance under Mr. Monteux's direction had all the mastery of the orchestra and of French style that this veteran conductor has accumulated through the years and now holds at his command as readily as the capacity to walk and breathe. But the wisps of melody in "Jeux" elude one's grasp so much in the billows of sound that perhaps it would have been appropriate to set them in relief a bit more and to indicate the connecting tissue.

In general, however, few conductors could have lent such distinction to an evening devoted to so oddly assembled a list. It was astonishing, too, how much Mr. Monteux, in his brief guest period with the orchestra, has transformed its sound and imposed his own appealing personality on it. The remarkably mellow results seem determined by the love and admiration he inspires in the players and by his own composure, which stems from his complete confidence in his own technique and uncommon knowledge of the score.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1951

They Rose to Cheer Monteux for His Rites of Spring

The first time Pierre Monteux conducted Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring, the audience "hit each other over the head with fists, canes or whatever," booed and made cat-calls, and finally the police were called in.

Last night, at Constitution Hall, almost 38 years later, the audience stood and cheered and shouted and practically demanded an encore.

Of course, it wasn't all for Stravinsky. Mr. Monteux, one of the towering musicians of our time, got a fair share of it not only for the way he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Rites, but also for his masterful presentations of the Bach Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor and the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony.

The wide span of the music was the measure of Mr. Monteux's genius. For the Bach moved to an inspiring climax and the Beethoven had all the leisurely charm of a lazy day in the country which the Pastoral is supposed to portray. It was as if Mr. Monteux was stressing the fact that dictators and wars and tax scandals may come and go, but great music goes on for ever.

Of course, it was the first Washington performance of the Rites of Spring that provided the big moment. Here the Boston Symphony fully revealed what a truly magnificent orchestra it is. The audience might have wondered that so much of the Rites, which is supposed to have changed the course of music, now sounds so conservative. But there is a great deal in it that still inspires awe. All in all, it was quite an evening.

—HILTON BERLINER

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PROGRAM HERE

Monteux Is Guest Conductor as Orchestra Plays Works by Debussy and Wagner

By OLIN DOWNES

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Monteux [illegible] last night [illegible] Richard Wagner [illegible] by Debussy, on the occasion [illegible] that Debussy was [illegible] leader of the successful revolt against Wagnerism that took place in France at the end of the nineteenth century, as [illegible] who say of Wagner that [illegible] looms over that continent as it does, too, in spite of the [illegible] of such masters as [illegible] Ravel, Strawinsky and others, who have escaped from under his shadow.

The opening of the "Parsifal" overture had the merit of directness, simplicity and absence of mystification. This is the music that reminded Nietsche of heraldic devices on an old shield. When it is done least obscurely, it is perhaps the most impressive. The familiar "Goetterdaemmerung" excerpt served to display anew the tonal splendors of the famous orchestra.

Debussy's incidental music to the mystery play of Gabriel d'Annunzio, commissioned by Ida Rubinstein, as mimed by her as the martyred Saint at the première of the work in 1911, is music of a singularly archaic and lapidary character. This at least is true, and convincingly true, of the first of the two excerpts Mr. Monteux played, with rarest understanding, last night. The music glows with rich, hard colors. D'Annunzio conceived of a presentation which should be suggestive of a figure in a stained glass window, and Debussy mirrored this concept in a species of pre-Raphaelite, though modern-textured music. This is the effect, at least, of Mr. Monteux's first excerpt. The second one has less saliency and mood in the concert hall.

"Gigues" and "Jeux" both date from 1913. The freshest of the two pieces, and the one that conveys the most feeling, of a melancholy and restless kind, is "Gigues," with its beautiful orchestration.

But this Debussy is a very tired one, doing his best to pull himself up and write a score long enough for a short ballet. The spectacle is, or was, of a youth and two amorously inclined maidens, who finally exchange mutual kisses, and are then frightened off by a tennis ball that lands at their feet.

The music shows how easily this precious trio could be frightened. They are a languid and a prematurely fatigued lot, and somewhat sad, somewhat distrait, about nothing. Indeed, the score is a sovereign example of how plausibly, if tiresomely, a very skilled composer can talk about nothing. Of this completely hollow effusion, this emaciated ghost of nonexistent ideas, Mr. Monteux gave a performance so adroit and exact that it almost substituted for the absence of living music. A great musician! A great master of the baton! Thereafter the audience had the contrast of the sturdy, dramatic and erotic Wagner of the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 6

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

[illegible] far from the content of Daybreak [illegible] Siegfried's Rhine Journey.

[illegible] "Jeux" was the greatest [illegible] last night's list, it was [illegible] for which I wanted to [illegible] the acutest attention. But [illegible] had been so much an- [illegible] by what had preceded [illegible] freshness was undermined. The performance under Mr. Monteux's direction had all the mastery of the orchestra and of French style that this veteran conductor has accumulated through [illegible] and now holds at his [illegible] readily as the ca- [illegible] k and breathe. But [illegible] melody in "Jeux" [illegible] rasp so much in the [illegible] sound that perhaps it [illegible] have been appropriate to set [illegible] relief a bit more and to [illegible] connecting tissue.

[illegible] however, few conductors could have lent such distinction to an evening devoted to [illegible] showed a list. It was [illegible] too how much Mr. [illegible] in his brief guest period [illegible] the orchestra, has transformed its sound and imposed his [illegible] conducting personality on it. [illegible] ably mellow results [illegible] informed by the love and [illegible] he inspires in the [illegible] and by his own composure, [illegible] from his complete [illegible] in his own technique [illegible] uncommon knowledge of the

Monteux and Bostonians

For his guest appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last [illegible] Pierre Monteux devised [illegible] curious [illegible] ner and [illegible] busses [illegible] the Carnegie [illegible] have [illegible] stark and [illegible] Debussy's [illegible] was much [illegible] son [illegible] ence of the [illegible] to throw [illegible] was the [illegible] and acme [illegible] some [illegible] style, [illegible] ably in [illegible] neman [illegible] time prop[illegible]

Just [illegible] action. D[illegible] [illegible] became [illegible] the amon[illegible] purpose [illegible] our moon [illegible] ude and [illegible] Debussy's [illegible] Sebastian [illegible] have a religious mysticism wrought through Romantic [illegible] nostalgia toward archaic patterns of the church modes. Gigues and "Jeux" of Debussy's late years have polyty. In former years, the group a fluid, ecstatic emotional content that is, in one sense at least, not presenting isolated cantata arias which, out of context, made little or no sense at all; and when the organization, realizing the inappropriateness of the single aria plan, finally presented us with full-length cantatas, it clung to a host of vocal soloists who were quite unable to cope with the elaborate difficulties of Bach's vocal lines.

All this has now been changed. Last night the soloists were none less than Erna Berger, soprano, and Marian Anderson, contralto; and the chamber orchestra and chorus was under the direction of William Jonson. Other featured artists included Norman Farrow, bass; Robert Bloom, oboe; Bernard Greehouse, cello; Maurice Wilk, violin, and Erich Itor Kahn, piano. The program listed the "Wedding" Cantata, the sacred cantatas Nos. 54 and 187 and a group of solo airs. And everything about the execution of these works gave pleasure to mind, heart and ear.

Miss Berger's rendition of the "Wedding" cantata was a rare delight. The vocal line lies a bit low for her and the endless phrases tended to stretch her supply of breath, but all the same there was beauty and sweetness to every measure she sang. Her top tones rang like a crystal bell, and she supplied, out of her storehoue of color, precisely the shades necessary to give meaning to Bach's secular idyll.

Miss Anderson did not seem in the best possible voice. Her tones throughout the range were neither steady nor pure, but they were, as usual, of such moving intensity that one was tempted to overlook Miss Anderson's ailments of the moment. It is enough to say that the contralto's Bach is underlined with an expressive devotion so simple and serene that one must search far to find its equal.

A final word of praise for the chorus and orchestra, Mr. Farrow and especially Mr. Jonson, the conductor. The excellences which they provided must surely be counted among the bounties of the evening.

J. S. H.

Bach Aria Group

The first concert this season of the Bach Aria Group took place last night and brought with it a much-needed change in musical policy. In former years, the group concerned itself exclusively with

Postlude

Audience In Ovation To Monteux

By Paul Hume

The standing ovation which Pierre Monteux received last night at the conclusion of his conducting of Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps was a far different thing from the outbursts of rage that greeted its world premiere under his baton nearly 40 years ago.

Monteux led the Boston Symphony in their Constitution Hall concert last night, and closed the concert with the most famous piece of music yet written in this century. His incredible technique brought out a performance to match the greatest achievements in the Boston orchestra's history.

Monteux needs no score for Sacre, though it is one of the most complex, intricate works in the world. The rhythmic changes which are among its fabulous characteristics came from his hands in gestures unbelievably simple. His head, one of his most eloquent aids in conducting, gave strong accents at times when both hands had their own duties.

But above all, Pierre the Great, made clear the significance and vitality of this legendary work. Its stature as an example of flawless instrumentation, its clarity of line, and its fantastic strength mingled with some of the most exotic beauties in orchestral literature.

We cannot be sufficiently grateful to Monteux for having played Sacre, particularly since his personal part in its history makes his direction of greater meaning than any other conductor's.

The concert of contrasting attractions opened with Respighi's orchestral version of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. Beethoven's Pastoral, or Sixth, Symphony followed. What a happy choice the Beethoven was! Monteux finds in it the warmth and simple songfulness of Beethoven in his most genial moments.

He conducts it with that self-effacement that leads the listener directly to the heart of the music. Where it is long he shows the reason for the length. Where it grows great in moments, he does not force its greatness. Few men give us such Beethoven these days.

Music Dec. 7

It's Evening Of Bach at Town Hall

By ROBERT BAGAR.

An evening of Bach, from beginning to end, was what the Bach Aria Group had in store for its following in the Town Hall last evening. The organization, of which William H. Scheide is the director, presented vocal soloists Marian Anderson, contralto; Erna Berger, soprano, and Norman Farrow, bass. The instrumental soloists were Robert Bloom, oboe; Maurice Wilk, violin; Bernard Greenhouse, cello and Erich Itor Kahn, piano. Further, there was the chorus of the Choral Art Society. William Jonson conducted the concert, which consisted almost exclusively of cantatas or music from cantatas.

The performances of the last two works—Cantatas 54 and 187—in this four-part program were commendable for their simple, honest delivery, for their lack of anything like mannerism. In the Cantata 60. 54 Miss Anderson assumed the solo role against strings alternating with continuo (piano and cello). And her account of the first section, pretty low for the voice, suffered from too much restraint. In fact, there were passages in which Anderson could scarcely be heard.

Bright, Animated.

However, her bright, animated singing of the florid third verse was all one could ask in assured, musicianly expression and vocal and interpretative warmth. Again in "Du Herr, du kroenst allein des Jahr mit deinem Gut," from Cantata No. 187, the higher cast of the lines and, in general, their joyous content, found the contralto in most cogenial surroundings.

Miss Berger and Mr. Bloom collaborated handsomely in the fifth section of this Cantata. The soprano, showing no sign of fatigue, and in very good voice and technical fettle, negotiated the aria "Gott versorget alles Leben" with something to spare in beauty of affect and diction.

Other works were the secular "Wedding" Cantata for soprano solo, and a group of aries, three form cantatas, one from the St. John Passion, all for alto solo.

* * *

Boston Symphony.

It was Pierre Monteux on the Carnegie Hall podium last evening to conduct the Boston Smyphony Orchestra, thus renewing old acquaintance with the band that provided him with symphonic home base in Boston, 1919-24.

The program, shared equally by Wagner and Debusy, couldn't be called dull, nor could it be called adventurous. It was just ordinary. Nor did it get performances to write home—or, for that matter anywhere else—about.

This, as we are all aware, is far from standard practice with anything that Mr. Monteux does. So, one concluded that once in a while he, too, has one, as does everybody else. And what is that?

[illegible] night.

Lausanne, with Ernest Bloch and Otto Barblan; in Paris, with Gedalge, and in Berlin. In 1912 he decided to devote himself completely to music, becoming director of the Kursaal Concerts in Montreux. Three years later he took over the concerts in Geneva, but in that same year, 1915, he allied himself with Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, and it was as the musical head of that incomparable troupe that he made his first visit to Boston. Under his direction we made our acquaintance with things like the "Firebird" and "Petrouchka" of Stravinsky, the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, the Tartar Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," the "Tamar" of Balakirev and other items that we have since seen and heard from later, and inevitably lesser, ballet companies. The next season, by the way, these peerless Russians returned with Mr. Monteux as chief conductor, after which the latter went to the Met, taking over in Boston in 1919.

* * *

When he returned to us after 34 years, Mr. Ansermet conducted a Tuesday evening concert and a Friday-Saturday pair. Collectively, he played Beethoven's Second "Leonore" Overture and Fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," Debussy's "Iberia," and a "Petite Symphonie Concertante" by his countryman Frank Martin. These performances are recalled as being completely top-notch, and those of the Beethoven Symphony and the Stravinsky and Debussy pieces were even better on Friday than they had been on Tuesday.

[42]

Boston Gets Famous Swiss to Substitute; Conductor a Martinet; But Was Late Once

Symphony Audiences Better Be on Time

By JOHN TALBOT

(Reuters Exclusive)

GENEVA, Switzerland, Dec. 8—The life of 68-year-old Ernest Ansermet has had almost as many themes as the great musical works in whose interpretation he has achieved world-wide fame.

Ansermet, who will be interim conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the convalescence of Charles Munch, has been professor of mathematics, would-be actor, and philosopher.

A busy man, he rushes from afternoon concerts to evening engagements, with little time in between.

But there is time for philosophy and for writing a book.

ANSERMET

Continued on Page A-29 Editorial Feature Section

ERNEST ANSERMET puts Philadelphia, Boston and New York (Philharmonic and N. B. C.) in the top bracket of American orchestras.

ANSERMET

Continued from the First Page

"I am not writing my memoirs, but a theoretical book on music. Perhaps it could be called a philosophy of music, but it is far from complete because of lack of time."

There was to be a three-months vacation this Winter in which to finish the book but, says Ansermet, "the sudden call to Boston made this impossible."

There are no particular American experiences he will quote in his book, but he will have more than a word to say on the current state of music.

Composers in Crisis

It is his theory that at present young composers are going through a serious crisis which is coupled with the general world crisis.

"But there are, of course," he compromises, "certain talents, especially in Europe. Overseas the young composers do produce quite a lot, but it is not quantity alone which counts.

"Because of this crisis, I decided to write my philosophy of music in which I shall try to show the young composers a way out of their crisis."

A good man at answering a question, Ansermet does no hedging on his "five best orchestras" list.

"In my opinion the two best European orchestras are the Vienna and the Berlin Philharmonics," he says.

After that come the Orchestre du Conservatoire de Paris, the orchestra in Amsterdam and the Augusteo Roma.

"But all these last," he says, "are really absolutely equal and I cannot say that one is better than the other."

American orchestras? At the top he puts the Philadelphia, Boston and New York (Philharmonic and N. B. C.) in the same bracket.

"Also very good are the Cleveland, Chicago and the San Francisco." He has words of praise for the Dallas, Tex., group—"a very promising young body."

American Composers

Ansermet would like to see an about-face by the young American composers attempting to get their feet on the first rungs of the musical ladder.

"We Europeans feel that young Americans should try first to make a name in America and then come to us, but they themselves are trying the other way around.

"Forced by public opinion, they first try to make a name with us and take this as a basis for their publicity and success at home."

He is worried over the shortages of young string players.

"The answer to the shortage is easy," he says. "Most of the young string players came from Jewish circles, mostly from Germany and, as Hitler killed off at least one generation, the shortage occurred."

He adds: "Of course, the shortage mainly affects soloists, not orchestra players."

In his opinion, Isaac Stern, 31-year-old American violinist, is "a very promising young soloist."

Boston Programs

Ansermet already has selected some of the offerings he will make to Bostonians this Winter. They include classical works of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Haydn and Schumann.

"I shall also offer Hindemith, Bartok and works by the American composer, Samuel Barber," he promises.

Although music has provided the main accompaniment to Ansermet's life since his earliest days, it was not until he was 26 that he realized conducting was his true metier.

The eldest of seven children, he was born on the shores of Lake Geneva in the town of Vevey, Nov. 11, 1883.

His father was a geometry teacher in the local school, his mother also a teacher, had musical inclinations. His first cries, to her, contained "a very musical note," she always maintained.

Ernest was no great shakes as a his time at the lakeside fetes than scholar. His teacher told his mother she "could do nothing with him." He was just a healthy, noisy, boisterous boy, who would rather spend with his books.

All through this period music pulled at him, but he was no "prodigy" in his violin lessons. He obviously had talent.

"My boy," his music master told him when he was 14, "you are destined to go as far as that." The master raised his hand to measure a giant. "But," he continued, "you are so lazy you'll never get further than that." The master lowered the hand to measure a dwarf.

His First Job

Ernest got himself his first job at 22—as mathematics professor at the local school. He went on to scientific college and became—he is still surprised — something of an expert on foreign exchange.

This seems to have appalled him, for he turned his back on it, toward the stage where he fancied some of his talent might lie as a comedian.

He tried for the part of Blanchenet in Henry Warnery's "Le Peuple Vaudois," but (his friends say mercifully) he was turned down.

It was in 1905 that Ernest set out for Paris and the Sorbonne to write a thesis for a scientific doctorate in mathematics. It never saw the light of day. All the time, music tugged at him.

Returning to Switzerland he was named mathematics professor in Lausanne and it was there that he met and married his first wife, Marguerite Jacottet, a teacher.

The next year their daughter, Jacqueline, was born. Now married, Jacqueline has made her father grandfather to a fine boy.

By 1905 the urge for music was so strong that Ansermet traveled to Berlin to hear Nikisch conduct a series of concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic. He was enthralled and decided, then and there, to return home and seek his fame as a conductor. He was then 26.

It was five years before he got his first job at his chosen profession, and exchanged his desk for the conductor's podium in front of the little orchestra at the Montreux Kursaal.

Bad, Then Good, Luck

The first world war brought him disaster, then a stroke of fortune. His little orchestra folded, but Prince Serge Diaghilev arrived in Switzerland as a refugee. Wanting a new musical director for the Russian Ballet, he chose Ansermet.

Today the bearded Swiss is known to orchestras and audiences alike as something of a martinet.

His concerts always begin on the dot, although one performance of the Russian Ballet began half-an-hour late because of his Swiss-born love of good cheese.

He was lunching with an old Swiss friend, Dr. Fred Blanchod, who tells the story. In an Italian restaurant, the conductor had told his friend he never ate before a performance. But, says Blanchod, the musician ate a great deal more than he did and it was not until Ansermet finished a large portion of gorgonzola that he suddenly pulled out his watch to find himself 30 minutes late.

"We dashed out to a taxi," recounts Blanchod, "and when we got to the Opera House we found a very angry Diaghilev hopping about like a wasp in a bottle. The audience was restive, too, but the ballet went off all right."

Ansermet admits that the memory of this lapse makes him blush to this day. Perhaps his present love of punctuality dates from it.

In 1918, Ansermet founded the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and has remained its permanent conductor. A specialist in Russian and French music and in the modern repertory, he has given first performances of many distinguished compositions by Ravel, Debussy, Ernest Bloch, Alban Berg, Honegger, Hindemith and Martinu, to name but some.

His first wife died in 1939 and three years later the maestro married Juliette Salvisberg, distinguished Swiss singer of Geneva, an attractive dark-haired woman some 30 years younger than he.

"I met my husband when I gave a series of concerts with the orchestra over Geneva Radio," she recalls. "But when we married I gave up my singing. Being wife to a world-famous conductor, I find, takes up all my time."

Madame Ansermet was busy packing in their Geneva apartment when her husband's batons arrived from the store in the Rue de la Corratorie which makes them especially for him.

Each is two feet long, of very light unvarnished wood, weighing only a few ounces. The handle is about two inches of smoothed cork, just large enough for the conductor's fingertips.

White-haired but brimming with energy, Ernest Ansermet has been said by the critics to be one of the finest musicians and most sensitive interpreters that the symphonic field presents today.

The force of his personality becomes apparent immediately as he strides, with springy steps, across the stage to the podium.

After music, his great love now is philosophy, and his book, combining aspects of both, is eagerly awaited in Europe.

Mr. Ansermet will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony, on this present visit, at Sanders Theatre Tuesday evening, and in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1951

MONTEUX CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Leads Orchestra in 2 Works by Beethoven, Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre du Printemps'

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Pierre Monteux. At Carnegie Hall.
Coriolanus Overture ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 ..... Beethoven
Le sacre du printemps ..... Stravinsky

By NOEL STRAUS

The first half of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, was devoted to two works of Beethoven stemming from the year 1807. Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps" of 1913, which completed the program, stood in sharpest contrast to the earlier masterpieces.

It was a striking fact that the Stravinsky opus, though so much later in date of composition than the Beethoven offerings, gave the impression of becoming outmoded, while the two classic offerings still easily held their own.

Mr. Monteux accorded all three of the works equally superb readings. Inasmuch as he conducted the world première of "Le sacre du printemps" with the Diaghileff Ballet Russe in Paris thirty-eight years ago and the New York initial performance eleven years later, the French leader became identified with this score from the first, both here and abroad. If the famous composition seemed to be exhibiting signs of age, it was in no wise due to any lack of fire and excitement in the interpretation.

Extreme Modernity Lost

But after nearly four decades, "Le sacre du printemps," which proved so extreme in its modernism at its première that it precipitated a riot in the audience, no longer holds the enthrallment it evoked over the years since its first performance. It still is a difficult chore for a conductor and his musicians, though the music starts to sound rather bland, now that the interval of the second has been heard so constantly that it no longer has the dissonant effect it had in 1913. Evidently the interval of the second will soon become a consonance, just as the interval of the third did in its history, and then nothing musical will sound cacophonous. At all events, a softening down of the sort has happened to "Le sacre."

Its rhythms, too, once deemed so extraordinary, did not have their former bite at this latest hearing. Too much rhythmic experimentation has gone on since 1913 to lend the Stravinsky masterpiece the kind of appeal it once had in that regard, also.

What it still possesses is its elemental sort of drive, its many instances of individual coloring and highly imaginative orchestration. And it always will be remembered for its profound influence on other composers of this generation.

Now that the work begins to grow bereft of its erstwhile sense of harmonic and rhythmic excitement, its content would not seem to be of the sort to live on, in its own right. For this is music purposely intended to be completely objective and architectonic, with no place for human feeling.

More Feeling in Beethoven

On the other hand, Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture and his "Pastoral" Symphony are deeply human in their intentions. Beethoven was as carefully disciplined as Stravinsky in his workmanship, but he had, in addition, something much more profound to impart. There was great virtuosity and understanding in the presentation given "Le sacre," yet it could not arrive at the communicativeness, the feeling of reality, of the Beethoven performances.

Both Beethoven works were kept purely classic in conception. They were marked by great simplicity of approach, which, combined with extraordinary plasticity of line, refinement of tinting, unerring taste, and exemplary mellowness of tone, made them noteworthy accomplishments, indeed.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DE 9-195

Boston Symphony "Open Rehearsal"

When Conductor Charles Munch started "open rehearsals" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last year, he certainly "started" something. Music students, instrumentalists, and fledgling conductors poured into Symphony Hall to watch the orchestra, conductor, and soloists with interruptions and repetitions of passages . . . a real rehearsal. (Above) Never too busy to give an autograph to an enthusiastic youngster, Munch does just that before he even has a chance to light a cigarette.

One of this season's guest conductors is bushy-mustached Pierre Monteux. "The Rite of Spring" score before him had a stand-out rendition at the concert.

Doors at Symphony Hall open at 6:40 on rehearsal nights. Early arrivals had a chance to watch stage hands, including Bert Martin (left) lug in heavy harps and bottledrums.

Violin virtuoso Yehudi Menuhin, in sport shirt and showing evidence of 5 o'clock shadow, greets admirers backstage. Second in the series of this year's open rehearsals will be held Thursday, Dec. 13.

Olivia Hall Luetke, second harpist, wears a simply tailored suit . . . informality rules the platform.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 9 - 1951

MAHLER'S SECOND

Klemperer Leads Vienna Unit in Symphony

MAHLER'S Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Resurrection") is a disturbed and disturbing score of broad dimension and dramatic impact. It is recorded for the first time on long-play—and most welcome, too—by Vox on two twelve-inch disks. It is played by the Vienna Symphony under Otto Klemperer and sung by Ilona Steingruber, soprano; Hilde Roessl-Majdan, alto, and the Akademie Kammerchor.

The performance gets under the skin of this remarkable music, making the most of its monumental diversity of motive and hinting subtly at the intuitive meanings of its intimate passages. Particularly effective are some huge crescendos and the smooth singing of Mme. Roessl-Majdan in the final movements.

The set cannot be recommended unreservedly, however. For one thing, the orchestra sounds reduced in size, notably in the string sections—single instruments stand out as they would never do in a massed section, particularly when one or two of the violins indulge in sobbing accentuation. And for another, the recording is weak in the bass and sometimes wavers annoyingly in level of volume.

The Juilliard String Quartet, which has developed a fine reputation largely on the basis of its performances of contemporary music, play's Ravel's Quartet in F major on a ten-inch Columbia disk. Clarity of performance and reproduction are its strong points.

But the here-and-now approach is ill-suited to this fragrant score. Its mystery is unveiled when every note can be heard as a separate entity, for structure is not the most important aspect of this work; its fragile patterns are all but shattered by heavy punctuation; its wistful murmurings are brought to earth by brusque tone. The recording does not help, although it matches the performance in style, for it amplifies the unimportant musical aspects until the performance sounds only distantly related to the work in hand.

Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring is played by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux (Victor, twelve-inch). The mechanistic, complex score emerges with all its pagan savagery and brilliance, for the combination of orchestra and conductor is hard to beat. The recording is loud and has quite an echo, but the surface is good and the recording clean.

Alex North's music for the film, Streetcar Named Desire, is reproduced on a ten-inch Capitol disk. Both composer and performers display remarkable virtuosity within the macabre limits set them. For there are mood-pieces to match almost every kind of decadence, done in jazzy and vaporous idioms, and all made with taste and style.

Richard Tauber Sings is a collection of the late tenor's performances of art songs (Decca, twelve-inch). The recording is faithfully engineered to give an intimate effect, as is proper for songs by Schumann, Schubert, Grieg and Strauss. The interpretations are warm and full of conviction.

[44]

Post Dec Dg

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In this, his third year as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch has played in hard luck. He started the season in fine fettle, and in its third week he took the orchestra on a trip to the Midwest. In the course of that strenuous junket, he picked up a virus infection, and at the third pair of concerts, hastily put together after a late return from the Western journey, he looked somewhat the worse for wear. The following week he took to his bed, and Richard Burgin, as he has done at short notice so many times before, took over. He could not, however, work up all of Mr. Munch's program and felt obliged to substitute the ubiquitous Fourth Symphony of Brahms for the more-to-be desired "Iberia" and "Printemps" of Debussy.

* * *

The next week, Mr. Munch took the orchestra to New York, though he plainly should not have done so, since he had a relapse. Again Mr. Burgin replaced him and again the program was changed, and probably for the better, with Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" replacing the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Redemption." The next two pairs of concerts fell, as previously arranged, to Pierre Monteux, whose success with his old orchestra and public was sensational.

* * *

But now Mr. Munch was really ill, with a circulatory disturbance resulting from the aforesaid infection, and some conductor had to be found who could carry on during his enforced rest. In midseason the best men are likely to be tied up, but by a rare stroke of fortune, there was one who was not, the eminent Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The latter's regular orchestra is the Suisse Romande of Geneva that he himself founded in 1918. He also does a good deal of guest conducting, and we had him for a week in January, 1949, while his other American appearances have been numerous. In 1948-'51 he also led the NBC orchestra and those of Cleveland, Chicago, Dallas, Washington, Philadelphia, Montreal, and Havana.

* * *

During the present season, however, Mr. Ansermet had retired from conducting in order to complete a book upon which he has been working and that is said to promulgate a system of analysis, evolved by himself, whereby the meaning of music can be made clearer to listeners. As one who had the privelege of interviewing Mr. Ansermet when he was here three years ago, I can testify to his profound grasp of musical problems. In fact I don't mind saying that his seemed to me the keenest mind in that respect that I had encountered in my many meetings with conductors. Mr. Ansermet intended to be a mathematician and his intellect is razor sharp. Of the many significant statements he made that afternoon, during which he subjected contemporary music to a considerable going-over, I have treasured one in particular, perhaps because it was easier to digest than some of his other observations. Speaking of atonal or keyless music, as practiced by Schoenberg and his disciples, Mr. Ansermet suggested that intervals in such a system had quantity but no quality.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet was born in one of the beauty spots of the world, the town of Vevey on Lake Geneva. He pursued his mathematical studies in the University of Lausanne and at the Sorbonne in Paris. At the same time he studied music in Lausanne, with Ernest Bloch and Otto Barblan; in Paris, with Gedalge, and in Berlin. In 1912 he decided to devote himself completely to music, becoming director of the Kursaal Concerts in Montreux. Three years later he took over the concerts in Geneva, but in that same year, 1915, he allied himself with Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, and it was as the musical head of that incomparable troupe that he made his first visit to Boston. Under his direction we made our acquaintance with things like the "Firebird" and "Petrouchka" of Stravinsky, the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov, the Tartar Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," the "Tamar" of Balakirev and other items that we have since seen and heard from later, and inevitably lesser, ballet companies. The next season, by the way, these peerless Russians returned with Mr. Monteux as chief conductor, after which the latter went to the Met, taking over in Boston in 1919.

* * *

When he returned to us after 34 years, Mr. Ansermet conducted a Tuesday evening concert and a Friday-Saturday pair. Collectively, he played Beethoven's Second "Leonore" Overture and Fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," Debussy's "Iberia," and a "Petite Symphonie Concertante" by his countryman Frank Martin. These performances are recalled as being completely top-notch, and those of the Beethoven Symphony and the Stravinsky and Debussy pieces were even better on Friday than they had been on Tuesday.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
ARIZONA STAR

Symphony School Post Being Filled by Munch

BOSTON, Dec. 13—(AP)—Boston symphony orchestra [illegible] yesterday that Charles Munch, music director, also [illegible] director of the Berkshire Music center, the orchestra's summer music school at Tanglewood.

Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who served as director from the school's foundation in 1940.

Munch invited department heads to return. They include Aaron Copland, assistant director; Leonard Bernstein to head the student orchestra and teach conducting; and Richard Bursin to be in charge of the instrumental faculty.

Lugi Dallapiccola, Italian composer, who taught at Tanglewood (Lenox) last year, also is expected back, Munch said.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 12 1951

Munch Will Direct Tanglewood School

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that Charles Munch, music director, has accepted their invitation to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood. Mr. Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who had served as director from the school's foundation in 1840. The Music Center will hold its tenth anniversary session during July and August of 1952.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 12 1951

DEBUT—Monique de la Bruchollerie, young French pianist, will make her first appearance in the United States at tomorrow evening's open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony. She also will be the soloist at the Friday and Saturday concerts.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 11 1951

Munch to Head Music Center at Tanglewood

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has accepted the directorship of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood, it was announced today.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony said that Munch had accepted their invitation to serve as director of the center. He succeeds the late Serge Koussevitsky, who had served as director from the time the school was founded in 1940.

The Music Center will hold its 10th anniversary session during July and August of 1952.

Munch has invited the following department heads to return, according to the trustees' announcement:

Aaron Copland will continue as assistant director. Leonard Bernstein will head the student orchestra and will teach conducting; Richard Burgin will be in charge of the instrumental faculty; Gregor Piatigorsky will be head of chamber music with William Kroll as associate head; Aaron Copland will be head of composition, Hugh Ross of choral activities and Boris Goldovsky of opera. The principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve as the basis of the instrumental faculty. Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer who taught at Tanglewood last Summer, will again come from Italy.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
DEC 13 1951

Charles Munch Will Direct Tanglewood. Summer Music School

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra announce that Charles Munch, music director, has accepted their invitation to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood. Mr. Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitsky, who had served as director from the school's foundation in 1940. The Music Center will hold its 10th anniversary session during July and August, 1952.

Mr. Munch has invited the department heads to return: Aaron Copland will continue as assistant director. Leonard Bernstein will head the student orchestra and will teach conducting; Richard Burgin will be in charge of the instrumental faculty; Gregor Piatigorsky will be head of chamber music with William Kroll associate head; Aaron Copland will be head of composition. Hugh Ross of choral activities, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. The principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will serve as the basis of the instrumental faculty Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer who taught at Tanglewood last summer, will again come from Italy.

Information on the session may be secured from the Berkshire Music Center Office, in Symphony Hall Boston.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

studying with [illegible]

Munch to Direct School of Music

BOSTON, Dec. 12 (AP)—Boston symphony orchestra trustees said Wednesday that Charles Munch, music director, also will serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer music school at Tanglewood.

Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who served as director from the school's foundation in 1940.

Munch invited department heads to return. They include Aaron Copland, assistant director; Leonard Bernstein to head the student orchestra and teach conducting; and Richard Bursin to be in charge of the instrumental faculty.

Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer, who taught at Tanglewood (Lenox) last year, also is expected back, Munch said.

Munch Succeeds Koussevitzky As Director of Music Center

12/11/51

Special to THE EAGLE

BOSTON—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today became the second director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood.

The BSO trustee announced that Mr. Munch, the music director, had accepted their invitation to serve as director. The only other director the school has ever had was the late BSO conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who founded the Center in 1940. Mr. Koussevitzky died last June, shortly before the school opened, and it was directed by a faculty committee.

Mr. Munch has invited all department heads to return. Aaron Copland will continue as music director. Leonard Bernstein will head the student orchestra and will teach conducting. Richard Burgin, BSO concertmaster, will be in charge of the instrumental faculty. Gregor Piatigorsky will be head of chamber music, with William Kroll as his associate. Mr. Copland will be in charge of composition; Hugh Ross, of choral activities; and Boris Goldovsky, of opera.

The principals and other members of the BSO will serve as the basis of the instrumental faculty. Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer, who taught at Tanglewood last summer, again will come from Italy.

Charles Munch

Furthur information on the forthcoming session may be obtained from the Berkshire Music Center office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

[45]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

hilharmonic n Concert for 00th Time

r Gives It a Plaque, aises Orchestra's Role Life of City and Nation

By Paul V. Beckley

New York Philharmonic-hony Society Orchestra, in a terruption of one of its con- paused for nine minutes last while Mayor Vincent R. Im- eri presented a plaque to the 's president in recognition organization's 5,000th cond G. Blair, the society's ent, accepted the plaque and the orchestra, "one of the atest cultural assets of this " belonged not only to it "but ough the radio it belongs to the tion." He also reminded the dence of "the blunt fact" that h person present was paying nly about one-half of the cost of inging to you the concert which u will be hearing" and said that spite repeal of the Federal ad- ssions tax the orchestra would l again this year to meet its ex- nses.

Mayor Impellitteri spoke of the ilharmonic's excellent job of ublic relations" not only for the y but for the entire country, d noted that its recordings and oadcasts had become part of e "fabric and way of life" in mes in this country "and, in ct, the world."

Designed By Violinist

The plaque was of silver encased an ebony frame. On it was in- ribed the opening bar of Beetho- n's Fifth Symphony, which was ayed at the orchestra's first ncert on Dec. 7, 1842, and a w lines of prose commemorating e 5,000th concert. It was de- gned by Henryk Kaston, violin- t of the Metropolitan Opera, ho is also a jewelry designer. r. Kaston could not be in rnegie Hall to witness the pass- g of his plaque from Mr. Im- llitteri's to Mr. Blair's hand be- use he was fiddling for the etropolitan's production last ight of Wagner's "Goetterdaem- erung."

As a prelude to both the brief remony and the concert, the or- hestra played the National An- hem. A trumpet, two trombones, nd a snare drum were added to complement of the orchestra f this music, and the men stood, course, to play it—a scene like- se reminiscent of the first con- t 109 years and six days ago in old Apollo Rooms on Broad- y between Canal and Walker S , when the orchestra, except for 'cellists, stood throughout the con- rt.

In the absence of Dimitri Mitro- oulos, musical director of the hilharmonic, who was appearing s a guest conductor in Detroit, eorge Szell conducted the or- hestra. One of the compositions layed at the first concert was re- layed last night, the New Over- ure in D by Kalliwoda, a Bo- emian composer not much heard of any more. It was followed by a remiere performance of Bartok's ivertimento for String Orches- ra; the overture, intermezzo and cherzo from Mendelssohn's "A idsummer Night's Dream," and ozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat ajor with Guiomar Novaes at the iano.

Message From Dewey

Not only did the audience in- lude government officials, diplo- ats, educators and musical nota- les, but many who could not at- end sent congratulations, includ- ng Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

Mr. Mitropoulos wrote that his heart is celebrating" with the or- hestra. Igor Stravinsky, the com- oser, wished it "five thousand happy returns." Nearly all of the conductors of the nation's orches- ras sent messages, as did pianists, iolinists and singers. Among those who attended last night was Wil- helmina, Queen Mother of the Netherlands.

Philadelphia orchestras have given more than 5,000 concerts. Dr. Anthony Reiff sr., was a founder and first vice-president of the orchestra. Mr. Reiff said he own the bassoon played by his grand- father at the first concert.

Both the Boston and Philadel- phia orchestras have given more concerts than the Philharmonic, which gave few during its early years. The Boston Symphony, which gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881, has played 5,802 per- formances since then, and the Philadelphia Orchestra has given 5,783 performances since its first concert on Nov. 16, 1900.

The 5,000th concert was re- corded by the Voice of America.

The City Pays Tribute to the Philharmonic

Jack Frank

Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri presenting plaque on behalf of the city to Floyd G. Blair, president of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, at Carnegie Hall last night. The inscription reads: "Presented by the City of New York, Vincent R. Impellitteri, Mayor, December 13, 1951, Carnegie Hall, in commemoration of the five thousandth concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, America's oldest symphony orchestra. One hundred and tenth season. The history of the Philharmonic is the history of music in America"

The Philharmonic's 5,000th

George Szell Conducts With a Bow to Society's First Program in 1842

By Francis D. Perkins

Last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society was the 5,000th in the long career of our senior musical institution, and this landmark was recognized both musically and municipally in a ceremony described in an adjacent column. The program conducted by George Szell began with a retrospective glance at the first program of the original Philharmonic in the Apollo Rooms on Dec. 8, 1842, nearly half a century before the opening of Carnegie Hall; this closed with the then New Overture in D by Johann Wenzeslaus Kalliwoda, of Prague, which opened yesterday evening's list. The first Philharmonic season was also recalled by Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," first played by this orchestra in April, 1843—the first performances of the intermezzo and scherzo from Mendelssohn's music for this immortal Shakespearean comedy, which followed the overture yesterday, took place in Berlin six months later.

Kalliwoda, who long ago joined the ranks of forgotten nineteenth century composers, had several Philharmonic performances in the 1840s; his Overture in D was revived for the Society's 2,000th concert in November, 1925. It deserves respect, if not a return to the active list, with a form, style and very agreeable themes which have some suggestions of Mendelssohn and also of the overtures of earlier composers, including Weber and Beethoven. Its principal weakness appears in the latter part of its course, when the music marks time with some repetitions which halt a previous well ordered progress.

Bela Hartok's Divertimento for Strings, composed in 1939, has been played here only once before, by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Jan. 28, 1941, when the composer, who died six years ago, bowed for an enthusiastic audience. It is straightforward, unproblematical music; the first movement suggests the noted Hungarian's nationality, although he disavowed any use of folk material; the second is expressively meditative, mildly dissonant, and the swift flowing finale gave ample opportunity to exhibit the delectable tone and instrumental virtuosity of the Philharmonic's string sections.

Mendelssohn's music was appropriately included in this program, since the Philharmonic made him an honorary member in 1846. The overture received a lively, outspoken performance which did not, however, overlook its delicacy and fantasy; the interpretation of the intermezzo was unusually imaginative. The early Mozart concerto in E flat was appropriate for this program, as it would have been for any other in the society's history. Both Miss Novaes and the orchestra were in excellent form for this delectable work; the pianist, with constant musicality of tone, gave an interpretation which combined both vitality and subtlety of dynamic and expressive nuance, fully realizing the pervasive poetry of the andantino and the irresistible high spirits of the finale.

The Program

5,000th concert last night: guest conductor, George Szell; soloist, Guiomar Novaes, pianist. The program:

Overture in D, Op. 38.....Kalliwoda
Divertimento for String Orchestra.....Bartok
First performance by this orchestra.
Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Piano Concerto in E flat major (K. 271).....Mozart

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

Charles Munch To Lead Tanglewood Festival

BOSTON, Dec 12—(AP)—Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees said Wednesday that Charles Munch, music director, also will serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer music school at Tanglewood.

Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who served as director from the school's foundation in 1940.

Munch invited department heads to return. They include Aaron Copland, assistant director; Leonard Bernstein to head the student orchestra and teach conducting, and Richard Bursin to be in charge of the instrumental faculty.

James Abresch

Michael Rabin, who will make his Boston debut in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto Tuesday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 15 1951

MUSIC

French Pianist in U. S. Debut With Symphony; Ansermet Conducts

BY CYRUS DURGIN

A striking, even spectacular, event of the music season was the United States debut yesterday afternoon of the French pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie. She was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff. This concert, as that tonight will be, was conducted by Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss musician who has come to Boston as interim leader of the orchestra during the convalescence of Charles Munch. The program otherwise includes the "Hebrides" Overture of Mendelssohn, Faure's little "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite, and "La Mer", by Debussy.

Miss de la Bruchollerie is that rarity, a musicians' and the public's artist. She has a big keyboard technic which, presently, you more or less forget under the spell of her expressive playing. Speed, agility, the gift of the caressing phrase, a wide range of dynamic effects, and a "touch" capable of infinite colorations of tone—all those attributes she has in full measure.

Not a bar was clouded, made rhythmically untidy or anything but an exact statement of what it was supposed to be. Everything sang all the way. What is a good but not great concerto, with a fireworks finale intended to whoop up applause, was admirably set forth in every way. I had a feeling Mlle. de la Bruchollerie let Mr. Ansermet set the pace and general tone of the performance. Had she been in complete command, I suspect there would have been more tension and excitement.

At the end, there were cheers, applause and stamping for the small, blonde and attractive artist, who returned to bow at least four times. Unless Mlle. de la Bruchollerie is not back within six weeks to give a solo concert, someone will have been asleep at the switch. That is, providing she has no other commitments to prevent a return.

It was good to hear Mr. Ansermet again; for he had given us performances in the Winter of 1949 that still linger pleasantly in the memory. He is of the discreet-tempo-clarity-and-ordered-expression school, but he is not without fire. This was proved in his crescendant reading of "La Mer," a reading which avoided the undesirable extremes of juicy thickness of sound and a dry, X-ray delineation of Debussy's mood pictures.

Mr. Ansermet has changed the seating of the orchestra a little, with violins massed on the audience's left, and, on the right, cellos at front, backed by violas and double-basses. (Mr. Monteux, on his visit, had temporarily restored the "classic" seating plan.)

Although it was with Debussy that Mr. Ansermet made his greatest effect, the Faure was a glowing texture of subtle colors, and Mendelssohn's nice old Overture was clothed in appropriate style, flexible rhythm and rich tone.

[46]

Ansermet as Symphony Guest Conductor

Christian Science Monitor
Dec. 15/51

Mlle. de la Bruchollerie in Rachmaninov Work

By Harold Rogers

Ernest Ansermet and Monique de la Bruchollerie cooperated in a performance of great beauty and finesse yesterday afternoon in Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto. It wasn't so much a pyrotechnical feat to dazzle the ear as it was music that flowed from the heart. Both conductor and pianist deeply understand the art of understatement.

The concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra marked Ansermet's first appearance in Symphony Hall since January, 1949, when he was here as guest conductor. At Charles Munch's invitation he recently flew here from his native Switzerland to conduct the orchestra for six weeks. Ansermet founded the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, one of Europe's leading orchestras, in 1918.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mlle de la Bruchollerie—who has attained considerable stature as a pianist in Europe and South America by performing with such conductors as Munch, Boult, and Paray—proved in her initial United States appearance yesterday that she is a sensitive and expressive musician.

She gave the opening Allegro of the Rachmaninov a thoughtful and careful reading. Her poetics have a patina, a mellow glow that is especially effective in the lyrical portions. She did not choose to set the piano in stark contrast with the orchestra; neither did she allow it to be overshadowed. At the close of the first movement the musicians showered her with bravas.

♪ ♪ ♪

She infused the impassioned Intermezzo with much emotion, and she brought off the Finale, with its mounting tensions and climaxes, with a tempered brilliance. In one or two spots the piano ran ahead of the orchestra, but otherwise Ansermet held the ensemble in gear with the soloist.

The conductor gave a refined interpretation of Fauré's exquisite suite drawn from incidental music to Materlinck's play, "Pelléas et Mélisande." Composed in 1898, four years before the first production of Debussy's opera on the same play, Fauré's score is filled with those rarefied moods that Debussy later captured with even greater subtlety. The tragic Adagio was last heard here in November, 1949, when Mr. Munch played it in memory of Ginette Neveu.

In Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, which opened the concert, Ansermet brought out the restlessness of the Hebridean tide; and in the closing selection, Debussy's "La Mer," his undulating baton again summoned up visions of an ocean in motion.

In these works the conductor delineated the individual orchestral lines while preserving the plasticity of the whole—a remarkable feat. One is impressed by the crystalline quality of Ansermet's readings and his talent for appealing as much to the listener's intellect as to the emotions.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 22 1951

MUSIC

Ansermet Superb in Beethoven, Ravel and Stravinsky at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ernest Ansermet gave us another afternoon of superb orchestral conducting at the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall yesterday. The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the complete "Mother Goose" Suite by Ravel, and three numbers from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." That there was no observance of Christmas may be ascribed to the fact that most suitable Christmas scores are big and special, and require more time for preparation than the Symphony's interim conductor has had.

Mr. Ansermet gave a tense and somewhat personal reading of the work which used to be called the "V for Victory Symphony" during the last war. The personal touches were mainly in the form of little retards and other rhetorical devices here and there, none of which did violence to the music, and all of which, as I followed the score, seemed to be entirely within the Beethoven spirit.

There were a few spots where the ensemble was a trifle untidy, where some of the inner voices struck out a bit more than they might have. But in the main, this was a muscular and healthy performance and, as seems to be a peculiarity with Mr. Ansermet, it built up into real excitement toward the end.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" was done for the first time by this orchestra with the Prelude and "Danse du Rouet" restored. Those two numbers usually are omitted, no doubt for the sake of brevity. All seven episodes, however charming in what they have to say, or glittering in their orchestration, make a long session of Ravel.

Here Mr. Ansermet was equally in his element. The instrumental texture was faultlessly clear and no tiny detail failed to take its part in the total effect. One of the remarkable Ansermet virtues, subtle-rhythm-within-the-long-line, was notably evident, as again it was to be in the three numbers from "Petrouchka."

I think I had never heard before so refined a performance of Stravinsky's ballet music. Everything was so neatly in place, no matter how much complication might be in progress at the moment, that the reading seemed pure genius of technic and style. But there were force and drive all the same, and this "Petrouchka" was by no means tame.

Mr. Ansermet, like Mr. Monteux before him, has made a deep and pleasant impression upon the Boston public, to judge by the comments which have come my way. It is indeed unfortunate that Mr. Munch has been obliged to rest up for a time, but certainly the orchestra and the public are to be congratulated upon the splendid quality of Mr. Monteux as guest, and Mr. Ansermet as interim conductor. Such men, with the Boston Symphony as their instrument, can work musical wonders.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
DEC 13 1951

MAJOR & MINOR

Monteux Reveals Mastery of Podium In Leading 'Rite'

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

THE presentation in Constitution Hall of Stravinsky's once revolutionary ballet music, "The Rite of Spring" was one of the most useful and instructive events of the season.

The performance involved the venerable Pierre Monteux who directed the premiere of this music in Paris in 1912. It involved also the great Boston Symphony which Monteux rescued from mediocrity and lifted to the exalted level of artistic efficiency on which Koussevitzky found it 27 years ago.

Finally, of course, it represented Stravinsky with the major work of his career. Washington had not heard it for 20 years and in this city of constantly changing population, that probably means that most of those present in Constitution Hall on Dec. 6 never had heard the work.

I first met Stravinsky in 1924 when he came to Chicago to witness the local premiere of "The Rite of Spring." The poor man had a bad cold. Clad in heavy woolen underwear and a bathrobe like Joseph's coat of many colors, he wore also a heavy bejeweled crucifix. The room was frightfully hot, which explains how it happened that I can report on these intimate details of his wardrobe.

♫

I WANTED Stravinsky to talk about "The Rite of Spring" but he had other ideas. "The Rite" was then 12 years old, and its creator displayed a lack of interest in his music that, to put it mildly, was rare indeed.

Probably he thought I would not understand a technical discusion, especially in German—he then spoke no English—, and since his German was far from fluent and since he felt as miserable as only a man with a heavy cold can feel, I did not press him, but listened politely while he discussed his newer manner, which he called neo-classicism.

This, it developed, meant rewriting the music of Von Weber and other lesser classicists to make it conform to Stravinsky's ideas of harmony and orchestration. I listened skeptically and have had no reason in the intervening years to change my opinion.

I next met Stravinsky at Dumbarton Oaks, then the home of the Honorable and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss. Stravinsky was present to conduct his "Dumbarton Concerto" which he had composed to honor a wedding anniversary of his distinguished host and hostess. A review of this exclusive premiere subsequently appeared in these columns.

♫

STRAVINSKY is a slight little man, with sharply acquiline features and brilliant dark eyes. Great conductors, such as the late Frederick Stock, describe him as diabolically clever. When he conducts his own music he is quite ineffective, which explains why Monteux was his vicar in Paris in 1912, and Stokowski and Stock served him in '22, '24, '30, and '51 in America.

This brings us back to Monteux and the performance of "The Rite" on Dec. 6. In every aspect of his art, Monteux is the Nikisch of the present. He has the same effortless, undemonstrative baton technique that made Nikisch lord and ruler of symphony in Leipzig, Berlin, St. Petersburg, and London from 1890 to his death in this century's second decade.

Monteux does not intrude his own personality on the podium. The public hardly sees his gestures. Like Nikisch, he has only to raise a finger of his left hand to release the maximum effort of his symphonists.

He is also master of all the subtleties of orchestral color save one, which later will be discussed. All the deftly wrought inner-voice dialog of Stravinsky's incredibly complicated score is made audible with precise definition.

♫

WHAT Monteux does not value is the added brilliance of the united violin choir. He places the orchestra after the classic patern with violins divided, left and right.

This, of course, was the orchestra of his youth which he places on the concert stage just in the order and pattern which it assumed when it climbed up from the orchestra pit 200 years ago.

For Monteux it is a convenience. For patrons of the Boston Symphony whose ears are sufficiently sensitive it is disappointing.

For even the second violins of the Boston Symphony lose some of the tonal refinement and power when the F-shaped openings in the instrument are turned away from the listener. This is an unnecessary sacrifice to the conductor's convenience one which Munch and Ormandy decline to make.

They are moderns, as one notes with satisfaction. But even they, great as they are can learn much about the value of quiet and ease on the podium from Monteux.

Younger conductors functioning in Washington practice either studied pantomine which indicates self-consciousness and perhaps a tendency to pose, the convulsive intensity of movement, which is at the other extreme and might be modified by practice before a mirror—which is the way Koussevitzky, as a young man, developed poise.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
DEC 16 1951

Munch Retains Berkshire Staff

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, Dec. 15—Following upon the announcement of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Charles Munch, Alsatian conductor of the orchestra, has been named musical director of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mr. Munch has invited present department heads to return.

Aaron Copland will serve as assistant director; Leonard Bernstein, conducting and head of the student orchestra; Richard Bergin, head of the instrumental faculty; Gregor Piatigorsky, head of chamber music with William Kroll as associate head. Mr. Copland will teach composition; Hugh Ross will direct choral activities; Boris Goldowsky, opera. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will form the nucleus of the instrumental faculty. Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer who taught at Tanglewood last summer, again will come from I[taly].

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 16 1951

Munch to Direct Berkshire School

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 15.—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school of music at Tanglewood. He succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who had been director from the school's foundation in 1940.

Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer, is to return for a second summer of teaching, and Mr. Munch has invited the department heads to return. They are Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Hugh Ross, Boris Goldovsky.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 16 1951

Charles Munch to Head Berkshire Music Center

Charles Munch has accepted the offer of the trustees of the Boston orchestra to serve as director of the Berkshire Music center, succeeding the late Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Munch has invited the department heads to return, with Aaron Copland as assistant director and head of composition, Leonard Bernstein as head of the student orchestra and teacher of conducting, Richard Burgin in charge of the instrumental faculty, Gregor Piatigorsky as head of chamber music, Hugh Ross of choral activities, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola, the Italian composer who taught at Tanglewood [Mass.] last summer, will return. The music center's 10th season opens in July and extends into August.

Christmas Concert

The annual Christmas concer by the Alexandria Civic Orche tra will take place in the Alexandria Recreation Center toda at 4:30 p.m. The program lis Helen Morrow as soprano soloist, with Dr. Wendell Margrav conducting the orchestra.

[47]

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 22 1951

C et Superb in en, Ravel and sky at Symphony

RUS DURGIN

rmet gave us another uperb orchestral con-
he Boston Symphony
mphony Hall yesterrogram consisted of ifth Symphony," the ther Goose" Suite by ee numbers from Stra-ouchka." That there nce of Christmas may o the fact that most tmas scores are big nd require more time
n than the Symphony's ctor has had.

et gave a tense and
sonal reading of the
sed to be called the Symphony" during
The personal touches in the form of little er rhetorical devices
, none of which did e music, and all of followed the score, entirely within the rit.

a few spots where was a trifle untidy,
of the inner voices bit more than they
But in the main, this ar and healthy per-
as seems to be a pe-
Mr. Ansermet. it al excitement toward ther Goose" was done ne by this orchestra

lude and "Danse du
ed. Those two num-re omitted, no doubt of brevity. All seven ver charming in what say, or glittering in tion, make a long sesnsermet was equally

t. The instrumental ultlessly clear and no iled to take its part ffect. One of the rehet virtues, subtle-
-the-long-line, was
, as again it was to numbers from "Pe-

d never heard before erformance of Stra-music. Everything in place, no matter mplication might be the moment, that the pure genius of tech-
But there were force
the same, and this was by no means

t, like Mr. Monteux
s made a deep and sion upon the Boston
e by the comments me my way. It is inate that Mr. Munch
ed to rest up for a ainly the orchestra
are to be congratuspendid quality of s guest, and Mr. An-rim conductor. Such Boston Symphony as t, can work musical

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 16 1951

Munch Appointment as Director Of Music Center Is Welcome Action

Department Heads Invited to Return; Jug End Barn to Hold Open House Dec. 23; Berle Decision of Interest

(Special To The Republican)

Lenox, Dec 15—Announcement from ston this week that Charles Munch Paris, France, had been appointed ector of the Music Center in Lenox s met with popular approval by usic lovers who are well versed ith the abilities of Mr. Munch as a ader of the Boston Symphony Or- estra. That Mr. Munch was chosen succeed the late Dr. Serge Kous- vitzky came as no surprise.

In accepting his new post, Mr. unch has invited heads of various partments to return next year. Thus aron Copeland will continue as mu- director at the Center. Leonard rnstein will again head the student chestra and teach conducting; Rich- rd Burgin, concertmaster of the Bos- n Symphony Orchestra, will be in arge of the instrumental faculty; regor Piatigorsky will head the amber music department, with Wil- am Kroll as his assistant; Hugh oss, the choral activities, and Boris oldovsky, the opera. Luigi Dellapi- lla, the Italian composer who ught at Tanglewood School last ar, will return from Italy to re- me his duties.

Jug End Barn, unique resort spot South Egremont, will hold open ouse Sunday, the 23d, from 2 to 5, r residents of Great Barrington and gremont. The manager and board directors will be hosts. "Having ompany" is normal in hotel business, t the owners feel that in addition the pleasure of having citizens of e communities as guests they want em to realize that Jug End Barn an asset to the community. While e "Barn" has retained it's old time haracter it has also kept up with the mes in providing ample facilities for e enjoyment of it's 250 guests in an tmosphere of informality and con- niality.

The "Barn" has been some time in reaching it's present goal but on Sunday, the 23d, the hotel staff is prepared to show some of the changes which are creating a favorable impression on the guests. The establishment was started by Maj. Hugh Straley and then taken over by Robert Lenow, who was the prime mover in making the establishment known along the Atlantic seaboard. He sold it several years ago to a group headed by Spencer H. Logan of Great Barrington. The group also purchased the G Bar S. Ranch in Great Barrington. The "Barn" enjoys a wide popularity and is never lacking of clients at any time of the year. It has a diversified program that makes it appealing to it's visitors at any time of the season.

An announcement from New York this week that Adolf Berle would support Rudolph Halley, Council president of New York City, for mayor in 1953, is of local interest. Mr. Berle is a summer resident at Konkapot Farm, Monument Valley, Great Barrington. Formerly a member of late President Roosevelt's "brain trust," Mr. Berle is state chairman of the Liberty party of New York and is slated to head Radio Free Europe, which has been alloted additional money for this purpose.

Mrs. J. Herbert Owen of Lenox presented, "The Legend of the Christmas Rose," at a meeting of the Hop Brook Club in Tyringham this week.

* * *

Coming from Pine Manor School, Wellesley, this week for the holiday recess will be Miss Virginia Scott, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Y. Scott of Woodsley Rd., Longmeadow; Miss Judith Sanderson, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Paul Sanderson of Colony Rd., Longmeadow, and Miss Karen Lyman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Lyman, Jr., of Englewood Rd., Longmeadow, who comes from Dana Hall.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the third program of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall last night. The soloist was Michael Rabin, violinist. The program:
Variation on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a.....Brahms
Concerto in E minor, Op. 64—Mendelssohn
"Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80.....Faure
"La Mer".....Debussy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

MICHAEL RABIN, the 14-year-old violinist, made his debut with the orchestra last night in Mendelssohn's Concerto and, as in the case of Mlle. de la Bruchollerie, whose debut was no less than enormous last week, I again make the standard reservation: he'll have to do a solo recital before I commit myself to much of anything.

In Mr. Rabin's case the reservation is considerably more pronounced inasmuch as he chose the Mendelssohn, a work of perennial charm but technically no great hurdle for any really advanced student. Indeed, so phenomenally has violin technique advanced since Mendelssohn's day that the first violin section of the Boston Pops Orchestra sails through the finale en masse to the accompaniment of popping corks—and does it quite as flawlessly as the soloist did it last night.

WHILE THE YOUNG violinist's technique is certainly advanced, allowing him to encompass the brilliant passage work, the double-stops, the light bowing, the fleet fingering and all the challenging violinistic problems of the work without effort, I couldn't see that he informed this familiar work with any great spirit. It went well, very well indeed, but no particular stamp of inspiration or re-creative vitality shone through. Maybe this all comes later, and on the assumption that it does I leave Mr. Rabin with congratulations and good wishes. He at least doesn't have much competition amongst the 14-year-olders, a fact that speaks well of his future.

The concert began with Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and it seemed to me to be a generally subdued reading by Mr. Ansermet, and not without technical error, too, orchestrally speaking. As the remaining pieces on the program were on last week's program, I didn't wait to hear how they went, but if they equalled their previous performance the concert closed on a notable note.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
DEC 17 1951

Charles Munch To Direct Tanglewood Music School

Special to The Times Herald

Boston, Mass., Dec. 17.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced that Charles Munch, music director, has accepted their invitation to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood.

Mr. Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevtizsky, who had served as director from the school's foundation in 1940. The music center will hold its 10th anniversary session during July and August of 1952.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 19 1951

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the third program of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall last night. The soloist was Michael Rabin, violinist. The program:
Variation on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a.....Brahms
Concerto in E minor, Op. 64—Mendelssohn
"Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80.....Faure
"La Mer".....Debussy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

MICHAEL RABIN, the 14-year-old violinist, made his debut with the orchestra last night in Mendelssohn's Concerto and, as in the case of Mlle. de la Bruchollerie, whose debut was no less than enormous last week, I again make the standard reservation: he'll have to do a solo recital before I commit myself to much of anything.

In Mr. Rabin's case the reservation is considerably more pronounced inasmuch as he chose the Mendelssohn, a work of perennial charm but technically no great hurdle for any really advanced student. Indeed, so phenomenally has violin technique advanced since Mendelssohn's day that the first violin section of the Boston Pops Orchestra sails through the finale en masse to the accompaniment of popping corks—and does it quite as flawlessly as the soloist did it last night.

WHILE THE YOUNG violinist's technique is certainly advanced, allowing him to encompass the brilliant passage work, the double-stops, the light bowing, the fleet fingering and all the challenging violinistic problems of the work without effort, I couldn't see that he informed this familiar work with any great spirit. It went well, very well indeed, but no particular stamp of inspiration or re-creative vitality shone through. Maybe this all comes later, and on the assumption that it does I leave Mr. Rabin with congratulations and good wishes. He at least doesn't have much competition amongst the 14-year-olders, a fact that speaks well of his future.

The concert began with Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and it seemed to me to be a generally subdued reading by Mr. Ansermet, and not without technical error, too, orchestrally speaking. As the remaining pieces on the program were on last week's program, I didn't wait to hear how they went, but if they equalled their previous performance the concert closed on a notable note.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

CHARLES MUNCH has been named the director of the Berkshire music center, the summer school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Tanglewood, Mass. Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who had served as director from the school's foundation in 1940.

Mr. Munch has invited the department heads to return: Aaron Copeland will continue as assistant director. Leonard Bernstein will head the student orchestra and will teach conducting; Richard Burgin will be in charge of the instrumental faculty; Gregor Piatigorsky will be head of chamber music with William Kroll as associate head; Aaron Copeland will be head of composition; Hugh Ross of Choral activities; and Boris Goldovsky of opera. The principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will serve as the basis of the instrumental faculty.

OPENS TERM AS ACTING CONDUCTOR

Boston Sunday Post
Dec. 16 '51

Ansermet Pleases at Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts of last night and the preceding afternoon were especially notable. They served to begin Ernest Ansermet's term of acting conductor, now set at six weeks, and to introduce to America a remarkable young French pianist, Monique de la Bruchollerie.

WRITING BOOK

That a conductor of Mr. Ansermet's stature should be available at short notice was due to the fact that he had temporarily abandoned his Geneva post to devote himself to a book on music that has been occupying him for two years. The Swiss leader made a highly favorable impression when he was here for a week in 1949, an impression that was immensely strengthened last night and Friday. As for Mlle. de la Bruchollerie, she won the admiration of all with her musical, sympathetic and highly expert production of Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto; while her comeliness and charm, her modest bearing, enabled her to score a personal as well as an artistic triumph.

Unless her present commitments forbid, this gifted and personable young woman should return to us in recital, and, for that matter, at subsequent symphony concerts.

Mr. Ansermet's remarkable powers as conductor, his interpretative gifts, and extraordinary musicianship were exhibited alike in the orchestral portion of Rachmaninoff's Concerto and in the other numbers on the program: Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," the Suite drawn from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande" and Debussy's three Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea." Mr. Ansermet is a famed Debussy interpreter and his previous reading here of "Iberia" led us to expect something special in "La Mer," and we were not disappointed. Orchestral strokes with which we had been long familiar took on a new effectiveness, but what chiefly impressed was the conductor's bold conception of the work. There was plenty of tonal magic when such was in order, but in the more vigorous sections the full power of the orchestra was released.

Debussy's ocean was the real thing, and so was Mendelssohn's. This earlier seascape had also the tang of salt air, the surging of the waters, the violence of the wind. Mendelssohn and Debussy worked with different tonal means, but each in his way, as Mr. Ansermet showed us, wrought a masterpiece.

On a par with all this was the performance of the Faure Suite. Again Mr. Ansermet lent a degree of robustness to music that has always seemed not to call for that quality, and as a result, this music attained new stature. Its subtleties and refinements were still there but to them was added high eloquence.

MUSIC

Violinist Michael Rabin, 15 Years Old, Makes Debut With Symphony

Even if you didn't know the history of young Michael Rabin, 15-year-old New York violinist who made his local debut with the Boston Symphony last night, you could tell he had music in his blood. He plays that way, with a phenomenal and becoming naturalness, as though there were nothing else in the world to do than to make a fiddle sing.

This was the third concert of the Tuesday evening series, with Ernest Ansermet conducting. The program included the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, with Rabin as soloist; Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, the Suite from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" and Debussy's "La Mer."

Michael Rabin plays with a wonderfully relaxed and fluid style, somewhat reminiscent of Isaac Stern's playing. His left hand is as precise as an electric typewriter; his bowing arm is graceful, yet firm. It is perhaps too early to expect much personal warmth in so young an artist. Yet Michael Rabin's performance of the Mendelssohn was something more than an exact repetition of careful teaching. Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra lent the young violinist the kind of understanding support every soloist must dream about. It was nigh perfect.

---

[48]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 18 1951

Conductor Charles Munch takes an agreeable pause at intermission to autograph programs for two attractive admirers, Mrs. Ben Fisher of Boston, left, and Mrs. Walter H. McKinney, jr., of Detroit.

The success of the concert can be measured by the pleased expressions on the faces of departing members of the audience. Here, reflecting the after-glow of the music, are the Peruvian Ambassador to the Organization of American States, Juan Bautista de Lavalle; Mrs. George D. Neilson, Municipal Court Judge Neilson, Senora de Lequerica and her husband, Spanish Ambassador Jose Felix de Lequerica, left to right.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY dedicated its Thursday program at Constitution Hall to the late Serge Koussevitzky.

Enjoying the performance from a box are Mrs. Thomas Hart, Mrs. Francis Whitten, Mrs. Jouett Shouse, Lt. Gen. Hart, U. S. M. C., and Mr. Shouse. The Shouses are boxholders for the three Boston concerts this year.

Mrs. Howard Mitchell, wife of the National Symphony Orchestra conductor, meets with Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor, and Mme. Henri Bonnet, wife of the French Ambassador, left to right, in the Constitution Hall reception room before the concert.

—Star Staff Photos by Robert Brenner.

d 'Petrouchka' at Symphony

Monitor Dec. 22

Ravel, Stravinsky on Ansermet Program

By Harold Rogers

Perhaps it was Ernest Ansermet's intention; perhaps it was coincidence; but the Boston Symphony's guest conductor was certainly in tune with the holiday mood yesterday afternoon when he summoned up visions of fairy tales and puppets.

True, the concerts this week end have their serious side, opening as they do with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. But the mighty C minor graciously gives way to the gay colors of Ravel's sparkling "Mother Goose" Suite and Stravinsky's rollicking "Petrouchka."

Symphony Hall glowed with the musical scenes of "Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas," and "Beauty and the Beast"—these from Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye." And what could be more gala than Stravinsky's roisterous ballet of a street fair—the organ grinder, the dancing bear, and puppets called Petrouchka, the Moor, and the Ballerina?

* * *

One of the impressive features of Mr. Ansermet's conducting is his refined intellectual control of the orchestra. Some conductors impose their own emotionalism upon the players so that the music is imbued with a sensuous or even a sensual quality. This approach is not to be condemned when the appeal is to the listener's higher emotions.

Other conductors—and Mr. Ansermet is one of them—appeal more to the listener's intellect, the emotions thereby being held in careful check. The audible effect of this approach is generally one of clarity, balance, and neatly-shaped phrases.

Of such things were Mr. Ansermet's reading of the Beethoven Fifth. The fugato entries and lines in the Scherzo, for instance, were crystalline; the pizzicato portion had a rare and delicate pianissimo; the extended coda of the triumphant finale was so deftly handled that the concluding dominant-tonic statements, which often seem endless, were brought off in comfort.

* * *

Ravel wrote his "Mother Goose" Suite for Mimi and Jean Godebski, the children of a family to which he was very close. Mimi and Jean were to play the piano duet (its original form) in concert, but, like many children, they were not interested in practicing. The première was therefore given to two other children—Christine Verger and Germaine Durany—who played the music in Paris in 1910.

The Suite as performed by Mr. Ansermet yesterday was unusual in that it included, for the first time in Boston, two portions that are generally omitted—the Prélude and the "Dance of the Spinning Wheel." The prelude is a pastiche of themes heard later in the individual numbers; the "Spinning Wheel" hums busily in traditional style, though in Ravel's fragile manner.

* * *

The pieces scintillated under Mr. Ansermet's baton—especially the gamelan facets of "Laideronette." (On the piano the latter lies on the black notes in the key of F-sharp: a pentatonic scale of Oriental flavor.). There is the charming dialogue, uttered first by the Beauty, then by the Beast, and finally by both. The perfumed and plangent chords of "The Fairy Garden" piled up for a shimmeringly brilliant conclusion.

And what about Mr. Ansermet and "Petrouchka"? The conductor has long been identified with Stravinsky's early works, and with "Petrouchka" in particular. His recording of this music is considered by many electronic technicians, as well as by many musicians, to be one of the finest ever made.

Yesterday Mr. Ansermet painted musically as Stravinsky must have intended—with splashy strokes of bold Russian colors on a gigantic canvas. There were several notable solos—by Georges Laurent when he plaintively played the tune for the flute, by Roger Voisin (whose trumpet, Mr. Ansermet said recently, is the finest he has ever heard), and by the versatile Bernard Zighera, who gave a crisp performance of the piano parts in the first two movements and then switched to his harp for the finale.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

Boston Conductor Named Berkshire Center Director

Of interest to Portlanders who have attended the Berkshire Music center when the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presided over programs and summer school is announcement by the Boston Symphony trustees that Charles Munch, the symphony's conductor, has accepted their invitation to be director of the Music center. The Boston orchestra maintains the center and school at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The center will hold its 10th anniversary session during July and August of 1952. Mr. Munch has asked department heads to return: Aaron Copland, as assistant director; Leonard Bernstein, as student orchestra head; Richard Burgin, instrumental faculty; Gregor Piatigorsky, chamber music; Hugh Ross, choral activities, and Boris Goldovsky, opera.

Herald Dec. 22

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the ninth concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The assisting artist was Bernard Zighera, pianist. The program:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
"Ma Mere L'Oye" ..... Ravel
"Petrouchka" ..... Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A SPLENDID CONCERT, this, well designed for variety and balance, well performed and well received. It served to demonstrate anew Mr. Ansermet's scholarly yet warmly sensitive style and again to underscore the subtle shift in audience approach that has been developing ever since Koussevitzky's retirement.

This shift is to programing that does not necessarily bring the concert to a close in a blaze of tonal glory at the highest level of fortissimo to produce an audience sensation and send it reeling dizzily out into the street. It will be remembered that Koussevitzky seldom if ever allowed a concert to end on anything but a clamorous note; he regularly avoided any symphony or work whose final bars were marked ppp to close either the first or the last half of a concert. It was a formula that worked miracles for him, too, and it is no discredit to him that he used it; everybody does, including Messrs. Munch and Ansermet.

YET MR. MUNCH never hesitates to do a work that does end quietly; he is not concerned with audience sensation, and it matters not in the least to him whether he elicits stamping upon the floor or merely the moderate demonstration that a non-colossal ending inevitably arouses. That's the way it was written, and that is that.

Yesterday Mr. Ansermet displayed that same combination of unconcern with audience reaction and artistic integrity by doing the original closing bars of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." This masterpiece of carnival jollity mingled with ever-present overtones of the personal tragedy of Petrouchka, is ordinarily brought to a conclusion in full cry. Mr. Ansermet, however, played it out; poor Petrouchka was allowed—as Stravinsky put it—to have "his sorrowful and querulous collapse."

The consequence was not half the applause conductor and orchestra deserved for the superb performance of the work, a performance that brought out all the instrumental ingenuity and orchestra brilliance of the ballet suite.

Although Mr. Ansermet occasionally referred to the score, he traversed most of it from memory, a striking feat in itself, and special mention must go to Alfred Zighera for his role at the piano. And while the performance did not elicit the response it usually does, the audience was clearly well pleased.

MR. ANSERMET is to be complimented as well on doing all of Ravel's "Ma Mere L'Oye." Considering the magical effects Ravel achieves in the Prelude and the Dance of the Spinning Wheel, hitherto omitted, it is hard to see why the whole suite has never been presented here before. It may be pointed out that the apotheosis at the end did not have the tonal grandeur we have been accustomed to, but as with Petrouchka it was a performance remarkable for clarity of texture.

If it is true, as somebody once put it, that the correct performance of a symphony is the one you heard when it first bowled you over, this one didn't quite come up to my conception of it. It was very straightforward, very honestly conceived, very justly paced, and imbued with a good deal of taste and refinement, but it didn't stir me very much. It didn't have for me, in short, the revelatory character that makes every new reading of this giant among symphonies a vital experience. But this didn't appear to be true for the audience at large, which was obviously well satisfied.

The program next week introduces the celebrated cellist Zara Nelsova to this audience for the first time in Dvorak's B minor Concerto, with Mozart's G minor Symphony and works by Martin and Chabrier rounding out the afternoon.

...day to day act ...kly and send for the puzzles.

Post Dec. 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Mother Goose (the Suite of Ravel), a puppet show (Stravinsky's "Petrouchka") and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, all add up to a holiday program for the current pair of Symphony concerts. Mr. Ansermet's list was suited to, and possibly beamed at, youthful listeners, but there were not so many of them on hand yesterday as there have sometimes been. Perhaps they will show up tonight. Anyway, this was a concert that adults could also relish. If the music of Ravel was orginally written as a piano duet for children, the musical content is sophisticated, and the elaborate orchestration makes it more so. In the latter form it served as a ballet, and for this ballet Ravel added a Prelude and Dance of the Spinning Wheel. These two initial sections are now being presented for the first times in Boston.

Ballet, if not Mr. Ansermet's particular province, is a field of music in which he is experienced, and the one in which he first made his real mark as conductor. When he came here in 1915, with Diaghilev's Ballet Russe, he introduced to us the "Petrouchka" of Stravinsky, which did not reach the Symphony concerts until five years later. There was, therefore, particular appropriateness in hearing portions of the music from him yesterday.

This concluding number on the program had Bernard Zighera busy doubling as first harp and pianist, and distinguishing himself in both capacities. The other members of the orchestra distinguished themselves, too. The performance of Ravel's Suite attained the utmost in tonal refinement and the playing of the music of Stravinsky was in exactly the right vein, pungent in tone and rhythmically incisive.

It is only natural that Beethoven's Fifth, as the most logical of symphonies, should appeal to an ex-professor of mathematics. Yet while Mr. Ansermet's exposition of the symphony was marked by the clarity we have come to associate with him, there was nothing in the least dry or academic about it.

From first to last both the overall plan of the symphony and each individual detail received their respective due. It is possible that some who have been reared upon overinflated and frenetic performances of the Fifth could have found that of yesterday undersized and tame. For those who think that a composer is more honored by the respecting rather than by the distortion and perversion of his intentions, this was an admirable and wholly satisfying performance, and withal a most eloquent one.

In any event, it was warmly received by the audience as were those of the works of Ravel and Stravinsky.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

Munch Will Be Director at Tanglewood

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce that Charles Munch, music director, has accepted their invitation to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of music maintained by the orchestra at Tanglewood. Mr. Munch succeeds the late Serge Koussevitzky, who had served as director from the school's foundation in 1940. The music center will hold its 10th anniversary session during July and August of 1952.

Mr. Munch has invited the department heads to return. Aaron Copland will continue as assistant director. Leonard Bernstein will head the student orchestra and will teach conducting. Richard Burgin will be in charge of the instrumental faculty. Gregor Piatigorsky will be head of chamber music with William Kroll as associate head.

Italian Composer Returning

Mr. Copland will be head of composition, Hugh Ross of choral activities, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. The principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve as the basis of the instrumental faculty. Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer who taught at Tanglewood last summer, will again come from Italy.

Information on the session may be secured from the Berkshire Music Center office in Symphony Hall, Boston.

[51]

Our Critic's Report for the Week

Post Dec. 23

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By reason of the early and continued indisposition of Charles Munch, the Symphony Concerts have pursued thus far an uncertain and troubled course. In a program-making sense there have been casualties. We have missed certain promised items from Debussy and Franck, and goodness knows what else. The concerts preceding Christmas failed to give us Berlioz's choral "L'Enfance du Christ," the B.S.O. premiere of which had been eagerly anticipated.

* * *

But there have been compensations. A different conductor means a different point of view, and in these nine pairs of concerts, besides Mr. Munch, we have had, for two pairs each, Messrs. Burgin, Monteux and Ansermet. It was stated here in advance of Mr. Ansermet's coming that we were lucky to get him. We were, in fact, luckier than we realized. The favorable impression that he made in his week of guesting in January, '49, has been immensely strengthened.

* * *

In the very nature of things, the following summary cannot take into account the concerts of last evening and the day before, in which Mr. Ansermet offered Beethoven's Fifth, Ravel's "Mother Goose" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." It may be assumed, however, that he succeeded in bringing to these pieces the same illuminating approach that he brought, at the preceeding concerts, to Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, in which Monique de la Bruchollerie made her sensational American debut, the "Pelleas and Melisande" music of Faure and Debussy's "The Sea," and, at the concert of last Tuesday evening, to Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn and the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn, in which the 15-year-old Michael Rabin made his bow to Boston. Also during his present stay, Mr. Ansermet played the "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, but that was the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, that this reviewer was unable to attend.

* * *

The music of Mendelssohn has enjoyed unusual favor this season. Besides these three performances under the baton of Mr. Ansermet, the Boston Symphony has also offered the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture (Burgin) and the "Scotch" Symphony (Monteux). In their respective presentations of overture and symphony, Messrs. Burgin and Monteux gave us everything that we had counted on hearing but nothing that we had not expected. Mr. Ansermet's performance of "Fingal's Cave" was in different case, as were his readings of Rachmaninoff, Faure, Debussy and Brahms. Even in the Violin Concerto, where Mendelssohn assigns to the orchestra a distinctly subordinate role, the ear was constantly intrigued as well as charmed.

* * *

Briefly stated, Mr. Ansermet, as conductor, combines in rare degree clarity and warmth. The same might be said of Toscanini, but the Swiss conductor seems to me to add to this combination a feeling for the composer's individuality that the Italian lacks. There is also something unusual about the former's capacity to convince you that you are hearing what the composer meant you to hear, while affording at the same time the satisfaction that comes from an individual approach. His command over the orchestra is absolute, but it is all done without apparent effort. As under Mr. Monteux, the players appear relaxed—there are no distorting and beclouding tensions—but they are also plainly inspired.

* * *

At this point a word must be said for the two soloists. The performance of Melle. de la Bruchollerie was one of extreme musicality, while the virtuosic element was present when needed. The charm of her playing, plus the charm of her presence, made an unforgettable impression. Young Mr. Rabin has not yet that much to offer. His disclosure of the Mendelssohn was musically and technically impeccable, but, quite naturally, lacked the personal note. That will come when the talented youngster from New York gets a little older.

* * *

Now that he is here, Mr. Ansermet is giving us of his best. Nevertheless, he came at a sacrifice of his personal desires. He was hard at work on his forthcoming book on what he calls the phenomenology of music. He considered it more important that he complete this task, now half accomplished, than that he should continue to conduct—"even," he said the other day, "than to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra." "The Meaning of Music," as it will be called, will aim to show why music is as it is and why it affects us as it does. It will embody Mr. Ansermet's theory that its three stages have been the primitive, the Asiatic and the Western, with the corollary that the last-named depends for its very nature on the Christian ethic. Mr. Ansermet believes that the music of Russia is Asiatic at heart but has been enriched by borrowings from the West. We may expect to find him demolishing the 12-tone system of Schoenberg, in which the horizontal and vertical aspects of music are mistakenly combined. "Melody," he explained, "exists in time and harmony in space and the two cannot be considered as one." The lucidity of Mr. Ansermet's conducting can be partly explained by the logic of his thinking.

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, DECEMBER 23, 1951

nd "The Student Prince" Opening T

A Christmas Gift for Munch? Yes---Less Hard Work!

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I have been worrying a good deal lately about Charles Munch who is, as everybody knows, now on a sick leave of absence from his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony. While my concern naturally is focussed on his condition, which is, I am reliably informed, not really serious and which will presently allow him to return to his duties (he is indisposed of a "circulatory" condition, a rough equivalent in meaningless to a virus infection), my real concern is the situation that forces men in his position to all but work themselves to death.

Consider – and be appalled at—what is expected of Mr. Munch: 18 regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six pairs of concerts on Sunday afternoons and Tuesday evenings, six concerts in Sanders theater, Cambridge, 39 out-of-town concerts ranging all the way from Wellesley to Ann Arbor, Michigan, and a Pension Fund concert on top of that – a total of 85 formal concerts in 30 weeks! Added to this are the five Open Rehearsals for students which, while less formal, still require a modified audience approach to conducting.

AND REHEARSALS, TOO

To be sure, Mr. Munch is not [illegible] task of conducting [illegible] these conductors [illegible] what might have been a [illegible] break in his health. [illegible] it is to slight the fact [illegible] regular schedule of the [illegible] calls for four three-hour rehearsals a week. Thus, by a conservative estimate, Charles Munch must devote at least three hours a day for more than 36 weeks of the year spending his physical energies in an athletic effort that would fell a professional wrestler. . . and this is to entirely discount the intellectual effort that he must expend in the studying and learning of scores, in planning programs, in attending to details of personnel in the orchestra, in working with the management in the higher policy levels, and in handling his own personal affairs. Now I submit that all this is more than flesh and blood can endure.

It may be argued that Serge Koussevitzky endured it for 25 years, and I have no answer to that. It is true, until the last few seasons, Koussevitzky walked through this schedule with phenomenal pace. Yet it was always my feeling that the most monumental artistic conceit a man was ever born with sustained him. I have seen him, a half hour before concert time, the absolute picture of emotional and physical exhaustion. But a miracle always happened when he saw the audience before him; the audience nourished him and inspired him and liberated him from weariness. In the green room afterwards, he'd be the picture of ebullience and high spirits. I don't know how he did it; nobody does. One thing is clear, however: few other men are so constituted either physically or egotistically as to endure the punishment in the name of audience acclaim.

Then what is the answer to the situation as it regards the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose burden is unique among the orchestras of the world? Again, I do not know. A dual conductorship is clearly out of the question. One man alone must dominate.

So is a mad round of guest conductors. Nothing more seriously imperils the morale and the quality of the orchestra as that, as witness the deplorable estate of the Philharmonic after Barbirolli. Could it be that an assistant conductor be engaged, say a young and talented man after the fashion of Leonard Bernstein (who occupied a similar position in New York before rocketing to fame)? There are several young men I could name this minute who have demonstrated extraordinary capacities as student conductors. Might not one be engaged as a sort of rehearsal conductor with the privilege of doing two or three pairs of concerts during the season and always standing by?

As I envisage it, this young man could prepare the orchestra in three of the weekly rehearsals with Munch at his side instructing, marking, indicating the subtleties of nuance and dynamic level; conducting, in short, from the sidelines. Then for the final rehearsal, Munch himself polishing, refining, finishing.

Perhaps this has often been discussed in Symphony Hall, and there must be something wrong with it somewhere. But I do know there must be a solution to this terrible problem must somehow be found. And in the distribution of Christmas presents this season, I hope that the greatest gift the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can possibly get will be distributed to Charles Munch:—freedom, in some measure, from the appalling physical burden that has been placed on his shoulders.

Our Critic's Report for the Week

Fest Dec. 23

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

By reason of the early and continuing indisposition of Charles Munch, the Symphony Concerts have pursued thus far an uncertain and troubled course. In a programmatic sense there have been casualties. We have missed certain promised items from Debussy and Franck, and goodness knows what else. The concerts preceding Christmas failed to give us Berlioz's choral "L'Enfance du Christ," the B.S.O. premiere of which had been eagerly anticipated.

* * *

But there have been compensations. A different conductor means a different point of view, and in these nine pairs of concerts, besides Mr. Munch, we have had, for two pairs each, Messrs. Burgin, Monteux and Ansermet. It was stated here in advance of Mr. Ansermet's coming that we were lucky to get him. We were, in fact, luckier than we realized. The favorable impression that he made in his week of guesting in January, '49, has been immensely strengthened.

* * *

In the very nature of things, the following summary cannot take into account the concerts of last evening and the day before, in which Mr. Ansermet offered Beethoven's Fifth, Ravel's "Mother Goose" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." It may be assumed, however, that he succeeded in bringing to these pieces the same illuminating approach that he brought, at the preceeding concerts, to Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, in which Monique de la Bruchollerie made her sensational American debut, the "Pelleas and Melisande" music of Faure and Debussy's "The Sea," and, at the concert of last Tuesday evening, to Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn and the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn, in which the 15-year-old Michael Rabin made his bow to Boston. Also during his present stay, Mr. Ansermet played the "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, but that was the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, that this reviewer was unable to attend.

* * *

The music of Mendelssohn has enjoyed unusual favor this season. Besides these three performances under the baton of Mr. Ansermet, the Boston Symphony has also offered the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture (Burgin) and the "Scotch" Symphony (Monteux). In their respective presentations of overture and symphony, Messrs. Burgin and Monteux gave us everything that we had counted on hearing but nothing that we had not expected. Mr. Ansermet's performance of "Fingal's Cave" was in different case, as were his readings of Rachmaninoff, Faure, Debussy and Brahms. Even in the Violin Concerto, where Mendelssohn assigns to the orchestra a distinctly subordinate role, the ear was constantly intrigued as well as charmed.

* * *

Briefly stated, Mr. Ansermet, as conductor, combines in rare degree clarity and warmth. The same might be said of Toscanini, but the Swiss conductor seems to me to add to this combination a feeling for the composer's individuality that the Italian lacks. There is also something unusual about the former's capacity to convince you that you are hearing what the composer meant you to hear, while affording at the same time the satisfaction that comes from an individual approach. His command over the orchestra is absolute, but it is all done without apparent effort. As under Mr. Monteux, the players appear relaxed—there are no distorting and beclouding tensions—but they are also plainly inspired.

* * *

At this point a word must be said for the two soloists. The performance of Melle. de la Bruchollerie was one of extreme musicality, while the virtuosic element was present when needed. The charm of her playing, plus the charm of her presence, made an unforgettable impression. Young Mr. Rabin has not yet that much to offer. His disclosure of the Mendelssohn was musically and technically impeccable, but, quite naturally, lacked the personal note. That will come when the talented youngster from New York gets a little older.

* * *

Now that he is here, Mr. Ansermet is giving us of his best. Nevertheless, he came at a sacrifice of his personal desires. He was hard at work on his forthcoming book on what he calls the phenomenology of music. He considered it more important that he complete this task, now half accomplished, than that he should continue to conduct—"even," he said the other day, "than to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra." "The Meaning of Music," as it will be called, will aim to show why music is as it is and why it affects us as it does. It will embody Mr. Ansermet's theory that its three stages have been the primitive, the Asiatic and the Western, with the corollary that the last-named depends for its very nature on the Christian ethic. Mr. Ansermet believes that the music of Russia is Asiatic at heart but has been enriched by borrowings from the West. We may expect to find him demolishing the 12-tone system of Schoenberg, in which the horizontal and vertical aspects of music are mistakenly combined. "Melody," he explained, "exists in time and harmony in space and the two cannot be considered as one." The lucidity of Mr. Ansermet's conducting can be partly explained by the logic of his thinking.

d and frenetic performe Fifth could have found esterday undersized and those who think that a is more honored by the rather than by the dis- perversion of his inten- was an admirable and lifying performance, and ost eloquent one. vent, it was warmly re- the audience as were he works of Ravel and

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, DECEMBER 23, 1951

nd "The Student Prince" Opening T

A Christmas Gift for Munch? Yes---Less Hard Work!

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I have been worrying a good deal lately about Charles Munch who is, as everybody knows, now on a sick leave of absence from his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony. While my concern naturally is focussed on his condition, which is, I am reliably informed, not really serious and which will presently allow him to return to his duties (he is indisposed of a "circulatory" condition, a rough equivalent in meaningless to a virus infection), my real concern is the situation that forces men in his position to all but work themselves to death.

Consider—and be appalled at—what is expected of Mr. Munch: 48 regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six pairs of concerts on Sunday afternoons and Tuesday evenings, six concerts in Sanders theater, Cambridge, 39 out-of-town concerts ranging all the way from Wellesley to Ann Arbor, Michigan, and a Pension Fund concert on top of that—a total of 85 formal concerts in 30 weeks! Added to this are the five Open Rehearsals for students which, while less formal, still require a modified audience approach to conducting.

AND REHEARSALS, TOO

To be sure, Mr. Munch is not faced with the task of conducting all of these. Two guest conductors take four or more of these concerts and two or three more on the road, and Richard Burgin customarily conducts two pairs of concerts, reducing Mr. Munch's personal burden to about 72 or 73 concerts, perhaps a few less. But this is to forget his task at Tanglewood where he is called upon to do the July series in the opera theater and at least three of the series in the shed during the festival itself—another dozen or so. And it is also to overlook the terrific strain of four or more recording sessions a season, and the working conditions during the out-of-town series when he is called upon to conduct consecutive one-night stands. On the western tour this amounts to eight concerts in seven days! (It was on that western tour this season that Mr. Munch first contracted the illness that later, following his determination to continue with his obligations, led to what might have been a most serious break in his health. Further, it is to slight the fact that the regular schedule of the orchestra calls for four three-hour rehearsals a week. Thus, by a conservative estimate, Charles Munch must devote at least three hours a day for more than 36 weeks of the year spending his physical energies in an athletic effort that would fell a professional wrestler. . . and this is to entirely discount the intellectual effort that he must expend in the studying and learning of scores, in planning programs, in attending to details of personnel in the orchestra, in working with the management in the higher policy levels, and in handling his own personal affairs. Now I submit that all this is more than flesh and blood can endure.

It may be argued that Serge Koussevitzky endured it for 25 years, and I have no answer to that. It is true, until the last few seasons, Koussevitzky walked through this schedule with phenomenal pace. Yet it was always my feeling that the most monumental artistic conceit a man was ever born with sustained him. I have seen him, a half hour before concert time, the absolute picture of emotional and physical exhaustion. But a miracle always happened when he saw the audience before him; the audience nourished him and inspired him and liberated him from weariness. In the green room afterwards, he'd be the picture of ebullience and high spirits. I don't know how he did it; nobody does. One thing is clear, however: few other men are so constituted either physically or egotistically as to endure the punishment in the name of audience acclaim.

Then what is the answer to the situation as it regards the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose burden is unique among the orchestras of the world? Again, I do not know. A dual conductorship is clearly out of the question. One man alone must dominate.

So is a mad round of guest conductors. Nothing more seriously imperils the morale and the quality of the orchestra as that, as witness the deplorable estate of the Philharmonic after Barbirolli. Could it be that an assistant conductor be engaged, say a young and talented man after the fashion of Leonard Bernstein (who occupied a similar position in New York before rocketing to fame)? There are several young men I could name this minute who have demonstrated extraordinary capacities as student conductors. Might not one be engaged as a sort of rehearsal conductor with the privilege of doing two or three pairs of concerts during the season and always standing by?

As I envisage it, this young man could prepare the orchestra in three of the weekly rehearsals with Munch at his side instructing, marking, indicating the subtleties of nuance and dynamic level; conducting, in short, from the sidelines. Then for the final rehearsal, Munch himself polishing, refining, finishing.

Perhaps this has often been discussed in Symphony Hall, and there must be something wrong with it somewhere. But I do know that a solution to this terrible problem must somehow be found. And in the distribution of Christmas presents this season, I hope that the greatest gift the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can possibly get will be distributed to Charles Munch:—freedom, in some measure, from the appalling physical burden that has been placed on his shoulders.

[50]

Roger Voisin
Trumpet

J. Raichman
Trombone

J. Stagliano
French Horn

Ray Allard
Bassoon

Roman Szulc (inset)
Timpani

G. Laurent
Flute

R. Gomberg
Oboe

G. Cioffi
Clarinet

(Photo by John Brook)

WORLD-FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will set record for soloing instruments in concerts tomorrow and Saturday when eminent Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet, will lead them in a concerto written by his compatriot, Frank Martin. All of above artists will be heard in sparkling solo roles.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 28 1951

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO EUROPE

Hub Musicians Will Participate in Paris Festival

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the first time in its 71 years of existence the Boston Symphony is going to Europe, thus leading it for Charles Munch to realize the dream long cherished by Koussevitzky. The orchestra is going not on its own, but at the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which will sponsor a festival in Paris April 28 through May 31.

RETURNS FOR POPS

As soon as the current season ends, April 25, the orchestra will embark for Europe but must be back in Boston by June 1 for the belated opening of the Symphony Hall Pops. There is a chance that a substitute orchestra will be organized to carry on the Pops through May, under Arthur Fiedler's direction, but nothing definite has yet been arranged. Besides giving three, possibly four concerts devoted to contemporary European and American music for the Paris festival, the orchestra, led both by Mr. Munch and by its former conductor, Pierre Monteux, who will go along as guest director, will play in Bordeaux and Strasbourg, Mr. Munch's birthplace) and in Holland, Belgium, Switzerland (Zurich) and Austria.

Under the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," this Paris exposition of the arts, conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, will be a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to "assert the existence of a vital culture in a free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression." It aims to present the bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature, and philosophy.

Other Participants

Besides the Boston Symphony, this country will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, George Balanchine, director, one of whose programs will be devoted to ballets by Stravinsky, with the composer conducting.

Plans also are being made for performances, by an all-Negro company, of Virgil Thomson's opera "Four Saints in Three Acts," the book of which was written by Gertrude Stein. European organizations participating will include the Vienna State Opera and Philharmonic Orchestra, the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, the R.I.A.S. radio Orchestra of West Berlin, Geneva's Orchestra de la Suisse Romande conducted by Ernest Ansermet, now acting leader of the Boston Symphony, and the Orchestre du Conservatoire and Orchestre National of Paris.

America also will be represented in the fields of painting and letters. The Russian-born composer and author, Nicholas Nabokov is secretary-general of the Congress and the present announcement comes jointly from him and the Boston Symphony's manager, George E. Judd.

The World of

BY IRVING KOLODIN
Music editor, The Saturday Review of Lit

NEW YORK, Jan. 26—As a master of the tenuous and th met has few peers among current conductors thus when he "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite on the program of his first appearanc Boston Symphony Orchestra, it behooves the wise music-love and found the effort more than rewarding.

Ansermet contrived to give the long-loved work a tinge of novelty by including two sections from the ballet score that are not included in the customary concert suite: a prelude and a "Danse du Rouet." The prelude is pleasant enough, though it deals with material found in the familiar "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," and the "Dance du Rouet" is rather conventional kind of spinning-wheel music not much different from the Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale." These were beautifully played, of course, but it was in the familiar miniatures—the "Pavane," "Hop o' My Thum," "Beauty and the Beast," etc.—that Ansermet fitted tones and timbres together with his special artistry and a kind of purely personal sensitivity which can never become overfamiliar. Richard Burgin's violin playing reminded us again that the conductor is no better than his performers, with a treatment of the incidental solo that was all deftness and finesse.

* * *

AFTER A GOOD DEAL of uncertainty, Holland has decided to go ahead with its annual festival in 1952, following reports that the last one stirred considerable interest in "American musical circles." Director Peter Diamand was retained, having survived charges of undue favoritism to such British artists as Benjamin Britten, Peter Peters and Kathleen Ferrier. Leonard Bernstein and Guido Cantelli have been invited to conduct the Concertgebouw Orchestra and the New York City Ballet has been bidden for a week's performances.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JAN 27 1952

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 27 1951

First European Visit of BSO Is Scheduled for Next Spring

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it was announced today by Nicola Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression." The Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade arger wrote the speeches for ittsfield newsmen to deliver in he cinema theatres and at the GE ate. He received a gold award rom the Hudson River Navigation ompany for naming its palatial iver steamship "The Berkshire" nd he advertised and conducted he Dope Club's excursion to New ork.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony to Make European Tour in Spring

By a Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going abroad. It will make its first appearance in Europe next spring. The aggregation of 104 musicians—one of the world's great musical organizations—has been invited by the Congress for Cultural Freedom to give three concerts in Paris in May.

These concerts by the Boston Symphony will be a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The purpose of the exposition is to draw the attention of the world to the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century. The festival will open on April 28 and will continue through May.

Charles Munch, musical director of the Orchestra, has invited Pierre Monteux, former Boston Symphony and present San Francisco Symphony conductor, to share with him in conducting the concerts. The Paris cultural cavalcade, in which the Boston Symphony will participate, bears the general title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." It will parade the best works in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature, and philosophy.

♪ ♪ ♪

The Boston Symphony will join with such other of the free world's celebrated inusical organizations as the Vienna State Opera which will present Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, the RIAS (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande from Geneva, and two Parisian orchestras—the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National

The Boston Symphony will embark for Europe immediately upon the conclusion of its seventy-first season in Symphony Hall on April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual Pops concerts (this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month) its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. The orchestra will also perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Austria, and in Zurich.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances. One program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky will be conducted by the composer.

Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts." As staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th Street Theater in New York in 1934.

♪ ♪ ♪

In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, and American paintings, including several that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will participate in lectures and forums

Since Charles Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak of national and, through its broadcasts and recordings, international renown to which it was brought in the 25 years of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

♪ ♪ ♪

"It has long been my dearest hope to bring my American orchestra to Europe," said Mr. Munch. The conductor's introduction to audiences in the United States occurred a year prior to his being awarded his Boston post, when he toured America as leader of the French radio orchestra, l'Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française.

It was under Mr. Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the visit of President Vincent Auriol of France, a gesture which won Mr. Munch the French president's warm invitation to bring the Boston Symphony to France.

Boston Symphony Will Make European Tour

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring in Paris.

Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "Pops" concerts beginning June 1.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 28 1951

[53]

OSTON, MASS.
POST
28 1951

PHONY
CHESTRA
EUROPE

Musicians Will
ipate in Paris
Festival

STOREY SMITH
st time in its 71 years
the Boston Symphony rope, thus leaving it unch to realize the herished by Kousorchestra is going,
but at the invita-
Congress for Cultural hich will sponsor a aris April 28 through

NS FOR POPS
the current season
, the orchestra will Europe but must be n by June 1 for the g of the Symphony
ere is a chance that orchestra will be carry on the Pops
under Arthur Fied-
but nothing definite ranged. Besides giv-ssibly four concerts ntemporary European music for the Paris chestra, led both by d by its former con-
Monteux, who will go director, will play in Strasbourg (Mr.
lace) and in Holland,
gland (Zurich) and

verall title "Master-20th Century," this n of the arts, con-llectuals and financed ic interests, will be of the efforts of the Cultural Freedom to xistence of a vital free world, and to he validity of free-and expression." It nt the beats in the hony, opera, ballet,
terature, and phil-

Participants
Boston Symphony,
ll be represented by Ballet Company,
chine, director, one ams will be devoted Stravinsky, with the ucting.
re being made for
by an all-Negro gil Thomson's opera
n Three Acts," the
was written by European organ-
pating will include
te Opera and Philstra, the Chorus and
he Academy of St.
the R.I.A.S. (radio)
est Berlin, Geneva's
a Suisse Romande, neat Ansermet, now
f the Boston Sym-
Orchestre du Con-
Orchestre National

will be represented
painting and letters.
rn composer and las Nabokov is l of the Congress.
nt announcement
rom him and the
hony's manager,

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES

Boston Symphony to Play at Exposition in Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, it was announced today by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress, and George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men of the world during the first half of the 20th century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28, and will last through the month of May.

The Paris exposition of the arts is a culmination of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, composed of intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, to assert that there exists a free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of ideas and expression as applied in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera
"Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St.
Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (radio) orchestra from West Berlin;
the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestra National, both from Paris. In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company.
An all-Negro company will perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts." Some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years, will be assembled in an exhibition. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 71st symphony season in Symphony Hall, on Apr. 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates
- this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival, the initial one, a "gala" at which Mr. Munch will conduct; the second, planned for afternoon audiences, will have Mr.
Monteux as conductor; and the final, evening, concert will again have Mr. Munch on the podium.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the
Boston Symphony Orchestra
plans also during its forthnight abroad to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Western Germany and Austria, and in Zurich.

Mr. Munch, on hearing that the journey for next May was confirmed, said: "It has been my dearest hope to bring my American orchestra to Europe." It was under Mr. Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the state visit of President Vincent Auriol of France, a gesture which won for him and the orchestra the French president's warm invitation to bring the Boston Symphony to France. Pierre Monteux,
Mr. Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the organization since its founding in 1881.

The Boston Symphony orchestra,
one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.
The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.
The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May.
Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD

Boston Symphony To Appear In Europe

Boston, Dec. 27. (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris, it was announced today.

Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts in May at the Parisian capital. Other appearances will be made in Belgium, Holland, Western Germany and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "pops" concerts beginning June 1.

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN
DEC 28 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON TOUR

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
DEC 28 1951

TWO ON THE AISLE
By Harold L. Cail

Boston Symphony Europe Bound

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, it was announced today by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress and George E. Judd, orchestra manager. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century. The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share in conducting the concerts. Conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century", will parade undisputed "bests" in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

* * * * * * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra of West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, of Geneva, and the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both of Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera Four Saints In Three Acts. As staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St. Theater in New York in 1934. In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch and American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 71st season in Symphony Hall, April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates—this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony Will Tour Europe

BOSTON, Dec. 28—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring in Paris.

Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland. The orchestra will sail for Europe Apr. 25.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focussing attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

Under the auspices of the Congress For Cultural Freedom, the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans also during its fortnight abroad to perform in Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich. Since Charles Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak of national—and through its broadcasts and recordings, international—renown to which it was brought in the 25 years of Koussevitzky's leadership. "It has long been my dearest hope to bring my American orchestra to Europe," said Munch. Pierre Monteux, Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the organization since its founding in 1881. Paris-born, with a distinguished musical background in that city, Mr. Monteux came here first with the Ballet Russe of Diaghiley, and after serving a term with the Metropolitan Opera, became Boston's conductor from 1919 to 1924. He is at present, and until mid-April, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. Since it was established by Henry Lee Higginson and gave its first concert at the Boston Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881, the Boston Symphony which Time Magazine called "in a class by itself—the U. S.'s finest and one of the top four in the world," has steadily increased in activity as well as in prestige until it now affords its personnel an unparalleled annual 47 weeks of playing. In addition to the 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, nine Tuesday evening and six Sunday afternoon concerts it offers during its regular season in Boston's Symphony Hall, it is performing this season in Cambridge, Providence, New York, Brooklyn and Washington; has its long-established Spring "Pops" concerts in Symphony Hall and an annual three weeks of free Esplanade Concerts along the Charles River, both under the direction of Arthur Fiedler; plays six week ends of concerts during the annual Berkshire Festival, and operates the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the only school initiated and maintained by a symphony orchestra in this Country.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
DEC 28 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO TOUR EUROPE

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long Exposition of the Arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 28 1951

WILL PLAY IN EUROPE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans First Concert on Continent

Boston, Dec. 27.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony To Appear in Paris

Boston, Dec. 28 (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris.

Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "pops" concerts beginning June 1.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony Going To Europe Next Spring

Boston, Dec. 27—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

[54]

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony to Play in Europe Next Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, it was announced last night by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress, and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts, which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The orchestra will embark for Europe immediately upon the conclusion of its 71st symphony season in Symphony Hall, on April 26. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates — the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances.

Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival. The orchestra also plans to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and in Zurich.

Munch and Monteux to Lead

The festival will open in th French capital April 28, and wi last through May. Charles Munch the musical director of the Bos ton orchestra, has invited Pierr Monteux to share in conducting th concerts.

Conceived by intellectuals an financed by philanthropic interest the Paris exposition of the arts i a dramatization of the efforts o the Congress for Cultural Freedon to assert the existence of a vita culture in the free world, and t demonstrate the validity of free dom of work and expression. To this end the Paris cultural caval cade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet drama, art, literature and phi losophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R. I. A. S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

Other Fields Represented

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for a all-Negro company to perform th Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stei opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

James Johnson Sweeney, forme director of the Museum of Moder Art, has been commissioned to as semble an exhibition of some 20 contemporary French, Dutch, Amer ican paintings, including many tha have not been shown in Paris fo many years. Prominent America men of letters will also participat in lectures and forums throughou the exposition.

The exposition committee of th Congress for Cultural Freedom in cludes Nicolas Nabokov, director Herve Dugardin, director of th Paris Theatre des Champs-Elysee general manager; Mme. Denise Tua assistant manager; Julius Fleisch mann, of Cincinnati, who represent the philanthropic organizations an individuals who have made the ex position possible, American chair man of the Festival committee, an Pierre Bolomey, treasurer.

The American affiliate of th Congress is the American Commit tee for Cultural Freedom, Sidne Hook, chairman, which is conduc ing negotiations with the festiva participants from this country.

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS
DEC 28 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PARIS

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris.

Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "Pops" concerts beginning June 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
COMPASS
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony To Play in Paris in May

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, according to an announcement by Nicolas Nabokov, Secretary-General of the Congress, and George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May as a contribution from the United States to the month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at "focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century.

The festival opens April 28. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux to share in conducting the concerts. The Boston Symphony joins with such other celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande of Geneva, the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestre Nation, both from Paris.

The Paris cultural cavalcade bears the over-all title, "Masterpiece of the 20th Century" and will parade "bests" in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 29 1951

Boston Symphony's European Concerts Slated for Spring

Boston — (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring in Paris.

Music director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe Apr. 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "Pops" concerts beginning June 1.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
DEC 28 1951

Boston, Dec. 28—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris. Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland. The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25th at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "pops" concerts beginning June 1st.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 29 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 10th program of the series in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Zara Nelsova, cellist. The program:

Symphony No. 40 in G minor (K.550) ..... Mozart
Concerto in B minor ..... Dvorak
Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments, Percussion and Strings ..... Frank Martin Marche Joyeuse ..... Chabrier

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Of all the instrumental soloists none has the odds more highly and more persistently stacked against him than the 'cellist.

For one thing, save for a couple standard things like the Haydn Concerto and the Strauss' "Don Quixote" there isn't too much music of the first class for him to play. For another, so less brilliant and penetrating is the tone quality of the instrument in contrast to the violin, the flute, the oboe and so on, that a good many people who may like the instrument are nonetheless seldom impressed by it. For still another, few lay persons have any idea what a prodigious feat it is to play this instrument flawlessly, though it is not hard to play it pretty well.

Finally, it is in the public mind a man's instrument. It makes no difference how extraordinary a woman 'cellist may be, there is something that makes the average listener aware, if only in a nearly subconscious degree, that there is something wrong somewhere. (After all, it is less than 40 years since women, if taught the cello at all, were advised to kneel behind it.)

Nelsova Debut

All of which is a prolix prelude to saying that Zara Nelsova made her debut at these concerts yesterday afternoon in Dvorak's B minor Concerto, proved herself to be not only the foremost woman 'cellist of the day but in every way the equal of the foremost male players, and still didn't quite achieve the audience success she deserved. To be sure she got four calls to the stage, but there wasn't that spontaneity about it that indicates the smash success.

This, I am sure, may be partly attributed to the Dvorak Concerto, which alternates passages of the greatest felicity for the instrument with moments of fiddling that are of little consequence. Moreover, the orchestration is often thick and turgid, the musical materials overdrawn. Be that as it may, Miss Nelsova's performance was one of the greatest technical bravura and security and of the loveliest imaginable tone.

New to Boston

I can't think which was more impressive, her bowing or her fingering. The sustained arpeggios were miraculously accomplished by the bow, as were the multiple stops of the cadenza of the slow movement, while her fingers produced the most exact intonations in everything from the swift scale unisons to the trills in the highest positions. Her playing, in short, and her manner of playing, which was of full emotional range but never affected, were about as close to perfection as we are likely to hear from a solo cellist, male or female, for some years to come.

A work new to Boston lent additional interest to this program, though it didn't turn out to be a particularly impressive example of contemporary music. This was the Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments, Percussion and Strings by the Swiss composer Frank Martin. This sort of thing, the deploying several solo instruments for concertante purposes, is a stunt interesting mainly for the contrasting timbres it allows. A good many composers have tried their hand at it, Mozart of course, having greatest success. Stamitz also succeeded, though perhaps not brilliantly, and there are any number of septets, octets, etc., exploiting the idea though not on orchestral scale.

Where they succeeded and Martin didn't quite, however, was in their thematic materials; the older men were not embarrassed to write long-flowing melodies. Martin, on the other hand, employs melodic material in the contemporary view; fragmentary motives of jagged intervals that never seem to register in the ear at all. The result is 20 minutes of not unpleasant sound effects, rhythms, contrasts of timbre and piquancies of voice leading. The second movement, with a rhythmic exactitude recalling Haydn's Clock symphony, is especially interesting, but generally speaking the work is merely an instrumental exercise of no especial significance whatever. It was splendidly played, incidentally, by Georges Laurent, Ralph Gomberg, Gino Cioffi, Raymond Allard, James Stagliano, Roger Voisin, Jacob Raichman and Boman Szulc.

The concert began with a finely modelled performance of Mozart's G minor and ended with a march in the Pops tradition. Anshel Brusilow, violinist, is the soloist next week in Tchaikovsky's Concerto, other pieces being Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," Haydn's Symphony No. 95 and three dances from Falla's "El Sombrero de Tres Picos."

MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

Boston, Dec. 28 —(UP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris.

Music Director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "Pops" concerts beginning June 1.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
DEC 28 1951

European Concerts By Hub Symphony Planned in Spring

Boston, Dec. 27 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
DEC 29 1951

Boston Symphony Accepts Bid to Play in Europe

First Continental Appearances Are Scheduled for May.

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
DEC 29 1951

'The Boston' to Europe

There is an immense amount of significance in the news that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will tour Europe next Spring.

In the first place it will add immeasurably to the stature of "the Boston," long recognized as the outstanding symphony orchestra in the nation. There can be no question about this. It is not merely provincial pride that dictates this judgment of "the Boston." The evidence is available for anyone who wants to listen and compare this group with the handful of outstanding organizations elsewhere in the country.

But more than that, the fact that this finest of American cultural products is being presented to European audiences can become a valuable contribution to the cause of freedom.

Recently, a State Department official warned that the Soviet Union had won a definite advantage in the cultural battle of the cold war. By sending its dancers, musicians, artists and writers throughout Europe on one pretext or another, the USSR was giving the impression that Russia had a burning interest in all the things so close to the European heart.

It has been difficult to convince Europeans that America has any real concern for cultural matters. The touring "Boston" will be absolute proof that we are not only interested, but that we have at least one group that performs great music surpassingly well.

The fact that the Boston Symphony is to be the first great contributor to the cultural battle is not only gratifying, it's the best choice that could have been made

MEADVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 31 1951

WASHBOARD MUSIC

BOSTON — A prosaic washboard is used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to produce the final effect in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." One of the percussion men of the orchestra runs his fingers swiftly across the ridges to create a percussion glissando effect.

TIGHT BINDING

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
DEC 28 1951

...opean Concerts
Hub Symphony
...lanned in Spring

...on, Dec. 27 (AP)—The Bos... Symphony Orchestra has accepted ... invitation from the Congress of Cul... Freedom to make its first ap... ...ance in Europe, the orchestra's ... manager announced to...

...les Munch, the musical di... has invited his colleague, Pierre ... conductor of the San Fran... ...ony, to share with him ... conducting the concerts.

...104 players will give three con... in Paris in May, as a major ... tribution from the United States ... month-long exposition of the ... which is aimed at focusing at... upon the vitality of the ... achievements of free men ... first half of the century. ... orchestra will embark after the ... clusion of its 71st season on ... 25. Plans call also for ... ances in Holland, Belgium, ... deaux, Strasbourg and in ...

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
DEC 28 1951

...n Symphony Accepts ...id to Play in Europe

...ntinental Appearances Are ... Scheduled for May.

...TON, Dec. 27 (AP).—The Bos... ...ymphony orchestra has ac... ...an invitation from the Con... ...of Cultural Freedom to make ... ...t appearance in Europe, the ... ...ra's manager announced to...

...les Munch, the musical di... ...has invited his colleague ... Monteux, conductor of the ... ...ancisco symphony, to share ... ...im in conducting the con...

...104 players will give three ... ...s in Paris in May, as a major ... ...ution from the United States ... ...th-long exposition of the ... ...ich is aimed at focusing at... ... upon the vitality of the ... ...achievements of free men ... ...he first half of the century. ... orchestra will embark after ... ...clusion of its 71st season ... ...25. Plans call also for ... ...nces in Holland, Belgium, ...deaux, Strasbourg and in ...

...rope

...oint of signifi... ...ton Symphony ... Spring ... ...measurably ... long recog... ...chy orchestra ... question about ...ial pride that ... Boston." The ...one who wants ...roup with the ...nitations else...

...fact that this ...oducts is be... ...ences can be... ...the cause of ...

...ment official ...d won a defi... ...battle of the ...n, musicians, ... Europe on ...R was giving ... burning in... ... to the Euro...

...ce Europeans ...cern for cul... ...ston" will be ...only interest... ...e group that ...gly well. ...mphony is to ... the cultural ... it's the best ...de

...C ...wash... ...n Sym... ...ce the ...s "Rite ...cussion ...his fin... ...iges to ...ndo ef...

Martin Concerto in Boston Première

Monitor Dec. 29

Eight Soloists Featured in Swiss Composer's Work

By Harold Rogers

There are no two ways of look... at it—Ernest Ansermet's pro... ...eek-end concerts ... Symphony Or... ...everything. It ... beginning (Mo... ... (Franck ... concerto ... ... Pop... ... ways of ... regard... ... view... ...ve fi...

...Our noted guest conductor's ... ...Mozart G minor Symphony, for instance, was flawless in classical elegance and genteel grace. But the orchestra's performance was something else again with several nervous attacks in the fiddles during the Molto allegro, a listless Andante and at times ... to the melodic lines. So... ...ssible to have both ... ...rrection and a lack ... ...g. Fortunately the ... ...ng the latter, as happened yesterday afternoon.

* * *

If there was any negative reaction among listeners to the initial Boston performance of Frank Martin's Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments, Timpani, Percussion, and String Orchestra, such reactions would be largely those evoked by any contemporary work that may seem too much of the avante grade on first hearing. But this work, written in 1949 by Switzerland's leading composer, is not too extreme, even if Martin continues to employ some of the Schönberg twelve-tonalism that he once embraced wholeheartedly.

The end movements, sprightly and brilliant, appear to be designed mainly for the purpose of showing off the solo instruments. These are introduced chain-fashion in the opening Allegro and continue to perform as a concertina or as individuals. The composer effectively exploits the possibilities of each while maintaining much interest in his use of form and contemporary orchestral colors.

The middle Adagietto, however, has more to offer—a dirgelike pleading that has a strong emotional pull. Here he has given us more than clever instrumental writing; he has given us music that has a great deal to say.

Martin, who is just over 60, has been presented to Boston only recently—and in both instances by his countryman Ernest Ansermet. We first heard from this composer when Mr. Ansermet played his Petite Symphonie Concertante while here as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in January, 1949. Of the two works—the Petite Symphonie Concertante and the Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments—the former is the better. Scored for two string orchestras, harp, harpsichord, and piano, it is an expression of deeper musical sensitivity, as well as originality.

* * *

The solos for the concerto heard yesterday were brought off with excellence by Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Roger Voisin, trumpet; Jacob Raichman, trombone; and Roman Szulc, timpani.

But the New Year's cornucopia provided by Mr. Ansermet was by no means exhausted after the Mozart and the Martin. There was still another soloist to be heard—a superb cellist by the name of Zara Nelsova.

She first appeared in Boston in May, 1946, when she was soloist at the Pops concerts. Yesterday she displayed a keen sense of musicianship when she played the Dvořák Concerto in B minor for Cello, Opus 104. A native of Winnipeg, Canada, Miss Nelsova was educated in London and has subsequently been heard on the Continent, in Australia, Canada, and the United States.

* * *

Her playing yesterday revealed a depth of emotion, beautifully molded phrases, and a technique equal to almost any demands. Her arpeggio figures, however, tended to drop out of sight, or else the orchestra was too loud during these passages. But her tone, while neither big nor bold, had a feminine grace, a songfully vibrant quality that was profoundly satisfying. As for the concerto itself, it is a work whose triteness becomes more apparent with the years. Perhaps in another quarter century Dvořák will get a second wind. Some composers do. Look at Berlioz.

Mr. Ansermet topped this off with a meringue (or was it foam?) when he performed Chabrier's "Joyeuse Marche." Played for the first time at these concerts, it seemed just a little too much "joyeuse" or a little too much "marche" for the Friday-Saturday series and much more suitable for the Pops season. But there's no denying that with all the cymbals, drums, and rousing fortissimos, most listeners must have left the hall in a jolly frame of mind.

But there are always two ways of looking at it.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 29 1951

MUSIC

Ansermet Introduces Concerto by Martin; Nelsova Plays Dvorak

By CYRUS DURGIN

To put it in plain terms, inflation was evident at the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was full-length, and the performance of it, under Ernest Ansermet's meticulous baton, notably excellent. But only about half that program was of musical value: Mozart's "Great" G minor Symphony (K. 550) and a Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments, Tympani, Percussion and Strings, by Frank Martin, which was new to Boston. Dvorak's Cello Concerto, though superbly performed by Zara Nelsova as soloist, is a long and dull affair, and if there is music more silly than Chabrier's Joyeuse Marche, I haven't yet heard it.

Frank Martin, the gifted Swiss composer, was introduced to Boston when Mr. Ansermet performed his Petite Symphonie Concertante with the Boston Symphony in 1949. That was a fine piece of music, and memory of it had aroused high expectations for the new work. One hearing is hardly enough on which to form an estimate of this Concerto, whose solo instruments are flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, trumpet and trombone. First acquaintance suggests that it does not match the superb Petite Symphonie Concertante, for it has its less than lively moments. From time to time the solo parts make you think of a sequence of unrelated cadenzas, at others of an essay in contrasting rhythms and instrumental timbres.

I had expected that a composer of Martin's evident gifts would have done more with so many solo instruments, either individually or as the tonal and rhythmic nucleus of such a novel group. The work tends to spread out into episodes instead of being a homogeneous, compact texture enlivened by the interplay of seven distinctive instruments. But let us hear it again—and again—for repeated performances are the only true test of new music.

Miss Nelsova yesterday made her debut with this orchestra in the regular series, although she had appeared at the Pops and the now defunct Youth Concerts in previous years. She is an artist of formidable technic and a satin tone that is neither dry nor too juicy. Her grasp of style is broad and powerful, but most important of all is the way she sustains a "long line" and makes every measure sing.

The Dvorak Cello Concerto is an old-fashioned work, much too long, and not distinguished by remarkable material, although there is no lack of tunes, such as they are. Miss Nelsova played it with tonal beauty and dexterity of bow and fingers. No one could have done it better today, and she fully merited the cordial reception which was extended to her.

As for Chabrier, known today for the "Espana" Rhapsody and practically nothing else, he wrote in the Joyeuse Marche a spirited little nothing. But at least it is vigorous, and brought a slam-bang close after the long somnolence caused by Dvorak.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 31 1951

Our Exportable Culture

The United States has been pictured abroad as the apostle of materialism. This is a false impression held for many years in the Old World which looked down upon young America as an upstart, and which Soviet propaganda is trying to spread. We never felt the need of erasing that erroneous concept of American culture until the cold war required us to challenge the idea that in our economic and technical progress the arts are being neglected.

Now, we consider it part of our crusade for freedom to show the world that the arts flourish here, without federal, state or local subsidy, and have developed to a point where they are exportable as a truly American asset.

Europeans will see and hear for themselves one of the best examples of our cultural achievements when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays for them next ~~Spring in~~ a tour arranged by the Congress of Cultural Freedom. Concerts are scheduled for Paris, Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux and Zurich.

The tour of the 104 musicians of the Boston orchestra will be more than concert engagements. It will be part of our national program for a better understanding of our cultural life. The mission is in the best of hands.

...MPHONY CONCERT
...ARREN STOREY SMITH
...12/29/51

...of Mozart is a curiously ... ...ed Symphony Concert, speak... ...course, of the program as ... ...as usual, will be to... ... The afternoon ... ...nguished beauty and dis... ...the G minor Sym... ...of Mozart (a truly match... ...performances), continued with ... distinction than of beauty ... interesting new Concerto for ... wind instruments, timpani, ...ion and strings by the Swiss ... Martin, and ended with the ...d vulgarities and banalities ...ak's Cello Concerto, played ...a Nelsova, and the joyous ...of Chabrier, hitherto unper... ...at these concerts.

...to be anticipated that Mr. ... would do well by Mozart's ... ...of the performance ex... ...pectations. Everything ... ...ised and justly bal... ...and the sheer loveliness of ... ...ever more apparent. ... Mr. Ansermet we would ... Frank Martin. When the ...composer was with us in ...e introduced to us the music ...countryman through a Petite ...onie Concertante, which ...ly employed a harp, harpsi... ...and piano. The Concerto of ...ay calls for solo flute, oboe, ...t, bassoon, horn, trumpet, ...ne, and timpani, and these ...ents were respectively ...d by the Messrs. Laurent, Gom... ...d, Allard, Stagliano, Voisin, ... and Szulc. Mr. Martin ... ...ing things to ... ...hen the ... ...and idealized ... ...ance sense. More ... ...this ... was an orchestra with a limited wind choir rather than a collection of soloists.

Mr. Martin, the program notes tell us, is the son of a Protestant minister of Geneva, the youngest of 10 children. There seems to be a touch of Calvinism in his music. It certainly is not charged with the joy of living. One feels that in this Concerto Mr. Martin, like so many other moderns, has been trying to recapture the mood and manner of the early 18th century, with particular thought of such composers as Scarlatti and Pergolesi. The finale brings a restrained suggestion of the ballet. The performance was a highly finished one and as eloquent as the music permitted.

Miss Nelsova, who appeared at the Pops in 1946, is a competent, well-graced cellist, but her accomplishments were largely wasted on this completely outmoded, wholly sentimental music of Dvorak that needs the theatricalism of a Piatigorsky to put it over. She was most cordially received by yesterday's audience. And speaking of the Pops, that is where Chabrier's noisy March belongs.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
DEC 30 1951

In Paris May Festival

CHARLES MUNCH
Mr. Munch and Pierre Monteux will share the podium in a series of concerts

First Trip Abroad To Be Made By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Five Countries On Itinerary

NEW YORK, Dec. 29—Another major American orchestra will invade Europe this spring. The Congress for Cultural Freedom announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be the orchestra's first visit abroad.

Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, lately of San Francisco and former conductor in Boston, will share the duties of the podium. These concerts will be part of a month-long festival of the arts.

This festival will exhibit, besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Vienna State Opera in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, Geneva and Orchestre du Conservatoire and Orchestre Nacional, of Paris.

The United States also will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, directed by George Ballanchine, in six performances, including a program of ballets by Igor Stravinsky, conducted by the composer.

An all-Negro company probably will perform the Thomson-Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble some 200 contemporary French, Dutch and American paintings. American literary leaders also will take part in lectures and forums of discussion.

The orchestra will embark for Europe immediately after the 71st season in Symphony Hall, Boston, April 25. It must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts, but the usual two months' season will be condensed into one month.

Three, possibly four, concerts of the French sojourn will be devoted to contemporary European and American music. The orchestra also will play in Holland, Belgium, Austria and Switzerland, and in Bordeaux and Strasbourg.

Shows Opening At Ann Arbor

ANN ARBOR, Dec. 29—Three exhibits will go on view at the University of Michigan Museum of Art in Alumni Memorial Hall during the month of January.

They will be "Drawings from the Museum Collection," to open Jan. 2; and "Abstractions with Thread" and "Photographs of American Architecture," both opening Jan. 6. All three exhibits will run through Jan. 27.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
DEC 29 1951

Boston Symphony Going to Paris

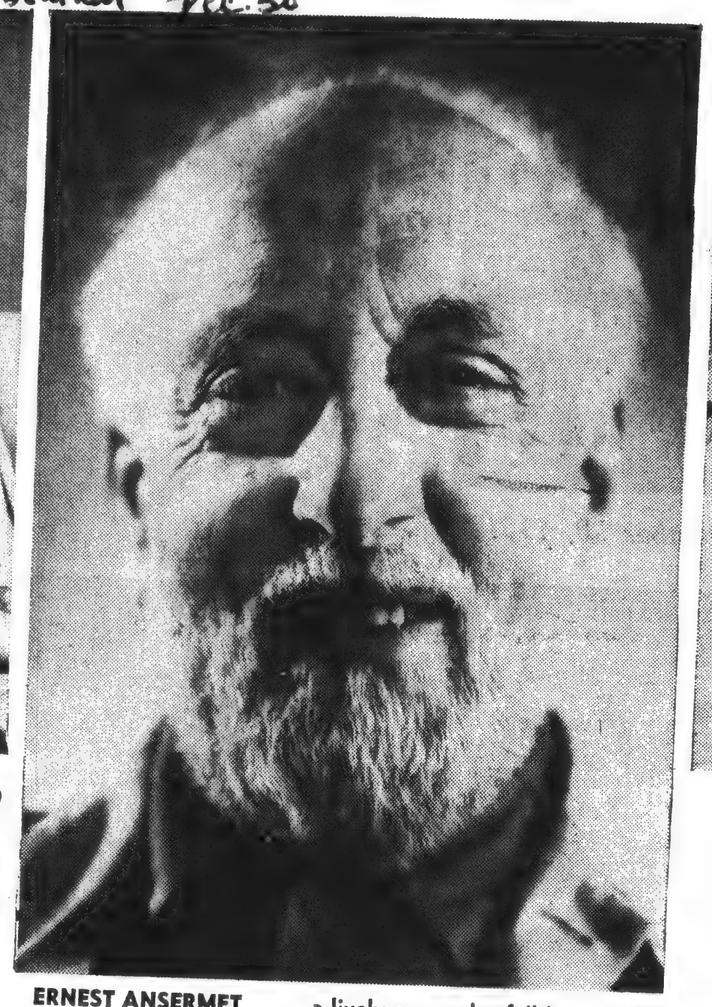
BOSTON, Dec. 29. — (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris, it was announced yesterday.

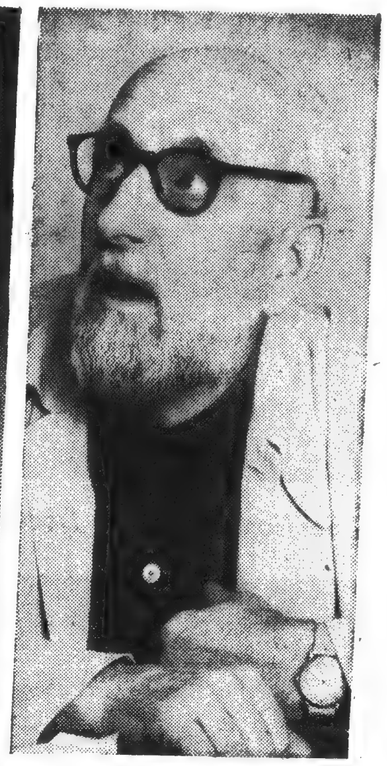
Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts in May at the French capital. Other appearances will be made in Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return for the annual "Pops" concert series starting June 1.

Ansermet Doubles as a Math Professor

Prov. Journal Dec. 30





ERNEST ANSERMET . . . a lively eye and a full beard. The camera caught the noted Swiss conductor in three moods.

Conductor Leans to Music That Is Fit to Be Whistled

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

ON New Year's night, one of the world's eminent conductors, Ernest Ansermet, will appear in Providence for the first time, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Mr. Ansermet is an alert, energetic Swiss of 68. He is a professor of mathematics as well as a musician, and is in process of becoming an author, too. His subject is the phenomenology of music. A pertinent definition of phenomenology is: "The branch of a science dealing with the description and classification of phenomena."

Not At All Forbidding

However forbidding this may seem to the fellow whose mathematical ability is insufficient to cope with the income tax and whose knowledge of musical phenomena goes no further than distinguishing between a violin and a piano, Mr. Ansermet himself is not at all forbidding. He is openly on the side of those who think a good tune ought to be fit to whistle, he would rather have a good piece of music for a military band than a dubious concerto for four pianos, and he can take a humorous approach to even a national hero.

Mr. Ansermet interrupted his labors in phenomenology to substitute for Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony, who is sick.

For a Boston residence, Mr. Ansermet has rooms on the eighth floor of the Ritz-Carlton, looking out upon the Public Gardens and the Common, which are about as close to Swiss scenery as anything Boston affords. It was for the view that he took the rooms, he said the other day, when I called on him.

Mr. Ansermet, a solid man about five and one-half feet tall, has an air of genial authority, of which the most striking details are a lively eye and a full beard. He speaks English with an accent but competently. Of his work, he said, "What is in question is the very basis of music. What is the general, permanent, unique basis of music, assuming it has one. We know that in the Middle Ages, modes were in use, and the fifth and fourth were consonances, but not the third. Now the third is considered a consonance, but the fourth is not. We know these things, but we don't know why.

How Melody Moves

"People speak of a melody going up or down. But it doesn't go up or down. We see it as if sound moved like this."

Here he took an ashtray from a table beside him and made it glide upward through the air.

"But sound doesn't do that. Why do we see an interval when it doesn't exist in fact? What we call music does not exist in the sound but in ourselves. If we can explain why we call a sound higher or lower, what it means to us, then we can explain music. Why was a third, now a consonance, not a consonance in old times?"

Stravinsky, he went on, has said that music cannot express anything, whereas everybody else had thought all along that music had no other purpose. Mr. Ansermet, incidentally, though he opposes Stravinsky in this matter, plays Stravinsky's music and expresses something with it; parts of "Petrouchka" are on Tuesday night's program.

"Our time has no characteristic style or form of composition," he said. "Formerly, each epoch developed its own form, the opera, the symphony, and so on. Nothing new has been invented since the symphony."

Same Music Everywhere

Why? He suggested that a clue may be found in the modern means of easy intercourse among musical centers. Nowadays the same music is played in Rome, New York, Berlin, London, Paris, and innumerable smaller cities and towns. In old days, when characteristic forms were developing, in the Venice of Monteverdi, in the Vienna of the great symphonists, each locality was relatively isolated and was forced in a manner to depend on itself and to express its own genius in its own terms. Mr. Ansermet quoted a saying of Goethe's to the effect that a man ought to be limited on the outside but to expand limitlessly within.

"The spirit of our time," Mr. Ansermet said, "has not been able to invent its own form and style. It has lost contact with something."

He spoke of young people studying the Schoenberg 12-tone system as "losing their time," and said that a good tune must be expected before a good symphony.

"How many can make a good tune? One that you can—how do you say? Siffler? — yes, whistle. Not even Mr. Copland could do it. I do not mean to criticize Mr. Copland. He is a very good musician. But they all suffer from this kind of thing."

Expect All Masterpieces

He mentioned that once, standing within earshot of a military band playing some very poor music, he had been listening to a young composer talking about a concerto for four pianos that he was working on. "I thought," said Mr. Ansermet, "that it would be much better for him to write some good music for a military band."

Another difficulty in modern times, he continued, is that composers are expected to turn out masterpieces every time they compose.

"If we will have a few masterworks, we must have many others," he said. "In old times, there were hundreds of dukes and bishops each with his musicians, and the composers were told: 'Write some music for tonight, for a serenade, for an entertainment, to play while people are eating.' So they wrote it. It wasn't all masterworks, but from it came masterworks. Haydn wrote a symphony every day, and most of them are forgotten. But now and then he produced a great work.

"The same way with conductors. If there are to be Toscaninis and Koussevitzkys, there must be many lesser conductors.

More Music for a Purpose

"There must be more music for a definite purpose, like the music written for the bishops and the dukes for special functions. If there is a soldier, and a captain tells him: 'Go so many miles ahead, turn to the left, turn then to the right,' the soldier does it. But if the soldier is left to himself, nothing would be done.

"So in music. Music ought to have a particular social function. Then, from time to time, something exceptional would arise. Symphony concerts do not count in this respect. A visit to a symphony concert is like a visit to a museum. It is a display of pieces; it is not music written for a purpose and fulfilling that purpose.

"The only real, practical function that music has today is in the moving pictures. And isn't it strange? Most of the moving picture music is not written by people whose names are famous. Most of it is by people not well known.

"From every race, there sprang perhaps one exceptional musician in former generations. There could today, if music had a particular social function."

Reverting to his researches into the phenomenology of music, he said that, though his book is still in preliminary stages, he has established his fundamental points. In the ultimate analysis, he said, "music is connected with the great human values, such as religion."

Discussions, even of music, cannot proceed forever at such a level, nor can a discussion with a Swiss proceed long without touching upon William Tell and Arnold von Winkelried. The mention of von Winkelried, close to the end of the interview, reminded Mr. Ansermet that he had met a man in Chicago who claimed to be the last surviving descendent of von Winkelried, but who had shortened his name to Winkel, as being more consonant with his milieu.

Then he said, "You know, there are two stories about von Winkelried. One is that he grasped the spears of the Austrians at the battle of Sempach and so made way for his comrades to rush in to victory.

"The other story is that he was in the front rank and being pushed and couldn't do anything else anyway."

Mr. Ansermet, with the gusto of a mischievous child, grasped a score of imaginary Austrian spears against his belly and, looking over his shoulder with a delighted grin, said, "They say what he really said then was, 'What pig is shoving me from behind?'"

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

French Accent Noted in News of Orchestras

BY SEYMOUR RAVEN

Interesting it was that while the Chicago Symphony was playing an entire concert of French music in Orchestra hall last night, details should emerge about music that is being planned for France—with accent on some things American. The Boston Symphony orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, have been invited to Paris for the Congress of Cultural Freedom that opens April 28 and runs thru May. The orchestra, having accepted, will make a short European tour out of it and its treasury will provide $175,000 for the purpose.

Orchestras, opera companies, or choruses will converge on Paris from such other places as Vienna, Geneva, West Berlin, and Rome, joining two orchestras from the host city and the New York City Ballet company and a possible Negro opera company ["Four Saints in Three Acts"] from this side of the ocean. Theme of the exposition will be "the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century."

Speaking of tours, the Philadelphia orchestra may go to Europe on its own at about the same time as the Boston symphony and will tour for 21 days under Eugene Ormandy's direction. Board approval is now being awaited.

Meanwhile in Orchestra hall Rafael Kubelik was conducting a work by one Frenchman who in 1918-19 was conductor of the Boston orchestra—Henri Rabaud—and another who needs no introduction at all, Hector Berlioz. The soloist was a Parisienne, Nicole Henriot, who played Ravel's G Major Piano Concerto.

Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" sounded much the same as at Ravinia a few summers ago—respectable mood music, not very active or provocative. At the Ravinia concert it seemed to serve as padding for some other music; this time it was actually a last minute substitution for another score whose parts reportedly were delayed in transit.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" was, in performance, another of those up and down affairs. The opening movement ["Dreams"] jelled nicely; the waltz section was incredibly amateurish, lacking in rhythmic subtlety and sureness; in its atempts at tonal tintinnabulation the "March to the Scaffold" lacked an authentic stride, and the "Walpurgis Night's Dream" was a sledgehammer affair, especially because of that electronic clicking machine which has many uses, perhaps, but none in the symphony hall. It violates one of the first principles of the physics of bell sound—but why bother. Mr. Kubelik, or whoever, must like it.

Miss Henriot's playing of the Ravel was often percussive, and not distinguished for its wit. The best of it, however, was brisk, with nervous energy, much like her short, rapid steps going on and off stage. She seems to be about five inches off the floor.

[57]

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 28 19

nch Accent oted in News f Orchestras

SEYMOUR RAVEN

esting it was that while the Symphony was playing ar concert of French music ir tra hall last night, details emerge about music that planned for France—with on some things American. ston Symphony orchestra conductor, Charles Munch, en invited to Paris for the s of Cultural Freedom that April 28 and runs thru May. orchestra, having accepted, ake a short European tour t and its treasury will pro- 75,000 for the purpose.

estras, opera companies, or es will converge on Paris uch other places as Vienna, , West Berlin, and Rome, two orchestras from the y and the New York City company and a possible opera company ["Four in Three Acts"] from this of the ocean. Theme of the tion will be "the vitality cultural achievements by men during the first half of th century."

king of tours, the Philadel- chestra may go to Europe own at about the same time Boston symphony and will r 21 days under Eugene dy's direction. Board ap- is now being awaited.

nwhile in Orchestra hall Ra- Kubelik was conducting a by one Frenchman who in was conductor of the Bos- chestra — Henri Rabaud — nother who needs no intro- n at all, Hector Berlioz. The was a Parisienne, Nicole t, who played Ravel's G Piano Concerto.

ud's "La Procession Noc- sounded much the same avinia a few summers ago ctable mood music, not tive or provocative. At the concert it seemed to serve ding for some other music; me it was actually a last substitution for another whose parts reportedly were in transit.

oz's "Fantastic Sympho- s, in performance, another e up and down affairs. The movement ["Dreams"] nicely; the waltz section credibly amateurish, lack- rhythmic subtlety and sick- ts atempts at tonal tinting; March to the Scaffold" had thentic stride, and the final burgis Night's Dream" was gehammer affair, especially e of that electronic chime ne which has many uses, s, but none in the sym- hall. It violates one of the principles of the physics of und—but why bother! Mr. k, or whoever, must like it. Henriot's playing of the was often percussive, and tinguished for its wit. The f it, however, was bristling nervous energy, much like ort, rapid steps going on and ge. She seems to fly in at titude six inches off the

Ansermet Expounds His Theories—Ja

Swiss Conductor Denounces Schönberg's Atonal School

By Harold Rogers

Ernest Ansermet has exploded a bombshell in the world of music. He has turned thumbs down on Schönberg's theories of atonality, a school which advocates the elimination of tonality in music, or the sense of being in a certain key. Late yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall the noted Swiss conductor told members of the press that he was convinced that Schönberg's teachings were basically wrong.

Ten years ago, he said, he began thinking seriously about the musical dilemma of modern times—the dearth of great composers and the consequent lack of great music. This led him into a study of what he calls "the phenomenology of music," a subject that embraces several fields of thought—ethics, philosophy, religion—in order to get at the bottom of what is happening in music today.

He pointed out that while such a study is to a large extent philosophical, it must be undertaken by a musician, since few philosophers have the musical background required. About three years ago he began to formulate his findings in book form and so far has wirtten 200 pages. He will call the book "Le Sens de Musique," which he translated as "The Meaning of Music." He expects it to run another 200 pages and had planned to complete it this winter. Then Charles Munch asked him to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for six weeks. Since he had set aside the time for his book and had no other conducting engagements, he accepted Mr. Munch's invitation.

Though his work on the book has been halted, Mr. Arsermet's agile mind is still busy with the clarification of details. He is so full of his subject that he finds no difficulty, even if English is not his native tongue, in giving voice to his ideas. He told of several things that his book will deal with.

* * *

For one thing, it will denounce the Schönbergian school of atonality which is gaining wide acceptance.

Quoting from someone, he said that Schönberg's teachings are like the Swedenborgian heaven, which has no up or down, no right or left, no forward or backward. He said that Schönberg claimed to be able to compose vertically in the same way that he composed horizontally.

"And at this point," Mr. Ansermet said, "Schönberg is basically wrong! The horizontal takes place in time, while the vertical must be considered in space. These two things cannot be thought of in the same way."

Mr. Ansermet did not question Schönberg's integrity or his freedom to compose as he chose as an individual. The conductor was disturbed, however, because young people in both Europe and America are being influenced by Schönberg's teachings.

Mr. Ansermet was asked if he did not think that the diatonic and chromatic systems had been completely exploited so that there was nothing left but to explore the possibilities of atonality or the use of quarter tones.

He answered that he thought there was still much to be done with the diatonic system, but that it could not be done through intellectual invention. A new form is needed, he said, and the life of any new form must generate in the heart of a genius; it cannot be thought out.

"You will find it all in the Book of Genesis," he said. "Man may try to figure things out in music according to his own knowledge, but that will get him nowhere. The life of a new form comes from God."

* * *

Mr. Ansermet felt that the development of western music was closely related to the progress of Christianity—not so much for religious reasons, he said, as for its ethical influence. And it is also possible, he pointed out, that the difficulties that music faces today are closely related to problems facing Christianity today.

He said that the development of music may be divided into three eras — the primitive, the Asiatic, and the Western. Music has reached its highest development under the Western, which is of course largely dominated by Christian thought.

He said that the authentic cadence (the dominant-tonic relationship) is a Western development, whereas the plagal cadence (the subdominant-tonic relationship, alternating the minor with the major moods) is an Asiatic development.

He then pointed out that the Russians, who fall into the Asiatic classification, have been successful in Western music owing to their ability to borrow.

Did he believe that there were any great composers in the world today?

No, he did not. Stravinsky, he felt, was the last great Russian composer but has fallen into sterility in his later works.

What about Prokofiev and Shostakovitch?

Prokofiev, of course, was at the beginning of his career close to the school of the Russian Five. His recent works are good, but they may have been far better and far different if they had not been written under the Soviet influence. Shostakovitch, on the other hand, is a brilliant talent who is completely integrated with the new regime—so much so that he lacks the ability of self-examination and has gone off in many directions.

And what about Hindemith?

Hindemith is the last significant composer to come out of Germany.

And Bartók?

"Ah!" Mr. Ansermet exclaimed. "Bartók was the greatest composer of our time!"

Wide World

Ernest Ansermet, who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next six weeks.

This Clipping From
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
DEC 28 1951

European Tour Planned For Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — The [illegible] Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long Exposition of the Arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE
DEC 28 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS FIRST EUROPEAN TOUR

BOSTON (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 28 1951

for Europe April 25 at the close of the season here to give three concerts in Paris and others in Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich.

The orchestra will be making its first appearance in Europe, at the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The series will be conducted by the music director, Charles Munch, and Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

The orchestra will return by June 1 for the opening of the "Pops" concerts.

Europe Spring Tour For Boston Symphony

The 104 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 28 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN EUROPE

Boston, Dec. 28 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris.

Music director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "pops' concerts beginning June 1.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
DEC 28 1951

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring in Paris.

Music director Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris and then will take the orchestra on tour through Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

The orchestra will sail for Europe April 25 at the end of its 71st symphony season and will return in time for the annual "pops" concerts beginning June 1.

This Clipping From
ATHOL, MASS.
NEWS
DEC 28 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

Boston, Dec. 28 (AP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long Exposition of the Arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
DEC 28 1951

DEBUT IN PARIS

Boston, Dec. 28—(UP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next spring in Paris.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
DEC 28 1951

Hub Symphony To Tour Europe Next Spring

BOSTON, Friday (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the Orchestra's manager announced yesterday.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

This Clipping From
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
DEC 28 1951

Orchestra Is To Make Tour

BOSTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 3,094)

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 29 1951

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress of Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, the orchestra's manager announced today.

Charles Munch, the musical director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focussing attention upon the vitality of the cultural achievements of free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra will embark after the conclusion of its 71st season on April 25. Plans call also for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and in Zurich.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 28 1951

FIRST EUROPEAN TOUR

BOSTON, Dec. 28 AP — The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

[58]

Boston Herald

MUSIC

Dec. 15, 1951

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the eighth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Monique de la Bruchollerie, pianist, was the soloist in the following program:

Overture "The Hebrides," Op. 26 ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto No. 3 in D Minor ..... Rachmaninoff
"Pelleas et Melisande" Suite, Op. 80 ..... Faure
"La Boite" ..... Debussy

RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS HARD to know whom to talk about first, Ernest Ansermet, returning in the absence of Charles Munch to conduct the orchestra, or Monique de la Bruchollerie, the French pianist whose debut yesterday afternoon in Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto was no less electrifying than the debut of the late Ginette Neveu four years ago. Together they offered one of the high points of the season.

There is little doubt that Ernest Ansermet ranks with the most advanced conductors of the day. Indeed, for intellectual attainment he is probably without equal among his peers, yet there is nothing dry or overly learned in his style. His approach, though certainly scholarly, is informed with a radiance and sensitivity that communicates the presence of a great heart as well as a great brain.

On the conductor's stand the bearded Swiss, whose bald head is encircled in a tonsure of snow white hair, presents a commanding appearance. He is tall and exceedingly broad-shouldered. His bodily movements, though angular, are softened by gracefull though always exact gestures of hands and arms. His attitudes suggest a happy cross between those of Monteux, who stands like —and is—the musical rock of Gibraltar, and Munch, whose style suggests animation even in repose, and which can rise at times to the turbulence of inspiration in white heat.

The analogy goes even further, for Ansermet's musical approach is also a cross between that of Monteux and Munch. Monteux is the epitome of the chef d'orchestre, the leader whose baton is dedicated to the precise choreography of the musical beat and nuance indicated by the composer. With Monteux, perhaps more than with any other conductor today, the composer alone speaks. Monteux is merely the means to that end. Munch, however, though indisputably grounded, is a visionary, too; he sees things and finds things that would astonish a composer exactly as a great stage director perceives overtones and harmonics in the dialogue the author himself didn't dream were there.

ANSERMET COMBINES and blends the differing approaches, achieving a limpid clarity yet warmth of tone, producing an inspirational though always controlled quality, and accomplishing subtleties of mood but never fussily. The orchestra played for him beautifully, too, giving him all its infinite capacity for response. When, indeed, did it ever sound better than in the exquisite suite from Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande?"

As for Mlle. Bruchollerie, I make only the standard reservation I make upon hearing any pianist for the first time with the orchestra: I can not go all out until I hear her in a solo recital. But in the meantime it may be said that this attractive young woman (would you say so?), whose gown appeared to me the most perfectly chosen one I've ever seen among women pianists, is an artist of the very first attainment. Rachmaninoff's Third, like Brahms' Second, is particularly a man's work. It calls for ever greater and greater force, and simply cannot be done without the capacity to sustain both physically and artistically.

In this regard the pianist, whose piano technique employs wrists well above keyboard level in a masterly application of power, did not fail. Yet more important than her technical command—for many today have as much or more—was her prodigious musicality, her surging re-creative impulse. She was as surely at home in the accents, the dynamic outbursts, the rhythmic tensions, as she was in the melodic curves and the delicate arabesques. Hers was, in fine, a conception filled with fire and passion; a performance that carried all before it. Admitted this is a warhorse of a work, one shrewedly designed to go over. Admitted, too, that a lot of people can play it with equal technical proficiency. But that Mlle. Bruchollerie could so vividly bring it off is a testimony to her extraordinary abilities. It is only a pity that Mr. Munch, who sponsored her as well as Mlle. Neveu, could not have shared in her triumph here, which resulted in five calls—close to a record for a Friday afternoon.

Mr. Ansermet returns next week to do Beethoven's Fifth, Ravel's "Mother Goose" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

DEC 28 1951

Symphony Visits Europe Next Spring

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager, yesterday announced the aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris during May and performances in Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich at the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. It will mark the farthest trip for the orchestra since they travelled to San Francisco's 1915 Exposition to give 13 concerts under Karl Muck.

MONTEUX TO SHARE

Charles Munch, the music director has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him the conducting of the series. The three Paris concerts will be a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts aimed at focussing the attention of the world on the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra embarks for Europe immediately following the end of its 71st season in Symphony Hall April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates—this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. There is a possibility that a fourth concert will be given for the Paris festival; all will feature contemporary European and American music.

It will also be the first time the musicians have made a group sea voyage and the realization of a life-long dream of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony for 25 years, who died last June. It has been shared by Mr. Munch who said of the opportunity: "It has long been my dearest hope to bring my American orchestra to Europe." Until now, however, the funds have never been available for the purpose.

WORLD'S GREATEST

The Boston Symphony will join the celebrated orchestras of the world in the festival opening April 28. The cultural cavalcade of the "best" symphony orchestras of the half-century includes the Vienna Philharmonic, the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande (founded by Ernest Ansermet, current guest conductor of the Boston Symphony); the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National of Paris.

In making the trip, the orchestra will play at both the birthplaces of Mr. Munch and Pierre Monteux—Strasbourg and Paris. Symphony Hall officials pointed out last night that the Boston Symphony will also be reciprocating the visits of the organization to whom they have played host over the past 50 years; the Royal Philharmonic under Sir Thomas Beecham last year; the La Scala Orchestra under Toscanini in 1921 and Leoncavallo in 1906; the London Symphony under Nikisch in 1912; the Concert Society of the Conservatory of Paris in 1918; and Mr. Munch's own appearance with the Orchestre National Radio Diffusion Francaise in 1948.

TWO U. S. ORCHESTRAS PLAN EUROPEAN TOURS

Two of America's major symphony orchestras—the Boston and Philadelphia—are likely to be touring in Europe next May. The Boston Symphony's trip was announced definitely yesterday. The Philadelphia Orchestra has definite commitments for a twenty-one-day tour, but final decision on the tour is to be made by its board next month.

The Boston Symphony, which will make its first visit to Europe, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom and will give three of four concerts in Paris as part of the congress' month-long exposition of the arts. The aim of this exposition is "to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression."

Conducted by its musical director, Charles Munch, and by Pierre Monteux, former leader of the ensemble, the Boston Symphony is expected to be abroad for a fortnight. In addition to its Paris programs devoted to contemporary American and European music, the orchestra will play in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Brussels, Amsterdam, The Hague or Rotterdam, Salzburg and Zurich.

The Philadelphia Orchestra's itinerary will cover a good deal of the Boston's. It is likely that it will give, under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, its musical director, two or three concerts in Paris as well as concerts in Bordeaux, Brussels and Amsterdam It also has plans to play in Denmark, Sweden, Finland and in the cities of northern Italy.

The cost of the Boston Symphony's tour is estimated at $175,000.

NEW YORK TIMES
(Internatl. Ed.)
December 28, 1951

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 30 1951

Boston Symphony to Europe; Musical "Month of Sundays"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Quite the biggest news of this musical season is the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go to Europe next Spring to participate in a month-long exhibition in Paris under sponsorship of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. For many years the late Serge Koussevitzky dreamed of taking his beloved Boston Symphony to European cities to exhibit the calibre of one of the first three foremost American orchestras.

Now, with the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, that dream becomes reality. The Boston Symphony will embark a day or two after the 71st Symphony season ends at Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, April 26. Three, possibly four, concerts will be given in Paris, and the orchestra further plans to play in Belgium and Holland, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich, Switzerland.

The Boston Symphony must be back for a month of Pops at Symphony Hall starting about June 1, so their European stay will be limited to about a fortnight. The usual Pop concerts here in May will be omitted.

Purpose

The purpose of this exhibition is to show what has been accomplished culturally in the first half of the 20th Century by free men in free countries. Accordingly, the exhibition will include not only music, but literature, fine arts and dancing. Orchestras from various points in Europe will participate, and the United States will further be represented by art and ballet projects.

There has been so much allegation that the United States is losing in her diplomatic and propaganda "cold war" with the Soviet and its satellites, that this exhibition comes just at the right time, it seems from here, to show something of what we have done in this country. If Russia really were honest, she would immediately form a delegation to visit Paris in a spirit of good will to observe what free men have accomplished even over the storm-tossed years of this turbulent half-century.

That Russia will do so is most unlikely. It will serve [illegible] propaganda purposes better [illegible] her own people, to keep them [illegible] ned and in ignorance, feeding them the familiar line that the United States is a wilderness of crime, corruption, barbarism and war-mongering.

Munch and Monteux

Conductor Charles Munch, who has maintained the high standards of performance to which his predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky, brought the Boston Symphony, will conduct some of the exhibition concerts. He has invited the highly esteemed former Boston conductor, Pierre Monteux, to take charge of others.

There will be benefits all 'round, both for Europeans and for us of Boston, when our orchestra shows off its capabilities in important key cities over there. Nothing succeeds like success; nothing is so persuasive as good example. The programs will include both European and American music, which will afford those who attend the concerts opportunity to reflect that these United States have long enjoyed, with pride and gratefulness, the European musical heritage, and at the same time have begun to develop a creative musical tradition of our own.

But most of all, the exhibition in its entirety ought to be an imposing and highly persuasive example to all men that freedom of mind—upon which all other freedoms are based—is the one indispensable condition for pursuit of those cultures which produce a civilization. Without music, literature and art, there is no culture in this world, and without culture there is no civilization; without freedom to create there is only the darkness of barbarism and hideous brute force.

The new musical at the Shubert Theatre, "A Month of Sundays," ought to have been a good show, light, pleasant and amusing. Perhaps it will yet become one, for producer Carly Wharton has all the essential elements except a fine book. With Gene Lockhart and Nancy Walker in the leading roles, the cast is able; the dances of Anna Sokolow, while a bit flavored with the style of Agnes DeMille, are spirited and varied, and admirably executed; the Albert Selden music is pleasant; Jo Mielziner's excursion boat setting and Kenn Barr's New York Sunday costumes glow with many colors of the spectrum.

But that book! I wonder why author Burt Shevelove, as he was writing it from the Victor Wolfson play of 1937, "Excursion," could not have foreseen that the pleasant fantasy of easy—if impossible—escape from day-to-day humdrum, seems utter sentimentality in 1951. Today even the idea of such an escape to a dream island in the Caribbean is revoltingly trivial if taken with any degree of serious reflection. As just fantasy, with light and humorous treatment, yes, but Mr. Shevelove got serious and wanted to make you feel sorry for the economic prisoners of Manhattan.

Today we all are in there pitching, or ought to be, for there is no escape from humdrum except in the vision of trying to help peace out of turmoil and some stabilization out of spiraling inflation. Life without humdrum is impossible. If you want to make a satirical joke out of an attempt to escape, OK, but don't take it seriously even for a second.

That is why, unless Mr. Shevelove subjects his second act to drastic revision, gives Nancy Walker something more to do than just gag, clown and sing (which is very good, but not enough), and unless he makes the role of Annie, the ambitious brain at Gimbel's, more sympathetic, the prospect for "A Month of Sundays" is dreary indeed. Even worse than humdrum.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 29

Boston Symphony Plans First European Tour

Boston, Dec. 29—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts

[57]

Boston Herald

MUSIC

Dec. 15, 1951

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the eighth program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Monique de la Bruchollerie, pianist, was the soloist in the following program:

Overture "The Hebrides," Op. 26 ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto No. 3 in D Minor ..... Rachmaninoff
"Pelleas et Melisande" Suite, Op. 80 ..... Faure
"La Mer" ..... Debussy

RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS HARD to know whom to talk about first, Ernest Ansermet, returning in the absence of Charles Munch to conduct the orchestra, or Monique de la Bruchollerie, the French pianist whose debut yesterday afternoon in Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto was no less electrifying than the debut of the late Ginette Neveu four years ago. Together they offered one of the high points of the season.

There is little doubt that Ernest Ansermet ranks with the most advanced conductors of the day. Indeed, for intellectual attainment he is probably without equal among his peers, yet there is nothing dry or overly learned in his style. His approach, though certainly scholarly, is informed with a radiance and sensitivity that communicates the presence of a great heart as well as a great brain.

On the conductor's stand the bearded Swiss, whose bald head is encircled in a tonsure of snow white hair, presents a commanding appearance. He is tall and exceedingly broad-shouldered. His bodily movements, though angular, are softened by gracefull though always exact gestures of hands and arms. His attitudes suggest a happy cross between those of Monteux, who stands like —and is—the musical rock of Gibraltar, and Munch, whose style suggests animation even in repose, and which can rise at times to the turbulence of inspiration in white heat.

The analogy goes even further, for Ansermet's musical approach is also a cross between that of Monteux and Munch. Monteux is the epitome of the chef d'orchestre, the leader whose baton is dedicated to the precise choreography of the musical beat and nuance indicated by the composer. With Monteux, perhaps more than with any other conductor today, the composer alone speaks. Monteux is merely the means to that end. Munch, however, though indisputably grounded, is a visionary, too; he sees things and finds things that would astonish a composer exactly as a great stage director perceives overtones and harmonics in the dialogue the author himself didn't dream were there.

ANSERMET COMBINES and blends the differing approaches, achieving a limpid clarity yet warmth of tone, producing an inspirational though always controlled quality, and accomplishing subtleties of mood but never fussily. The orchestra played for him beautifully, too, giving him all its infinite capacity for response. When, indeed, did it ever sound better than in the exquisite suite from Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande?"

As for Mlle. Bruchollerie, I make only the standard reservation I make upon hearing any pianist for the first time with the orchestra: I can not go all out until I hear her in a solo recital. But in the meantime it may be said that this attractive young woman (would you say so?), whose gown appeared to me the most perfectly chosen one I've ever seen among women pianists, is an artist of the very first attainment. Rachmaninoff's Third, like Brahms' Second, is particularly a man's work. It calls for ever greater and greater force, and simply cannot be done without the capacity to sustain both physically and artistically.

In this regard the pianist, whose piano technique employs wrists well above keyboard level in a masterly application of power, did not fail. Yet more important than her technical command—for many today have as much or more—was her prodigious musicality, her surging re-creative impulse. She was as surely at home in the accents, the dynamic outbursts, the rhythmic tensions, as she was in the melodic curves and the delicate arabesques. Hers was, in fine, a conception filled with fire and passion; a performance that carried all before it. Admitted this is a warhorse of a work, one shrewedly designed to go over. Admitted, too, that a lot of people can play it with equal technical proficiency. But that Mlle. Bruchollerie could so vividly bring it off is a testimony to her extraordinary abilities. It is only a pity that Mr. Munch, who sponsored her as well as Mlle. Neveu, could not have shared in her triumph here, which resulted in five calls—close to a record for a Friday afternoon.

Mr. Ansermet returns next week to do Beethoven's Fifth, Ravel's "Mother Goose" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 28 1951

Symphony Visits Europe Next Spring

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager, yesterday announced the aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris during May and performances in Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich at the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. It will mark the farthest trip for the orchestra since they travelled to San Francisco's 1915 Exposition to give 13 concerts under Karl Muck.

MONTEUX TO SHARE

Charles Munch, the music director, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, to share with him the conducting of the series. The three Paris concerts will be a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts aimed at focussing the attention of the world on the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the century.

The orchestra embarks for Europe immediately following the end of its 71st season in Symphony Hall April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates —this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. There is a possibility that a fourth concert will be given for the Paris festival; all will feature contemporary European and American music.

It will also be the first time the musicians have made a group sea voyage and the realization of a life-long dream of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony for 25 years, who died last June. It has been shared by Mr. Munch who said of the opportunity: "It has long been my dearest hope to bring my American orchestra to Europe." Until now, however, the funds have never been available for the purpose.

WORLD'S GREATEST

The Boston Symphony will join the celebrated orchestras of the world in the festival opening April 28. The cultural cavalcade of the "best" symphony orchestras of the half-century includes the Vienna Philharmonic, the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande (founded by Ernest Ansermet, current guest conductor of the Boston Symphony); the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National of Paris.

In making the trip, the orchestra will play at both the birthplaces of Mr. Munch and Pierre Monteux—Strasbourg and Paris Symphony Hall officials pointed out last night that the Boston Symphony will also be reciprocating the visits of the organizations to whom they have played host over the past 50 years; the Royal Philharmonic under Sir Thomas Beecham last year; the La Scala Orchestra under Toscanini in 1921 and Leoncavallo in 1906; the London Symphony under Nikisch in 1912; the Concert Society of the Conservatory of Paris in 1918; and Mr. Munch's own appearance with the Orchestre National Radio Diffusion Francaise in 1948.

NEW YORK TIMES
(Internatl. Ed.)
December 28, 1951

TWO U. S. ORCHESTRAS PLAN EUROPEAN TOURS

Two of America's major symphony orchestras—the Boston and Philadelphia—are likely to be touring in Europe next May. The Boston Symphony's trip was announced definitely yesterday. The Philadelphia Orchestra has definite commitments for a twenty-one-day tour, but final decision on the tour is to be made by its board next month.

The Boston Symphony, which will make its first visit to Europe, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom and will give three of four concerts in Paris as part of the congress' month-long exposition of the arts. The aim of this exposition is "to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression."

Conducted by its musical director, Charles Munch, and by Pierre Monteux, former leader of the ensemble, the Boston Symphony is expected to be abroad for a fortnight. In addition to its Paris programs devoted to contemporary American and European music, the orchestra will play in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Brussels, Amsterdam, The Hague or Rotterdam, Salzburg and Zurich.

The Philadelphia Orchestra's itinerary will cover a good deal of the Boston's. It is likely that it will give, under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, its musical director, two or three concerts in Paris as well as concerts in Bordeaux, Brussels and Amsterdam It also has plans to play in Denmark, Sweden, Finland and in the cities of northern Italy.

The cost of the Boston Symphony's tour is estimated at $175,000.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 30 1951

Boston Symphony to Europe; Musical "Month of Sundays"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Quite the biggest news of this musical season is the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go to Europe next Spring to participate in a month-long exhibition in Paris under sponsorship of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. For many years the late Serge Koussevitzky dreamed of taking his beloved Boston Symphony to European cities to exhibit the calibre of one of the first three foremost American orchestras.

Now, with the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, that dream becomes reality. The Boston Symphony will embark a day or two after the 71st Symphony season ends at Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, April 26. Three, possibly four, concerts will be given in Paris, and the orchestra further plans to play in Belgium and Holland, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Austria and Zurich, Switzerland.

The Boston Symphony must be back for a month of Pops at Symphony Hall starting about June 1, so their European stay will be limited to about a fortnight. The usual Pop concerts here in May will be omitted.

Purpose

The purpose of this exhibition is to show what has been accomplished culturally in the first half of the 20th Century by free men in free countries. Accordingly, the exhibition will include not only music, but literature, fine arts and dancing. Orchestras from various points in Europe will participate, and the United States will further be represented by art and ballet projects.

There has been so much allegation that the United States is losing in her diplomatic and propaganda "cold war" with the Soviet and its satellites, that this exhibition comes just at the right time, it seems from here, to show something of what we have done in this country. If Russia really were honest, she would immediately form a delegation to visit Paris in a spirit of good will to observe what free men have accomplished even over the storm-tossed years of this turbulent half-century.

That Russia will do so is most unlikely. It will serve propaganda purposes better her own people, to keep them ned and in ignorance, feeding them the familiar line that the United States is a wilderness of crime, corruption, barbarism and war-mongering.

Munch and Monteux

Conductor Charles Munch, who has maintained the high standards of performance to which his predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky, brought the Boston Symphony, will conduct some of the exhibition concerts. He has invited the highly esteemed former Boston conductor, Pierre Monteux, to take charge of others.

There will be benefits all 'round, both for Europeans and for us of Boston, when our orchestra shows off its capabilities in important key cities over there. Nothing succeeds like success; nothing is so persuasive as good example. The programs will include both European and American music, which will afford those who attend the concerts opportunity to reflect that these United States have long enjoyed, with pride and gratefulness, the European musical heritage, and at the same time have begun to develop a creative musical tradition of our own.

But most of all, the exhibition in its entirety ought to be an imposing and highly persuasive example to all men that freedom of mind—upon which all other freedoms are based—is the one indispensable condition for pursuit of those cultures which produce a civilization. Without music, literature and art, there is no culture in this world, and without culture there is no civilization; without freedom to create there is only the darkness of barbarism and hideous brute force.

The new musical at the Shubert Theatre, "A Month of Sundays," ought to have been a good show, light, pleasant and amusing. Perhaps it will yet become one, for producer Carly Wharton has all the essential elements except a fine book. With Gene Lockhart and Nancy Walker in the leading roles, the cast is able; the dances of Anna Sokolow, while a bit flavored with the style of Agnes DeMille, are spirited and varied, and admirably executed; the Albert Selden music is pleasant; Jo Mielziner's excursion boat setting and Kenn Barr's New York Sunday costumes glow with many colors of the spectrum.

But that book! I wonder why author Burt Shevelove, as he was writing it from the Victor Wolfson play of 1937, "Excursion," could not have foreseen that the pleasant fantasy of easy—if impossible—escape from day-to-day humdrum, seems utter sentimentality in 1951. Today even the idea of such an escape to a dream island in the Caribbean is revoltingly trivial if taken with any degree of serious reflection. As just fantasy, with light and humorous treatment, yes, but Mr. Shevelove got serious and wanted to make you feel sorry for the economic prisoners of Manhattan.

Today we all are in there pitching, or ought to be, for there is no escape from humdrum except in the vision of trying to hew peace out of turmoil and some stabilization out of spiraling inflation. Life without humdrum is impossible. If you want to make a satirical joke out of an attempt to escape, OK, but don't take it seriously even for a second.

That is why, unless Mr. Shevelove subjects his second act to drastic revision, gives Nancy Walker something more to do than just gag, clown and sing (which is very good, but not enough), and unless he makes the role of Annie, the ambitious brain at Gimbel's, more sympathetic, the prospect for "A Month of Sundays" is dreary indeed. Even worse than humdrum.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
DEC 30 1951

Boston Symphony Plans First European Tour

Boston, Dec. 29—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European tour after it completes its 71st season here on April 25.

Charles Munch, the musical director, said last night the 104 players will give three concerts in Paris as a contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts.

Plans also call for performances in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, Strasbourg and Zurich.

Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony to share with him in conducting the concerts.

[59]

BEFORE THE CONCERT: Aldo Ciccolini, p[illegible] last night with the Boston Sym[illegible] Orchestra, discusses the score with Ernest Ansermet, who conducted the orchestra in its third concert here this season. Ciccolini wears heavy gloves to warm his sensitive fingers before playing at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

—Staff Photo by Lawrence S. Millard

MUSIC

oston Symphony Orches-tra Presents 3rd in Se-ries of R.I. Concerts

WILLIAM DINNEEN

[illegible] been similar, since practically every device in "Le Sacre" is duplicated in "Petrouchka." Why a large segment of the audience should have gone home rather than be subjected to "The Rites of Spring" a few weeks ago, but apparently accepted "Petrouchka" without noticeable uneasiness last night interested me greatly.

The opening Overture was beautifully done, and the Ravel "Mother Goose" pieces have never sounded more colorful than at last night's concert.

The incidental violin solos by Richard Burgin, and the piano solo section played by Bernard Zighera in "Petrouchka" were brilliantly performed, as always.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 2 - 1952

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony To Play in Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it is announced by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager. They will give three concerts in Paris in May. The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 1 1952

Boston Symphony Plans First Trip to Europe

The Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] ed an invitation fron[illegible] for Cultural Freedon[illegible] to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
NEWS

★ Mildred Norton

(Drama-Music Editor)

Last week we announced that a full scale festival of the arts is to be held in Paris next May, at which leading musical organizations and intellectuals from the Western music world will participate in presenting a cavalcade of the music, drama, ballet, opera, art, literature and philosophy that have emerged during the first half of this century.

Now it has been decided which symphony orchestra shall represent America. According to news received today, it will be the Boston Symphony, which will make its first trip abroad to give three concerts during the festival slated to open in the French capital April 28 and last through the month of May.

MUENCH

Charles Muench, the orchestra's musical director, will embark with his 104-piece ensemble immediately upon conclusion of its present season, and has invited his friend and colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share the Paris podium with him. Since both Muench and the ensemble must be back for their Tanglewood chores by June 1, they will remain abroad only two weeks. Muench was recently asked by the symphony trustees to again direct this summer's Berkshire curricula, the post left vacant by Serge Koussevitsky's death early last year.

(This ought to squelch rumors that "Muench is out" in Boston. Fact is that his recent illness from a virus infection has necessitated some unscheduled guest conductors this season, that's all. Last summer, after his first strenuous Boston season, he had to plunge without any rest into the Tanglewood activities, left disorganized by the sudden death of Koussevitsky. The Boston winter schedule is one of the toughest in the country.)

Modern masterpieces

The Paris festival, under the title, "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Cenutury," will be held under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and is designed to acquaint the world with what the free creative mind has produced in the arts during this century.

Nicolas Nabokov, secretary general of the congress, says the festival will be an answer to the propaganda that has sought "to plant doubts in our minds of the validity, strength and vitality of our Western culture."

During the 20th century, says Nabokov, "free creative imagination of the poets, painters and composers has produced an abundant flow of masterpieces in all the arts." However, he adds, there has lately been a violent political reaction against the free creative spirit.

"Narrow restrictive rules have sought to transform the artist into an instrument of the state, producing works tailored to the utilitarian needs of totalitarian regimes."

What free creative enterprise has managed to produce in music in the last 50 years will be shown by the Boston Symphony, as well as by the Vienna State Opera and Vienna Philharmonic (which will stage two performances of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck"), the chorus and orchestra of the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome, the R.I.A.S. Orchestra of Berlin (which plans a full evening of Bartok under Fricsay), the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande of Geneva (at which Joseph Szigeti will present the Paris premiere of the new Frank Martin violin concerto under Ansermet) and France's Conservatory Orchestra and National Orchestra (both formerly under Muench before he accepted the Boston post). All programs will be devoted to the music of the past half century.

In the ballet field, this country will also be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director. Of its six performances slated for the festival, one will be devoted to the ballets of Stravinsky, with the composer conducting. Two new ballets have been commissioned from the French composers Georges Auric and Henri Sauguet.

Plans are also underway for an all-Negro cast to present the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

In drama, Franz Kafka's "The Trial" will be staged by Jean Louis Barrault, and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra" will be done by Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh.

Paintings will also be represented. James Johnson Sweeney, former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble a comprehensive exhibition of some 200 contemporary American and European paintings.

A series of afternoon forums, led by noted writers and philosophers, is also planned. One of the forums will discuss freedom of the press.

(Continued on following page)

(Continued from preceding page)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 30 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST EUROPEAN VISIT NEXT S[illegible]RING

Munch and Monteux to Conduct at Paris and Elsewhere

Boston, Dec. 29—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appe[illegible]rope next spring, it has been announced. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Other U. S. Representatives

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Co., of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts;" as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St. Theater in New York in 1934.

In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including some that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 71st symphony season in Symphony Hall, April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates—this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the Boston Symphony plans also during its fortnight abroad to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Austria, and in Zurich.

[illegible]

BEFORE THE CONCERT: Aldo Ciccolini, piano soloist last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, discusses the score with Ernest Ansermet, who conducted the orchestra in its third concert here this season. Ciccolini wears heavy gloves to warm his sensitive fingers before playing at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

—Staff Photo by Lawrence S. Millard

MUSIC

ston Symphony Orches-ra Presents 3rd in Se-ries of R.I. Concerts

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] the third concert of its [illegible] series last evening at [illegible] Memorial Audi[illegible] Ernest Ansermet con[illegible] Aldo Ciccolini was [illegible] fourth piano Con[illegible] of Beethoven.

[illegible] to "Rosamunde" [illegible] Pianoforte No. 4 [illegible] in G major, Op. 58

[illegible] ("Mother Goose")

[illegible] Spinning

[illegible] Ballet [illegible] Fairy

[illegible] of this concert, [illegible] response, was the [illegible] formance of the [illegible] to by Aldo Cic[illegible] [illegible]s first appear[illegible] [illegible] has appeared as [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] 1950. Mr. Cic[illegible] [illegible] was com[illegible] [illegible] tone and [illegible] property and un[illegible] playing was most [illegible] audience applaud[illegible] [illegible]tedly after the [illegible] recalled Mr. [illegible] at the end.

[illegible] [illegible] as Ernest [illegible] a student of [illegible] of music as well [illegible] appearance Mr. [illegible] age a venerable [illegible] be pardoned for [illegible] energy and ex[illegible] of his conducting [illegible] astonishment to a [illegible] audience. In some [illegible] meeting was unortho[illegible] standards, but every [illegible] purpose and a poetry [illegible] observing musical [illegible] could compare [illegible] differing approaches [illegible] displayed by Pierre [illegible] Ernest Ansermet. Mr. [illegible] [illegible]cting the same or[illegible] [illegible]e Sacre" a few weeks [illegible] the impression of being [illegible] calm in the center of [illegible]ane. Mr. Ansermet, also [illegible] a bit of animation to [illegible]ing which gave this list[illegible] the feeling that he could and [illegible]ld push the storm around if it [illegible]urbed his mood. Incidentally, [illegible]e was every reason why the [illegible]pretative method should have been similar, since practically every device in "Le Sacre" is duplicated in "Petrouchka." Why a large segment of the audience should have gone home rather than be subjected to "The Rites of Spring" a few weeks ago, but apparently accepted "Petrouchka" without noticeable uneasiness last night interested me greatly.

The opening Overture was beautifully done, and the Ravel "Mother Goose" pieces have never sounded more colorful than at last night's concert.

The incidental violin solos by Richard Burgin, and the piano solo section played by Bernard Zighera in "Petrouchka" were brilliantly performed, as always.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 2 - 1952

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 1 - 1952

Boston Symphony To Play in Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it is announced by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager. They will give three concerts in Paris in May. The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
JAN 1 - 1952

Boston Symphony Plans First Trip to Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
NEWS
JAN 2 1952

★ Mildred Norton

(Drama-Music Editor)

Last week we announced that a full scale festival of the arts is to be held in Paris next May, at which leading musical organizations and intellectuals from the Western music world will participate in presenting a cavalcade of the music, drama, ballet, opera, art, literature and philosophy that have emerged during the first half of this century.

Now it has been decided which symphony orchestra shall represent America. According to news received today, it will be the Boston Symphony, which will make its first trip abroad to give three concerts during the festival slated to open in the French capital April 28 and last through the month of May.

MUENCH

Charles Muench, the orchestra's musical director, will embark with his 104-piece ensemble immediately upon conclusion of its present season, and has invited his friend and colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share the Paris podium with him. Since both Muench and the ensemble must be back for their Tanglewood chores by June 1, they will remain abroad only two weeks. Muench was recently asked by the symphony trustees to again direct this summer's Berkshire curricula, the post left vacant by Serge Koussevitsky's death early last year.

(This ought to squelch rumors that "Muench is out" in Boston. Fact is that his recent illness from a virus infection has necessitated some unscheduled guest conductors this season, that's all. Last summer, after his first strenuous Boston season, he had to plunge without any rest into the Tanglewood activities, left disorganized by the sudden death of Koussevitsky. The Boston winter schedule is one of the toughest in the country.)

Modern masterpieces

The Paris festival, under the title, "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," will be held under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and is designed to acquaint the world with what the free creative mind has produced in the arts during this century.

Nicolas Nabokov, secretary general of the congress, says the festival will be an answer to the propaganda that has sought "to plant doubts in our minds of the validity, strength and vitality of our Western culture."

During the 20th century, says Nabokov, "free creative imagination of the poets, painters and composers has produced an abundant flow of masterpieces in all the arts." However, he adds, there has lately been a violent political reaction against the free creative spirit.

"Narrow restrictive rules have sought to transform the artist into an instrument of the state, producing works tailored to the utilitarian needs of totalitarian regimes."

What free creative enterprise has managed to produce in music in the last 50 years will be shown by the Boston Symphony, as well as by the Vienna State Opera and Vienna Philharmonic (which will stage two performances of Alban Berg's "Wezzeck"), the chorus and orchestra of the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome, the R.I.A.S. Orchestra of Berlin (which plans a full evening of Bartok under Fricsay), the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande of Geneva (at which Joseph Szigeti will present the Paris premiere of the new Frank Martin violin concerto under Ansermet) and France's Conservatoire Orchestra and National Orchestra (both formerly under Munch, before he accepted the Boston post). All programs will be devoted to the music of the past half century.

In the ballet field, this country will also be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director. Of its six performances slated for the festival, one will be devoted to the ballets of Stravinsky, with the composer conducting. Two new ballets have been commissioned from the French composers Georges Auric and Henri Sauguet.

(Continued on following page)

(Continued from preceding page)

Plans are also underway for an all-Negro cast to present the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

In drama, Franz Kafka's "The Trial" will be staged by Jean Louis Barrault, and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra" will be done by Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh.

Paintings will also be represented. James Johnson Sweeney, former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble a comprehensive exhibition of some 200 contemporary American and European paintings.

A series of afternoon forums, led by noted writers and philosophers, is also planned. One of the forums will discuss freedom of the press.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 30 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST EUROPEAN VISIT NEXT SPRING

Munch and Monteux to Conduct at Paris and Elsewhere

Boston, Dec. 29—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it has been announced. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Other U. S. Representatives

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Co., of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts;" as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St. Theater in New York in 1934.

In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including some that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 71st symphony season in Symphony Hall, April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates—this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the Boston Symphony plans also during its fortnight abroad to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Austria, and in Zurich.

This Clipping From
SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
JAN 3

My Day

By Eleanor Roosevelt

U. S. Doing Little to Acquaint Europe With American Culture

Paris, Tuesday — I received notice today that made me think back to our years in the White House when I used to meet far more frequently the groups of Girl Scouts and Campfire Girls. This notice tells me that the Campfire Girls will celebrate their birthday the week of March 16 to 22.

The organized Campfire Girls was founded in 1910 for girls from 7 to 18 years. The intention was to give every girl the feeling that she was a needed part of the group. Youngsters in this age bracket are apt to feel lonely, and this organization was designed to help them make friends and develop means of self-expression. At the same time the aim was to give every girl a sense of personal responsibility in her home and family life which would lead to the development of a sense of responsibility as a citizen.

* * *

Not so very long ago a speech delivered by the Hon. Edward W. Barrett, assistant secretary of state for public affairs, was reported in the newspapers and in it he commented that we in the Western world were not making the effort to have our culture understood which was being made by the Soviet countries. Here in Europe one is very quickly aware of the fact that the U. S. has done very little to acquaint European people with the fact that there are artists and writers in our country who are worth becoming acquainted with.

We have not taken part in many cultural exhibits over here whereas the Soviet Union has neglected no opportunity to show the advances made within its borders. In view of this, I listened with the greatest of interest to a representative of the Congress for Cultural Freedom the other day tell me that there was to be an international exhibition of the arts of our time held in Paris between April 29 and June 1 this coming spring.

This exhibition will feature the artists of the non-Communist world. The Boston symphony orchestra will make its first trip to Europe, with Charles Munch and Pierre Montreux conducting. There will be expositions of contemporary painting. There will be lectures on literary subjects and there will be films and perhaps even dramatic presentations.

In fact, this may be, in the art world, one of the most exciting things that has been done in a long time and it may awaken both our allies and our enemies to a realization that the U. S. is not just a source of dollars but also a source of real artistic appreciation and production.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 4 - 1952

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND EUROPE

1/4/52 Globe

In its 71st year of history-making, the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to make history. Next Spring it will play for the first time in Europe.

The occasion is special. Since 1914 our Western world has been forced to remember what in years of tranquil prosperity it is so easy to forget; that a civilization, if it leave any heritage at all, does so not in money and guns, but in the arts, sciences, philosophy, and religion. The content of these is spiritual, although the word more commonly used to designate them is culture. Thus it is the Congress for Cultural Freedom which has invited the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Paris in May for three, possibly four, concerts in a month of "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," designed to show specimens of vital creative achievement in all the arts by peoples not under stultifying interference by State control. When we consider what an extinguisher cap has descended on the arts in Russia since her revolution went sour, this point need not be labored.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been chosen is striking but not startling. To begin with the most prosaic fact, the expenses of this trip, beyond what the orchestra itself earns in Paris and on tour in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Bordeaux, Strassbourg, and Zurich and by radio broadcast, are to be paid by the Cultural Congress without cost to our local supporters. A less prosaic fact is the repute for world eminence which the Boston orchestra has had, and, save for a short interval during and after the first World War, has maintained since the early years of this century.

This eminence is an historical process. It began in 1881 with imported European players and famous conductors; it continues now when at least half the players when they go to Paris will be seeing Europe for the first time. They go as a virtuoso orchestra, not indeed the first to be heard in Europe nor the only one in America, but the fact of the invitation speaks for itself. Most of the great European orchestras, especially those on the Continent, have been adjuncts of opera houses; the Boston orchestra has cultivated in its public an eager taste for music in its most advanced form, the symphony; and while distinguished soloists quite properly remain ornaments to many of its programs, it has nevertheless been a pioneer in the promulgation of pure symphonic performances.

The art of performance itself is today also in somewhat special case. For the past two decades the major works of musical literature, instrumental and choral, have had performances of grandeur never dreamed of by the composers who penned them during the past two and one-half centuries—an exemplification of the process by which artists, out of sheer inner necessity, create works beyond the immediate comprehension or capacities of most of their contemporaries, only to have them taken up by mankind in some later age as a challenge and triumphantly achieved. It behooves us, therefore, to speak tentatively of the works of contemporary composers which will be played in Paris and on tour by the Boston Symphony Orchestra along with classics of the regular repertory.

Thus we send back to Europe something which originated there but which has achieved distinctive excellence on American soil. We can scarcely be said to await a verdict, for that has been rendered decade after decade since the turn of the present century by eminent visiting European composers, conductors, and performers; but we do eagerly await the highly competent critical appraisals which its playing is certain to elicit.

As for cultural freedom, what better proof could we send to Europe? For without it the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not exist. Its very presence here, and soon-to-be in Europe, is testimony that freedom is the life blood and vital breath of the creative spirit.

Uncle Dudley

This Clipping From
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
JAN 4 - 1952

Exported Symphony

Some of the easy propaganda scored by Moscow peddles all manner of untruths about American culture. Americans are pictured as grasping moneybags or poor beknighted masses starving in tenement-crowded cities. The Red mills love to grind out their spawn of lies pointing to Communist culture and American materialism.

It is good news, then, that the Congress of Cultural Freedom is sponsoring the European tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Audiences in Paris, the Hague, Belgium and other cities will have a chance to see and hear first-hand one of our best musical groups. By so much, at least, should some of the false haze of misunderstood American culture be dispelled.

The "Boston" tone, under a director who came from a leading European musical family and center, is justly famous. It will be interesting to see just how European masters of music compare the American product, brought to flower under the guiding genius of the late Serge Koussevitsky. As 104 ambassadors of good-will the musicians of the Boston Symphony are more than symphony players. They represent part of the official American policy to prove the authenticity of American culture.

To most of us the hypothesis needs no proving. But Europeans, some at least, are prone to look upon us as a nation of uncultured shopworkers, businessmen, bankers and industrialists. It is time to show the extent and proficiency of American art and appreciation of culture.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
JAN 5 - 1952

Symphony's Manager Takes Off For Paris

New York, Jan. 4. (AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris tonight aboard an Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May.

The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring here Thursday and today with Charles Munch, the symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection contracted on tour earlier in the season.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 4 - 1952

Symphony Rehearsal Open to Music Fans

The Wednesday night rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be open to the public, the time 7:30. It will then be possible for music students and all interested to observe Ernest Ansermet working with the orchestra, which he is conducting this week in the continued absence of Charles Munch, the regular music director.

It is expected that William Primrose, the soloist of the week, will be rehearsing at this time. Primrose is to appear with the orchestra in Bartok's posthumous Viola Concerto and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program is also to include Stravinsky's Divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fee."

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
JAN 5 - 1952

Symphony Plans Tour

New York, Jan. 4—(AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris tonight aboard a Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May.

The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring here yesterday and today with Charles Munch, the symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection contracted on tour earlier in the season.

[61]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 5 - 1952

Munch Confers in N. Y. on Plans for Trip to Europe by Symphony

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been convalescing in New York for the past several weeks, has recovered sufficiently to take part in conference regarding the Boston Symphony's trip to Europe next Spring.

This was announced yesterday at Symphony Hall, where a spokesman for the orchestra said that Mr. Munch had talked on Thursday and Friday with George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, about details of the tour. Mr. Judd flew to Paris last night to arrange final booking and other matters of the European visit under auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The orchestra will play in Paris and other cities next May.

Monitor 1/5/52

Brusilow Acclaimed in Boston Debut

Young Violinist Soloist In Tchaikovsky Concerto

By Harold Rogers

After Anshel Brusilow played the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto yesterday afternoon, the audience in Symphony Hall recalled him to the stage five times by prolonged applause.

The 21-year-old artist earned this acclaim on his Boston debut not only by his astonishing technical facility, but by a poise that enabled him to play with command. He displayed that remarkable kind of self-containment that encourages musical introspection—a subjective approach that brings out the poetry of a score. The true art of interpretation, an art that Mr. Brusilow has largely mastered, rests on this basis.

It follows that the best interpretation will be produced by an artist whose frame of mind approximates the mood experienced by the composer while creating the music. Mr. Bruslow's response to Tchaikovsky is intense, yet without cloying sentimentality. His tone is not so buttered as Isaac Stern's, neither is it so pure as that of Heifetz, but it strikes a happy medium between the two. One could not help thinking of Heifetz while Mr. Brusilow played; he has the same air of aplomb and detachment.

* * *

The Tchaikovsky concerto, for all its difficulties, has a frankly popular appeal. It is a safe vehicle for an artist who is launching a career. Audiences today, wherever they are, could hardly agree with Hanslick's opinion, rendered after the 1881 première in Vienna, that it is music that "stinks in the ear." The concerto's lyrical tunes stick in the ear, if anything, and pleasantly so.

Mr. Brusilow played the Canzonetta with a delightful insouciance. He rippled through the pizzicato theme of the Finale with breathtaking ease and accuracy. Apparently there is no problem in this concerto that Mr. Brusilow has not solved—be it the pitching of harmonics or the bowing of the first-movement cadenza.

The young artist is a native of Philadelphia. He studied for three years with Zimbalist at the Curtis Institute and later with Jani Szanto at the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

Ernest Ansermet, now in his fourth week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during Charles Munch's absence, opened the concert with another of his excellent readings from the classical repertoire—this time one of Haydn's 12 London symphonies, the C minor, No. 95.

Mr. Ansermet has a way of letting the music proceed in its own elegant and stately fashion, without unnecessary coercion. Samuel Mayes gave the cello solo of the Trio section in the Menuetto a pleasing performance, though he has played better.

* * *

The program this week also includes the suite that Hindemith extracted from his ballet, "Saint Francis," written on commission from the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Titled "Nobilissima Visione," it is cast in the neo-medieval style that Hindemith has made his trade-mark and is thus eminently appropriate to the subject—a story that deals with Francis's renunciation of wealth and his "marriage with poverty." Mr. Ansermet performed this work in the same scholarly manner that he played the Haydn, but the final passacaglia could have been developed into a more rousing climax.

The conductor concluded with a dashing presentation of Falla's three dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos." One wag remarked afterwards that if he were asked how to cut a few corners, he'd begin with the three on Falla's hat.

But I'm partial to Spanish music.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1952

MUSIC

ymphony Concert

BY RUDOLPH ELIE

gram or to Mr. Ansermet's limpid interpretation of Haydn's Symphony No. 95, which is, like virtually every symphony I ever heard, a miracle of invention and serene surety of purpose. Samuel Mayes did the enchanting trio of the minuet superbly, to make the whole a delight from beginning to end.

It also leaves little room to discuss in suitable detail the beauties of Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," a ballet suite that seems to me to represent the best in contemporary orchestral textures and moods. I am more and more convinced that our younger composers went astray in not more perfectly assimilating Hindemith's style and going on from there rather than from the horridly sterile school presided over by Nadia Boulanger et al. This, as indeed the entire program concluding with Falla's entertaining dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," was superbly set forth by Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra.

There will be another soloist next week, William Primrose, viola.

WILLIAM PRIMROSE will play his Stradivarius viola (one of 12 in existence) as soloist at the Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal Wednesday night.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. REPUBLICAN

JAN 5 1952

...Mr. Brusilow has a ...od many orchestra appearances ...e the quality of his ...s largely unknown here ... afternoon when the ...oloist walked onto ...do the Tchaikovsky, ...familiar to us all that ...ortine traversal would ...ittle impression. In- ...anticipated was the ... appearance that, as in ... of Mlle. de la Bruchol- ...othing but a veritable ...would have saved the day. ...Brusilow's feat, conse- ...must rank with the minor ... wonders. For from his ...rance he not only demon- ...d that prodigious technique ...nowadays, so commonly ...ired but went on to ... technical wonders that ...ave pause to the most emi- ...oloistic celebrities of the ... In fact, I cannot recall ...ever heard Mr. Brusilow's ... ments with what is known ... "flying staccato," a series ... formed either on the ... down bow in one stroke. ... is especially to be noted ... ease of the first move- ... he does it in the down ... which is generally considered ... difficult maneuver. But ... seems no technical accom- ... with the bow that he ... not master, though to re- ... in here would be tedious. ... his fingerboard tech- ... every way the equal ... it is in the long run ... that counts—and most ... it's the way to the fu-

ANOTHER POINTER to the ... this violinist's case is ... original and very musi- ... ian. It would seem that ... day could find anything ... with the Tchaikovsky, ... Many did. Admitted, ... his phrasing and in ... effects he erred away ... side of the best of taste ... we admit too much ... to begin with?). Yet ... of devotion, I think, ... out of any motive of ... really, as in all cases ... to first appear here ... the Philadelphia Orchestra, re- ... nestra, I reserve a ... ected judgment to a ... But I have the notion ... ung violinist, doing a ... avier music for the ... demonstrate a matu- ... al insight that well ... me, even exceed his ... capabilities.

... a little to devote ... things on the pro-

Views on the News

Boston Symphony Abroad

While the appearance of a symphony orchestra may be as personal as a shipment of arms, or consignments of food, clothing and gold, the visit of the Boston Symphony to European cities next spring will serve at least to indicate their what progress has been made musically in the country, as to the growth and advance of which many inhabitants of the continent are still in the dark. The Boston orchestra will have only a limited time abroad, leaving late in April and returning by June 1.

Two or four concerts will be given in Paris, among others by a number of selected groups appearing under the sponsorship of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The month-long exposition of the arts at the French metropolis is to embrace many fields, and the United States will be represented in ballet, opera and painting, with prominent American literary figures taking part in a series of lectures and forums.

With both Charles Munch, the regular leader, and Pierre Monteux, who once held the same position, available to conduct, the Boston Symphony will also be heard in Holland and Belgium and at Strasbourg and Zurich. Strasbourg was Mr. Mun... hometown, as Paris was Mr. ... ...oux's, so the brief tour will be ... the nature of a homecoming for both ... these eminent men now so ... known to American audiences. Their ... programs are to include American as ... well as European music, reminding ... listeners that while this country has ... enjoyed its foreign musical her... it has at the same time de... to some extent a creative ... tradition of its own.

... Eugene Ormandy, conductor ... the Philadelphia Orchestra, re... from Europe early in the ... after having visited major or... mental cities. ... expressed the hope that the cause ... and good will ... be advanced by European con... ...ing American ... could be arranged. He ... the New York ... which gave ... last sum... conceded to be one of ... in this country.

... Through ... its Tanglewood ... to Spring... Boston Symphony has come ... in this end of the ... a feeling of possession. ... Koussevitzky long ... the hope of returning to ... capitals of the Old ... of the superlative ... had brought to its zen... ...e is a certain sadness in ... realization that its first such ... tour, of which its guiding genius ... dreamed for half a lifetime, will ... have come to pass within a year ... after he had been laid to rest in an old New England churchyard.

This Clipping From
RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
JAN 5 - 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY MANAGER OFF TO PARIS TO PLAN TOUR.

NEW YORK, Jan. 4 (AP).—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, left for Paris tonight aboard an Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May. The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

This Clipping From
CAROLINA TIMES
DURHAM, N. C.
JAN 5 - 1952

SYMPHONY SLATES PARIS APPEARANCE

NEW YORK — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, it is announced today by Nicholas Nabokov, Secretary-General of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28th and will last through the month of May.

Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invitmed his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression. To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the feilds of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

Primrose to Play Bartók

Next week will be an active one for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet, who is at the orchestra's helm during Charles Munch's continued absence, will conduct the fourth program in the Tuesday evening series, the third public rehearsal on Wednesday evening, and the twelfth pair of concerts in the longer series on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 11 and 12.

William Primrose, the noted English violist, will be the soloist for the week-end concerts in Symphony Hall. He will give the first Boston performance of Béla Bartók's Posthumous Concerto for Viola and Orchestra. Bartók wrote this score for Mr. Primrose.

The program will open with the Berlioz "Harold in Italy," for which Mr. Primrose will also play the solo part, and will close with Stravinsky's Divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fée." The Stravinsky work is drawn from a ballet which he composed in the style of Tchaikovsky.

Only the sketch for the Bartók Viola Concerta was completed at the time of the composer's passing. The work has been filled out by Bartók's pupil, Tibor Serly, and performed in this country and abroad by Mr. Primrose.

Mr. Primrose will also play these works at the Boston Symphony's public rehearsal on Wednesday evening, to be held in Symphony Hall at 7:30. At this time music students and any others who are interested may observe Mr. Ansermet's methods in working with the orchestra. His rehearsal will also include Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fée." Seats are available and may be purchased on the night of the rehearsal.

Aldo Ciccolini, the young Italian pianist who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, will be the soloist for the concert Tuesday evening. He will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. Mr. Ansermet will open the program with Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde." The rest of the program will consist of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite (complete) and the first and fourth parts of Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

* * *

Judges for the final auditions were Irving Kolodin, music editor of the Saturday Review of Literature; Wallace Magill, production director of the Bell Telephone Hour, and Miss Thebom.

Miss Spector, a native of Brooklyn, sang the role of Ariadne in the Berkshire Music Festival's production of "Ariadne auf Naxos" at Tanglewood last summer. She has also appeared in minor roles with the New York City Opera and as Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni" with the New England Opera Company.

* * *

Munch Discusses Tour

For the past two days Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager, have conferred concerning the Boston Symphony's first European tour in May. Last night Mr. Judd left New York, where the conferences took place, and flew to Paris, where he will work out the many details involved in caring for 104 musicians while on tour.

* * *

[62]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 5 - 1952

OFF TO PARIS TO PLAN SYMPHONY'S VISIT

NEW YORK, Jan. 4 (AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris tonight by plane to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May.

The visit, under auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring here yesterday and today with Charles Munch, the Symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection contracted on tour earlier in the season.

Monitor 1/5/52

Brusilow Acclaimed in Boston Debut

Young Violinist Soloist In Tchaikovsky Concerto

By Harold Rogers

After Anshel Brusilow played the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto yesterday afternoon, the audience in Symphony Hall recalled him to the stage five times by prolonged applause.

The 21-year-old artist earned this acclaim on his Boston debut not only by his astonishing technical facility, but by a poise that enabled him to play with command. He displayed that remarkable kind of self-containment that encourages musical introspection—a subjective approach that brings out the poetry of a score. The true art of interpretation, an art that Mr. Brusilow has largely mastered, rests on this basis.

It follows that the best interpretation will be produced by an artist whose frame of mind approximates the mood experienced by the composer while creating the music. Mr. Bruslow's response to Tchaikovsky is intense, yet without cloying sentimentality. His tone is not so buttered as Isaac Stern's, neither is it so pure as that of Heifetz, but it strikes a happy medium between the two. One could not help thinking of Heifetz while Mr. Brusilow played; he has the same air of aplomb and detachment.

♪ ♪ ♪

The Tchaikovsky concerto, for all its difficulties, has a frankly popular appeal. It is a safe vehicle for an artist who is launching a career. Audiences today, wherever they are, could hardly agree with Hanslick's opinion, rendered after the 1881 première in Vienna, that it is music that "stinks in the ear." The concerto's lyrical tunes stick in the ear, if anything, and pleasantly so.

Mr. Brusilow played the Canzonetta with a delightful insouciance. He rippled through the pizzicato theme of the Finale with breathtaking ease and accuracy. Apparently there is no problem in this concerto that Mr. Brusilow has not solved—be it the pitching of harmonics or the bowing of the first-movement cadenza.

The young artist is a native of Philadelphia. He studied for three years with Zimbalist at the Curtis Institute and later with Jani Szanto at the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

Ernest Ansermet, now in his fourth week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony during Charles Munch's absence, opened the concert with another of his excellent readings from the classical repertoire—this time one of Haydn's 12 London symphonies, the C minor, No. 95.

Mr. Ansermet has a way of letting the music proceed in its own elegant and stately fashion, without unnecessary coercion. Samuel Mayes gave the cello solo of the Trio section in the Menuetto a pleasing performance, though he has played better.

♪ ♪ ♪

The program this week also includes the suite that Hindemith extracted from his ballet, "Saint Francis," written on commission from the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Titled "Nobilissima Visione," it is cast in the neo-medieval style that Hindemith has made his trade-mark and is thus eminently appropriate to the subject—a story that deals with Francis's renunciation of wealth and his "marriage with poverty." Mr. Ansermet performed this work in the same scholarly manner that he played the Haydn, but the final passacaglia could have been developed into a more rousing climax.

The conductor concluded with a dashing presentation of Falla's three dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos." One wag remarked afterwards that if he were asked how to cut a few corners, he'd begin with the three on Falla's hat.

But I'm partial to Spanish music.

...TURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By Rudolph Elie

...gram, or to Mr. Ansermet's limpid interpretation of Haydn's Symphony No. 95, which is, like virtually every symphony I ever heard, a miracle of invention and serene surety of purpose. Samuel Mayes did the enchanting trio of the minuet superbly, to make the whole a delight from beginning to end.

It also leaves little room to discuss in suitable detail the beauties of Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," a ballet suite that seems to me to represent the best in contemporary orchestral textures and moods. I am more and more convinced that our younger composers went astray in not more perfectly assimilating Hindemith's style and going on from there rather than from the horridly sterile school presided over by Nadia Boulanger et al. This, as indeed the entire program concluding with Falla's entertaining dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," was superbly set forth by Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra.

There will be another soloist next week, William Primrose, violist, who will do "Harold in Italy" as well as Bartok's great Concerto for Viola and orchestra. Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" completes the program.

WILLIAM PRIMROSE will play his Stradivarius viola (one of 12 in existence) as soloist at the Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal Wednesday night.

...debutantes ... which is to ... Bruenollerie. Miss ... Brusilow who ... most spectacular suc-

...Mr. Brusilow has a ... orchestra appearances ... the quality of his ... largely unknown here ... afternoon when the ... nist walked onto ... do the Tchaikovsky, ... miliar to us all that ... traversal would ... the impression. In- ... anticipated was the ... pearance that, as in ... Mme. de la Bruchol- ... ing her a veritable ... could have saved the day. ... Brusilow's feat, conse- ... must rank with the minor ... wonders. For from his ... rance he not only demon- ... that prodigious technique ... nowadays, so commonly ... but went on to ... nical wonders that ... pause to the most emi- ... master celebrities of the ... fact, I cannot recall ... heard Mr. Brusilow's ... with what is known ... ing staccato," a series ... performed either on the ... down bow in one stroke. ... effect is especially to be noted ... cadenza of the first move- ... he does it in the down ... is generally considered ... difficult maneuver. But ... no technical accom- ... with the bow that he ... master, though to re- ... here would be tedious, ... his fingerboard tech- ... in every way the equa ... ing, it is in the long run ... that counts—and most ... is the way to the fu-

ANOTHER POINTER to the ... in this violinist's case is ... original and very musi- ... It would seem that ... day could find anything ... the Tchaikovsky, ... ably did. Admitted, ... its phrasing and in ... effects he erred away ... both of the best of taste ... we admit too much ... to begin with?). Yet ... of devotion, I think, ... out of any motive of ... naturally, as in all cases. ... who first appear here ... chestra, I reserve a ... ered judgment to a ... but I have the notion ... ing violinist, doing a ... xier music for the ... demonstrate a matu- ... sical insight that well ... me even exceed his ... capabilities.

... leaves little to ... things on the p...

This Clipping From
RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
JAN 5 - 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY MANAGER OFF TO PARIS TO PLAN TOUR.

NEW YORK, Jan. 4 (AP).—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, left for Paris tonight aboard an Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May. The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

...e News

Boston ...

While the appearance of a symphony orchestra ... to be as personal ... consignments of food, clothing and ... gold, the visit of the Boston Symphony to Europe ... cities next spring will serve at least to indicate ... what progress has been made musically in this country, as to the growth and advance of which many inhabitants of the continent are still in the dark. The Boston orchestra will have only a limited time abroad, leaving late in April and returning by June 1.

Three or four concerts will be given in Paris, among others by a number of celebrated groups appearing under the sponsorship of the Congress for ... dom. The month-long exposition of the arts at the French metropolis is to embrace many fields, and the United States will be represented in ballet, opera and painting, with prominent American literary figures taking part in a series of lectures and forums.

With both Charles Munch, the regular leader, and Pierre Monteux, who once held the same position, available to conduct, the Boston Symphony will also be heard in Holland and Belgium and at Strasbourg and Zurich. Strasbourg was Mr. Mu... birthplace, as Paris was Mr. ...teux's, so the brief tour will be ... the nature of a homecoming for both ... these eminent men now so well known to American audiences. Their programs are to include American as well as European music, reminding listeners that while this country has long enjoyed its foreign musical heritage it has at the same time developed to some extent a creative musical tradition of its own.

When Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, returned from Europe early in the fall after having directed major orchestras on several continental cities, he expressed the view that the cause of international amity and good will could be advanced if European conductions for the leading American ... record as a guest. He ... the New York ... which gave ... at sum... ... to be one of ... this coun... ... go. Through ... to Spring... ... this end of the ... Sergei Koussevitzky long- ... hope of returning to ... capitals of the Old ... of the superlative ... brought to its zen... ... a certain sadness in ... that its first such ... of which its guiding genius ... dreamed for half a lifetime, will ... have come to pass within a year after he had been laid to rest in an old New England churchyard.

This Clipping From
CAROLINA TIMES
DURHAM, N. C.
JAN 5- 1952

SYMPHONY SLATES PARIS APPEARANCE

NEW YORK — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring, it is announced today by Nicholas Nabokov, Secretary-General of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States a month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28th and will last through the month of May.

Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invitmed his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression. To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the feilds of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

Primrose to Play Bartók

Next week will be an active one for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ernest Ansermet, who is at the orchestra's helm during Charles Munch's continued absence, will conduct the fourth program in the Tuesday evening series, the third public rehearsal on Wednesday evening, and the twelfth pair of concerts in the longer series on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 11 and 12.

William Primrose, the noted English violist, will be the soloist for the week-end concerts in Symphony Hall. He will give the first Boston performance of Béla Bartók's Posthumous Concerto for Viola and Orchestra. Bartók wrote this score for Mr. Primrose.

The program will open with the Berlioz "Harold in Italy," for which Mr. Primrose will also play the solo part, and will close with Stravinsky's Divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fée." The Stravinsky work is drawn from a ballet which he composed in the style of Tchaikovsky.

Only the sketch for the Bartók Viola Concerta was completed at the time of the composer's passing. The work has been filled out by Bartók's pupil, Tibor Serly, and performed in this country and abroad by Mr. Primrose.

Mr. Primrose will also play these works at the Boston Symphony's public rehearsal on Wednesday evening, to be held in Symphony Hall at 7:30. At this time music students and any others who are interested may observe Mr. Ansermet's methods in working with the orchestra. His rehearsal will also include Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fée." Seats are available and may be purchased on the night of the rehearsal.

Aldo Ciccolini, the young Italian pianist who made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season, will be the soloist for the concert Tuesday evening. He will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. Mr. Ansermet will open the program with Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde." The rest of the program will consist of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite (complete) and the first and fourth parts of Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

♪ ♪ ♪

Judges for the final auditions were Irving Kolodin, music editor of the Saturday Review of Literature; Wallace Magill, production director of the Bell Telephone Hour, and Miss Thebom.

Miss Spector, a native of Brooklyn, sang the role of Ariadne in the Berkshire Music Festival's production of "Ariadne auf Naxos" at Tanglewood last summer. She has also appeared in minor roles with the New York City Opera and as Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni" with the New England Opera Company.

♪ ♪ ♪

Munch Discusses Tour

For the past two days Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager, have conferred concerning the Boston Symphony's first European tour in May. Last night Mr. Judd left New York, where the conferences took place, and flew to Paris, where he will work out the many details involved in caring for 104 musicians while on tour.

♪ ♪ ♪

[62]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 5 - 1952

OFF TO PARIS TO PLAN SYMPHONY'S VISIT

NEW YORK, Jan. 4 (AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris tonight by plane to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May.

The visit, under auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring here yesterday and today with Charles Munch, the Symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection contracted on tour earlier in the season.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 5 - 1952

MUSIC

Anshel Brusilow Plays Tchaikovsky Work With Symphony in Local Debut

By CYRUS DURGIN

Anshel Brusilow, a remarkable 21-year-old violinist from Philadelphia, made his Boston debut yesterday afternoon as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Concerto of Tchaikovsky. Ernest Ansermet opened the program with the C Minor Symphony, No. 95, by Haydn, and further included the "Nobilissima Visione" of Hindemith and Three Dances from Manuel De Falla's Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Considered purely as a technician, young Mr. Brusilow is formidably equipped. All the devices of the fiddler's kit, from uncanny accuracy in the highest positions to clean harmonics and finger work of the utmost neatness, Mr. Brusilow has in abundance. He is an amazingly accurate player, and he also has a scout and fraceful bowing arm. His tone is relatively small and thin, but pleasant and of sufficient carrying power in a large hall.

At 21, Mr. Brusilow is on the threshold of what may be a brilliant career. Yet, what sort of a musician does he promise to become? That cannot be answered on the evidence of one performance of the Tchaikovsky Concerto, music of negligible substance beneath a vivid exterior. Mr. Brusilow played this score, which demands a broad and rhapsodic style with more refinement than I ever have heard before. He cut it down to a miniature, so that Mr. Ansermet's accompaniment, reasonably solid, seemed far too big by contrast.

In the finale Mr. Brusilow ran away with the tempo, going so fast that the figurations were blurred and the orchestra, valiantly keeping up with him, sounded almost like a scramble. Mr. Ansermet never did get the lead back, and it seemed as if the final chord was over almost before his stick took its final downward plunge. Perhaps Mr. Brusilow was nervous, for a certain emotional uneasiness hung over the whole Concerto. As he grows in experience and understanding, perhaps he will grow also as a musician. At any rate, Mr. Brusilow is highly talented, and yesterday received a notably cordial response when he had finished.

Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," the concert suite which he drew from his ballet "Saint Francis," had not been heard at these concerts since Richard Burgin introduced it nearly nine years ago. Written much in the idiom of "Mathis der Maler," the suite is somewhat diffuse compared to that earlier masterpiece of condensation. But over it all is that sheen of orchestral richness which Hindemith commands more than most composers of the day, and under the incessant restlessness of the figuration and the dissonant counterpoint, is true and abiding emotional feeling.

Mr. Ansermet's conducting of Haydn's mature Symphony was a masterpiece of correct speed, dynamics, nuances and phrasing. From first movement to last, here was Haydn conducting of pure, unblemished beauty. Falla's Dances, with their warm Iberian glow, and under Mr. Ansermet's painstaking direction, provided a vivacious ending to an absorbing concert.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 7 - 1952

Wednesday New Date Of Open Rehearsal

The Boston Symphony has announced that the Open Rehearsal scheduled to take place in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening has been transferred to Wednesday evening at 7:30. William Primrose, famed violist, is the soloist in Berlioz' "Harold In Italy." Mr. Primrose will play on an instrument that is one of only 12 Stradivarius violas in the world, and the audience will also have the opportunity of watching Ernest Ansermet shaping up the orchestral performance for Friday's regular concert.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 6 - 1952

Music Notes

Two American orchestras will probably give concerts in Europe during the late Spring. The Boston Symphony has accepted an invitation to appear at the Paris exposition of the arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. This month-long exposition, to take place in May, will also feature performances by the New York City Ballet Company. The Boston orchestra, making its first trip abroad, plans three concerts in Paris, two to be conducted by Charles Munch, one by Pierre Monteux. It will be heard also in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Zurich. The entire tour will last for only two weeks, as the orchestra must be back in Boston by June 1 for a condensed season of "Pops" concerts.

The other organization is the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy. Its proposed junket will consist of three weeks of European concerts. Paris, Bordeaux, Belgium and Holland will be visited by this group, with other concerts planned for Denmark, Sweden, Finland and Italy.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 6 - 1952

Boston Symphony To Tour Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Europe this spring at the invitation of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The 104 musicians, under the direction of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, will give three concerts in Paris in May. The orchestra, during its fortnight abroad, plans to play also in Holland, Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Zurich and in Western Germany and Austria, under the same auspices.

The initial concert will be a gala event conducted by Mr. Munch, who will also direct the final appearance. Mr. Monteux will take the baton for the second concert, which will be in the afternoon. The orchestra will leave for Europe immediately after the close of its Boston season on April 25 and return by June 1 for its members to participate in the annual "Pops" concerts.

The month-long exposition of the arts will open in Paris on April 28 and continue through May. It will be a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression, included in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

Appearing also during the festival will be the Vienna State Opera in Berg's "Wozzeck," the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R. I. A. S. Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romade, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National of Paris; the New York City Ballet Co., and an all-Negro company which will perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
JAN 7 - 1952

Boston Symphony Invited To Tour Europe in May

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, Jan. 6—From teen-age to septuagenarians, Saturday is America's date night. Real New Yorkers make a point of attending only home parties on Sat'day. They wouldn't be caught dead in a restaurant, nightclub or theater the night when local yokels, visiting firemen or strangers come to do the town. Sat'day night in Boston is symphony night. In the three weeks I spent convalescing in Beantown I went twice to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch, regular conductor, has been ill for over a month, so I heard guest conductors Pierre Monteux of the famed San Francisco Symphony and also Ernest Ansermet of Geneva, Switzerland.

Alice Hughes

The night Monteux conducted, his wife sat two seats away from me and dozed through several passages of Wagner's Parsifal and Debussy's Gigue. Who hasn't nodded now and then at concerts? But henceforth I shall do so less guiltily. When Ansermet conducted, he did something I have seen Milton Berle and other vaudevillians do, but never a dignified orchestra leader. Tall, white-headed and bearded, he turned full-front on the late-comers straggling to their seats, glowered and his lips and jaws moved and his beard bobbed as if he were calling them unpleasant names under his breath. (Which he should have!) Either that or he was counting the house, though why I don't know. It was full as always.

The 104 players of the Boston Symphony are elated because they are invited by the Congress for Cultural Freedom to give concerts in Paris, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and Switzerland, next May. Most of the musicians have foreign roots and are happy for this chance to go abroad. Director Munch will help with the conducting chores of Monteuz and the band is a little puffed up because, once again, they have been honored beyond other orchestras. It was the late Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony leader for years, whose sense of dramatic programming and showmanship lifted this musical group to the popular ne plus ultra of symphonic orchestras.

On the day this European music tour was announced, Hungary released our captured American Army fliers. The Boston bandsmen were so sure that Soviet Russia was masquerading behind the Hungarian imprisonment that they doctored up an old joke to fit the case. My French brother-in-law who fiddles with the Boston came home and told it to us: "One Englishman drinks whisky-and-soda. Two Americans talk business. Three Germans rehash the war, and —four Russians are the Budapest string quartet."

Copyright, 1952, King Features Synd., Inc.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ernest Ansermet, who is substitute for Charles Munch at the Symphony concerts, has fallen heir to a considerable portion of the soloists. Prior to this week's concerts he had accompanied the pianist, Monique de La Bruchollerie; the violinist, Michael Rabin, and the cellist, Zara Nelsova. This week he performs that function for a new violinist, Anshel Brusilow, and next week that master of the viola, William Primrose; while the pianist, Aldo Ciccolini plays at the concert of next Tuesday evening.

Mr. Brusilow came to us without much heralding, but made an immediately favorable impression. He is in his 21st year; was born in Philadelphia, and has received his training in this country. One thinks of Mischa Elman as having the right size and quality of tone for the Tchaikovsky Concerto, with which Mr. Brusilow elected to introduce himself, and judged by that particular standard, Mr. Brusilow's tone is light, not quite rich enough for the first movement nor heavy enough for the last. However, it is an excellent tone of its kind, with a good deal of "ping" to it. Mr. Brusilow has virtuoso blood in his veins, and yesterday's audience received him with marked enthusiasm. Some of the stock concertos are being worked to death, but the new artists, especially, seem unwilling to take a chance on the less familiar ones. At least Mr. Primrose will give us something really interesting, the posthumous Concerto of Bartok, as completed by Tibor Serly.

Speaking of familiar things, the C minor Symphony of Haydn, No. 95, is one of those we have heard frequently of late, while others of the London Symphonies, not to mention some of the earlier ones, have been badly neglected. If not one of the best, the C minor is still excellent Haydn, and the bold opening theme of the first movement suggests Beethoven. The Symphony was well performed and well received on this occasion, and Mr. Ansermet had first cellist, Samuel Mayes, take a bow at the a end for his solo in the the minuet.

Yesterday we had our hearing of the Concert Suite Hindemith's Ballet, "St. Fr which bears the title "Nob Visione." When Richard Burgin closed the Suite to us nine ago you had the feeling that action of the ballet was necessary in order to explain a good deal the music, though the composer thinks otherwise, and you also aware of certain disparate resemblances to Hindemith (and far more important der Maler." There was no to revise these opinions. Hindemith is one of the most prolific of composers, but he repeats himself stylistically, idiomatically, and thematically, more than any of others, at least among those comparable stature. A rousing formance of the Dances from ballet, "The Three-Cornered brought the concert to a close.

ONE OF MUSIC'S RAREST TREASURES is this Stradivari viola, one of only 12 in existence, shown with Scottish viola virtuoso William Primrose. He will be soloist with Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday, Jan. 11-12, and the Jan. 9th Wednesday evening "open rehearsal." Although there are 540 violins by the great maker on record, his violas are limited to a dozen. This instrument's magnificent tone is as well known among musicians as the voice of a great singer. Boston Globe 1/5/52

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
JAN 7 - 1952

Public Rehearsal

Wednesday at 7:30, the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be open to the public. It will then be possible for music students and all interested to observe Ernest Ansermet working with the orchestra, which he is conducting this week in the continued absence of Charles Munch, the regular Music Director. It is expected that William Primrose, the soloist of the week, will be rehearsing at this time. Primrose is to appear with the orchestra in Bartok's posthumous Viola Concerto, and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program is also to include Stravinsky's Divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fe his sold in the trio of rnet.

rday we had our second s of the Concert Suite from mith's Ballet, "St. Francis," bears the title "Nobilissima
e." When Richard Burgin dis-the Suite to us nine years ou had the feeling that the of the ballet was necessary ler to explain a good deal of usic, though the composer otherwise, and you were ware of certain disquieting lances to Hindemith's earlier far more important) "Mathis Maler." There was no need ise these opinions. Hindemith of the most prolific of modern sers, but he repeats himself ically, idiomatically, and even tically, more than any of the
at least among those of rable stature. A rousing perce of the Dances for Falla's
"The Three-Cornered Hat"
t the concert to a close.

(Nilsson Photo

EASURES is this existence, shown am Primrose. He phony Friday and
n. 9th Wednesday
ugh there are 540
record, his violas trument's magnifi-musicians as the
lbb. 1/5/52

hearsing at this time.
s to appear with the n Bartok's posthumous ncerto and Berlioz'
Italy." The program is Stravinsky's Di-
Baiser de la Fee."

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS

This Clipping From
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE

Monteux to Paris Festival

Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony, in association with Charles Munch, at the Paris Exposition of the Congress for Cultural Freedom next May.

The exhibition, lasting from April 28 through May, will also feature the New York City Ballet, Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna State Opera, Santa Cecilia Academy orchestra and chorus of Rome, West Berlin Radio orchestra, Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, Paris Conservatory and French National Orchestras. Events will include an art exhibition covering highlights of modern painting in America and Europe, to be assembled by James J. Sweeney, former director of New York Museum of Modern Art.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct ballets. Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," to the Gertrude Stein text, is scheduled for performance by an all-Negro company.

The Paris appearance will be part of a Boston Symphony tour including Holland, Belgium, France, Austria and Switzerland.

The exposition will also include lectures by American and European authors and philosophers.

...ducting his cherished dream. It is true that Koussevitzky made a finish of tone, but that tone, and the clean, the dazzling virtuosity that went with it, made the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky unique in the annals of art. Other conductors, other ways, and other virtues. But what our friends overseas will hear next spring will more closely resemble that to which they are already accustomed than would have been the case if Koussevitzky had been able to go as the head of the orchestra that he so justly regarded as his very own. By a curious coincidence, Mr. Ansermet will also appear as conductor at the Paris Festival, which the Congress for Cultural Freedom will sponsor from April 28 through May 31, but it will be as leader of his regular organization, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, of Geneva, not the Boston Symphony, to which he is now rendering such signal ser...

The New York Story

Alice Hughes

...from Boston to spring... America's dau... Saturday Red Sox Yorkers make a ... home ... part ... Thursday ... when ... look ... ing from ... strangers ... town ... Saturday ... dark night in Boston ... symphony ... there ... sport ... ing in Boston ... Bear the Boston ... Charles ... or has been ... Pierre Monteux ... Ansermet ...

Alice Hughes

The 104 players of the Boston Symphony are elated because they are invited by the Congress for Cultural Freedom to give concerts in Paris, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and Switzerland, next May. Most of the musicians have foreign roots, and are happy for this chance to go abroad. Director Munch will help with the conducting chores of Monteux, and the band is a little puffed up because, once again, they have been honored beyond other orchestras. It was the late Koussevitzky, Boston symphony leader for years, whose sense of dramatic programming and showmanship lifted this musical group to the popular ne plus ultra of symphonic orchestras.

On the day this European music tour was announced, Hungary released our captured American army fliers. The Boston bandsmen were so sure that Soviet Russia was masquerading behind the Hungarian imprisonment that they doctored up an old joke to fit the case. My French brother-in-law who fiddles with the Boston came home and told it to us: "One Englishman drinks whiskey-and-soda. Two Americans talk business. Three Germans rehash the war, and—four Russians are the Budapest string quartet."

One of the distinctions of the Boston symphony is the first-time appearance of guest artists who subsequently become famous and in demand thereafter. The night Ansermet conducted he pulled a switch which delighted the band and the audience by introducing Boston to a composition by a fellow Swiss, Frank Martin, whose exciting "Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments" called for seven solos. Ansermet had these played by the band's own members instead of calling in outsiders. Also he invited a lady cellist, Zara Nelsova, to play for the first time with the Boston band. She chose Dvorak's B Minor Concerto and music critics called her the foremost woman cellist for the day and—the equal of any male cellist!

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

JAN 7 - 1952

Boston Orchestra Set For First European Tour Next Spring

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it is announced by Nicolas Nabokov, Secretary-General of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is timed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression. To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century", will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

IN other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts"; as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St Theater in New York in 1934. In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 1st symphony season in Symphony Hall, on April 25. Since must return by June 1 for the nual "Pops" concerts in which ost of its personnel participates this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans also during its fortnight abroad to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Austria, and in Zurich.

SINCE Charles Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak of national—and through its broadcasts and recordings, international—renown to which it was brought in the 25 years of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

The conductor's introduction to audiences in the United States occurred a year prior to his being awarded his coveted post, when he toured America as leader of the French radio orchestra, l'Orchestra National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise. It was under Mr. Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the state visit of President Vincent Auriol of France, a gesture which won for him and the orchestra the French president's warm invitation to bring the Boston Symphony to France.

Pierre Monteux, Mr. Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the organization since its founding in 1881. Paris-born, with a distinguished musical background in that city, Mr. Monteux came here first with the Ballet Russe of Diaghilev, and after serving a term with the Metropolitan Opera, became the Boston's conductor from 1919 to 1924. He is at present, and until mid-April, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Longhairs Score

But when the two sets of timpanis got started the boys perked up a bit. Jees, they said, what's that? Suddenly the whole percussion section of the orchestra opened up: the noise was indescribable. And the boys, expressions of dismay on their faces, unlatched their jaws and listened in wonder. By the time the girl had danced herself to death in the Stravinsky music, they were flabbergasted. Do you mean to say, they cried, that a long hair did THAT?

We said yes, and nearly 40 years ago at that. Jeez, they said, wagging their heads, even Stan Kenton doesn't sound like that. We don't get it.

Well, they added, we've got to go now, but how about playing one more side of the Benny Goodman just to clear the atmosphere? Sure, we said, go ahead. So they played one more side, regaining their shattered composure by stamping and shaking out the rhythms, and presently marched out into the night. Score one, we thought to ourself, as they went out to hang around the corner awhile, for the longhairs.

[64]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 6 - 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Flamadiddles And Igor Stravinsky

We were sitting around the other night in the blessed peace of an evening at home, congratulating ourself on having survived the season, when the doorbell rang and in marched a bunch of the 15-year-old boys of the neighborhood bearing armfuls of records. Hi, they said in easy camaraderie, we hear you've got a new phonograph that's a knockout and can we try these records out on it?

Flushed with the pride of ownership and never being reluctant to listen to music any time, we said sure, come on it. The boys, whom we had seen shoot up almost overnight from little kids running around in cowboy suits with cap pistols barking a deadly staccato to tall, skinny adolescents with a mixture of fuzz and skin eruptions on their cheeks, deployed around the room candidly studying the furniture, the pictures, the books and the records. Longhair stuff, said one, pulling out an LP folder and hastily pushing it back in. His tone wasn't reproachful.

What have you got there? we inquired, indicating the records they'd brought in. They said they were mostly Benny Goodman records they'd got for Christmas, and how do you work this thing?

We set the phonograph up for them, it not being anywhere near as formidable as it looked, and presently there resounded through the house the most preposterous racket we've ever heard. It was, it turned out, a disc entitled "Jazz at Carnegie Hall," recorded by Benny Goodman in 1938 but reissued as an LP. The boys explained it had come from a wire recording of the whole session and contained, in consequence, all the audience noises as well. Turn it up full blast, they said, we want to really live it.

Frantic Cascade

So we turned it up full blast to produce as deafening a torrent of sound as was ever heard anywhere; we figured we might as well really live it too. And out of the machine there issued a frantic cascade of notes from Benny Goodman's clarinet while Harry James (for so they identified him) blew outrageous figures on the trumpet and the others of the band, clearly augmented for the occasion, added to the organized chaos. But it was the drummer who had the boys by the ears. Wow! they cried, their eyes glazed over with the driving excitement of the rhythms and sounds he produced, get that!

They couldn't sit still. One of them was nodding his head and beating time with both feet. Another, whose feet were going, too, was tapping out a vehement accompaniment on the cocktail table. Still another, his jaw unlatched, was clapping out a fierce off-beat. They were possessed by the drums; each unexpected change of pace, each variation of the rhythmic patterns, each explosive crash of the cymbal brought exclamations of mingled rapture and amazement. Brother, they'd yip, is he cool! (It was not until somewhat later that we learned cool means hot nowadays.)

We listened to about a half hour of this while the jumpy connoisseurs of the drums hurled such words as "paradiddle," "flam-madiddle," "rataplan," and "bongo" around with reverent ferocity, meantime arguing over the relative merits of Gene Krupa, Lionel Hampton and Buddy Rich. Then, during a split-second pause in the uproar, we ventured to suggest that if they really wanted to live some drumming, we'd oblige them with one of our favorites. Yeah? they said, suspicious but interested. What?

You wait and see, we said, drawing the new Pierre Monteux-Boston Symphony orchestra recording of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" out of the collection. We put it on the phonograph, designed by Richard Stedman to handle about as wide a spread of cycles as practical in a home outfit, advanced the volume even more than it was already, and sat back to observe the effect. At the sound of the bassoon in the highest register the boys exchanged glances suggesting they would submit to this outrageous bore out of courtesy for the use of the hall.

...sold in the trio of ...et.

...day we had our second ... of the Concert Suite from ...ith's Ballet, "St. Francis," ...bears the title "Nobilissima ..." When Richard Burgin dis... the Suite to us nine years ...ou had the feeling that the ... of the ballet was necessary ...er to explain a good deal of ...music, though the composer ... otherwise, and you were ...ware of certain disquieting ...balances to Hindemith's earlier ...(far more important) "Mathis ...ialer." There was no need ...ise these opinions. Hindemith ... of the most prolific of modern ...sers, but he repeats himself ...ically, idiomatically, and even ...tically, more than any of the ... at least among those of ...rable stature. A rousing per...ce of the Dances for Falla's ..."The Three-Cornered Hat," ...t the concert to a close.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last Sunday this column was taking a backward glance at 1951. It now proposes to look forward into '52. Demanding first consideration is the unprecedented situation at Symphony Hall. According to the latest advices, Mr. Munch is already sufficiently recovered to make it possible for him to obtain ... [illegible] ... from whom he was ... [illegible] ... to assume his duties ... [illegible] ... for the scheduled European ... [illegible] ... is to remain in ... [illegible] ... and the middle of next ... [illegible] ... After the events of ... [illegible] ... and the orchestra goes ... to New York ... [illegible] ... Sir Thomas Beecham ... [illegible] ... to for our ... [illegible] ... There as present plans go, ... [illegible] ... Koussevitzky, who has saved ... the desperate Symphony situation, ... will remain head for a fortnight ... more.

Poor Koussevitzky! His fondest wish was to take the orchestra to Europe. Through the middle '30s the project was being seriously considered and it might actually have come to pass in the spring of '39. The tour," writes Moses Smith in a valuable biography, "was to include England, France, Holland and Belgium, and the project was being shaped by the French-American Art Association, headed by Edouard Herriot. Once more, however, Koussevitzky was doomed to disappointment. There was to be more urgent agenda in Europe in the summer of 1939."

* * *

France, Holland and Belgium, plus Switzerland and Austria, are to hear the orchestra next May. But not the British Isles. Conceivably, the English critics will betake themselves to the continent to hear at least some of its concerts. Otherwise they will miss the fun of comparing the Boston Symphony with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which they heard last summer, and the Philadelphia Orchestra, which they heard the summer before.

* * *

With all due respect to Munch, and also to Monteux, who goes along as guest conductor, the Europeans missed something they are not likely to hear duplicated when Koussevitzky was prevented from realizing his cherished dream. It is true that Koussevitzky made a fetish of tone, but that tone, and the elan, the dazzling virtuosity that went with it, made the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky unique in the annals of art. Other conductors, other ways, and other virtues. But what our friends overseas will hear next spring will more closely resemble that to which they are already accustomed than would have been the case if Koussevitzky had been able to go as the head of the orchestra that he so justly regarded as his very own. By a curious coincidence, Mr. Ansermet will also appear as conductor at the Paris Festival, which the Congress for Cultural Freedom will sponsor from April 28 through May 31, but it will be as leader of his regular organization, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, of Geneva, not the Boston Symphony, to which he is now rendering such signal service.

* * *

MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS

This Clipping From
OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE

Monteux to Paris Festival

Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony, in association with Charles Munch, at the Paris Exposition of the Congress for Cultural Freedom next May.

The exhibition, lasting from April 28 through May, will also feature the New York City Ballet, Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna State Opera, Santa Cecilia Academy orchestra and chorus of Rome, West Berlin Radio orchestra, Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, Paris Conservatory and French National Orchestras. Events will include an art exhibition covering highlights of modern painting in America and Europe, to be assembled by James J. Sweeney, former director of New York Museum of Modern Art.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct ballets. Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," to the Gertrude Stein text, is scheduled for performance by an all-Negro company.

The Paris appearance will be part of a Boston Symphony tour including Holland, Belgium, France, Austria and Switzerland.

The exposition will also include lectures by American and European authors and philosophers.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

JAN 7 - 1952

Boston Orchestra Set For First European Tour Next Spring

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it is announced by Nicolas Nabokov, Secretary-General of the Congress and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager. The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts which is timed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century. The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

The Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression. To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century", will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

IN other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts"; as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St Theater in New York in 1934. In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will also participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe immediately upon conclusion of its 1st symphony season in Symphony Hall, on April 25. Since it must return by June 1 for the annual "Pops" concerts in which most of its personnel participates this year the usual two-month series will be condensed into one month—its initial visit to Europe will be confined to two weeks of performances. Three, possibly four, concerts featuring contemporary European and American music will be given for the Paris festival.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans also during its fortnight abroad to perform in Holland and Belgium, in Bordeaux, in Strasbourg, in Austria, and in Zurich.

SINCE Charles Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak of national—and through its broadcasts and recordings, international—renown to which it was brought in the 25 years of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

The conductor's introduction to audiences in the United States occurred a year prior to his being awarded his coveted post, when he toured America as leader of the French radio orchestra, l'Orchestra National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise. It was under Mr. Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the state visit of President Vincent Auriol of France, a gesture which won for him and the orchestra the French president's warm invitation to bring the Boston Symphony to France.

Pierre Monteux, Mr. Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the organization since its founding in 1881. Paris-born, with a distinguished musical background in that city, Mr. Monteux came here first with the Ballet Russe of Diaghilev, and after serving a term with the Metropolitan Opera, became the Boston's conductor from 1919 to 1924. He is at present, and until mid-April, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

The New York Story

Alice Hughes

From teen-age to septuagenarians Saturday is America's date night. Real New Yorkers make a point of attending only home parties on Saturday. They wouldn't be caught dead in a restaurant, night-club or theater the night when local yokels visiting firemen or strangers come to the town. Saturday night in Boston is symphony night. In the three weeks I spent convalescing in Beantown I went twice to hear the Boston symphony orchestra. Charles Munch, regular conductor, has been ill for over a month, so I heard guest conductors Pierre Monteux of the famed San Francisco symphony and also Ernest Ansermet of Geneva, Switzerland.

Alice Hughes

The night Monteux conducted, his wife sat two seats away from me and dozed through several [illegible] of Wagner's "Par fal" and Debussy's "Gi[illegible]." Who hasn't nodded now and then at concerts? But henceforth I shall do so less guiltily. When Ansermet conducted he did something I have seen Milton Berle and other vaudevillians do, but never a dignified orchestra leader. Tall, white-headed as bearded, he turned full-front on the late-comers straggling to their seats, glowered and his lips and jaws moved, and his beard bobbed as if he were calling them unpleasant names under his breath. (Which he should have!) Either that or he was counting the house, though why I don't know. It was full, as always.

The 104 players of the Boston Symphony are elated because they are invited by the Congress for Cultural Freedom to give concerts in Paris, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and Switzerland, next May. Most of the musicians have foreign roots, and are happy for this chance to go abroad. Director Munch will help with the conducting chores of Monteux, and the band is a little puffed up because, once again, they have been honored beyond other orchestras. It was the late Koussevitzky, Boston symphony leader for years, whose sense of dramatic programming and showmanship lifted this musical group to the popular ne plus ultra of symphonic orchestras.

On the day this European music tour was announced, Hungary released our captured American army fliers. The Boston bandsmen were so sure that Soviet Russia was masquerading behind the Hungarian imprisonment that they doctored up an old joke to fit the case. My French brother-in-law who fiddles with the Boston came home and told it to us: "One Englishman drinks whiskey-and-soda. Two Americans talk business. Three Germans rehash the war, and—four Russians are the Budapest string quartet."

One of the distinctions of the Boston symphony is the first-time appearance of guest artists who subsequently become famous and in demand thereafter. The night Ansermet conducted he pulled a switch which delighted the band and the audience by introducing Boston to a composition by a fellow Swiss, Frank Martin, whose exciting "Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments" called for seven solos. Ansermet had these played by the band's own members instead of calling in outsiders. Also he invited a lady cellist, Zara Nelsova, to play for the first time with the Boston band. She chose Dvorak's B Minor Concerto and music critics called her the foremost woman cellist for the day and—the equal of any male cellist!

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 6 1952

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Flamadiddles And Igor Stravinsky

We were sitting around the other night in the blessed peace of an evening at home, congratulating ourself on having survived the season, when the doorbell rang and in marched a bunch of the 15-year-old boys of the neighborhood bearing armfuls of records. Hi, they said in easy camaraderie, we hear you've got a new phonograph that's a knockout and can we try these records out on it?

Flushed with the pride of ownership and never being reluctant to listen to music any time, we said sure, come on it. The boys, whom we had seen shoot up almost overnight from little kids running around in cowboy suits with cap pistols barking a deadly staccato to tall, skinny adolescents with a mixture of fuzz and skin eruptions on their cheeks, deployed around the room candidly studying the furniture, the pictures, the books and the records. Longhair stuff, said one, pulling out an LP folder and hastily pushing it back in. His tone wasn't reproachful.

What have you got there? we inquired, indicating the records they'd brought in. They said they were mostly Benny Goodman records they'd got for Christmas, and how do you work this thing?

We set the phonograph up for them, it not being anywhere near as formidable as it looked, and presently there resounded through the house the most preposterous racket we've ever heard. It was, it turned out, a disc entitled "Jazz at Carnegie Hall," recorded by Benny Goodman in 1938 but reissued as an LP. The boys explained it had come from a wire recording of the whole session and contained, in consequence, all the audience noises as well. Turn it up full blast, they said, we want to really live it.

Frantic Cascade

So we turned it up full blast to produce as deafening a torrent of sound as was ever heard anywhere; we figured we might as well really live it too. And out of the machine there issued a frantic cascade of notes from Benny Goodman's clarinet while Harry James (for so they identified him) blew outrageous figures on the trumpet and the others of the band, clearly augmented for the occasion, added to the organized chaos. But it was the drummer who had the boys by the ears. Wow! they cried, their eyes glazed over with the driving excitement of the rhythms and sounds he produced, get that!

They couldn't sit still. One of them was nodding his head and beating time with both feet. Another, whose feet were going, too, was tapping out a vehement accompaniment on the cocktail table. Still another, his jaw unlatched, was clapping out a fierce off-beat. They were possessed by the drums; each unexpected change of pace, each variation of the rhythmic patterns, each explosive crash of the cymbal brought exclamations of mingled rapture and amazement. Brother, they'd yip, is he cool! (It was not until somewhat later that we learned cool means hot nowadays.)

We listened to about a half hour of this while the jumpy connoisseurs of the drums hurled such words as "paradiddle," "flamadiddle," "rataplan," and "bongo" around with reverent ferocity, meantime arguing over the relative merits of Gene Krupa, Lionel Hampton and Buddy Rich. Then, during a split-second pause in the uproar, we ventured to suggest that if they really wanted to live some drumming, we'd oblige them with one of our favorites. Yeah? they said, suspicious but interested. What?

You wait and see, we said, drawing the new Pierre Monteux-Boston Symphony orchestra recording of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" out of the collection. We put it on the phonograph, designed by Richard Stedman to handle about as wide a spread of cycles as practical in a home outfit, advanced the volume even more than it was already, and sat back to observe the effect. At the sound of the bassoon in the highest register the boys exchanged glances suggesting they would submit to this outrageous bore out of courtesy for the use of the hall.

Longhairs Score

But when the two sets of timpanis got started the boys perked up a bit. Jees, they said, what's that? Suddenly the whole percussion section of the orchestra opened up: the noise was indescribable. And the boys, expressions of dismay on their faces, unlatched their jaws and listened in wonder. By the time the girl had danced herself to death in the Stravinsky music, they were flabbergasted. Do you mean to say, they cried, that a long hair did THAT?

We said yes, and nearly 40 years ago at that. Jeez, they said, wagging their heads, even Stan Kenton doesn't sound like that. We don't get it.

Well, they added, we've got to go now, but how about playing one more side of the Benny Goodman just to clear the atmosphere? Sure, we said, go ahead. So they played one more side, regaining their shattered composure by stamping and shaking out the rhythms, and presently marched out into the night. Score one, we thought to ourself, as they went out to hang around the corner awhile, for the longhairs.

[64]

INSTITUTE

ANSERMET STEPS IN FOR MUNCH

Ernest Ansermet

THE DISTINGUISHED Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet, arrived in this country by air from Geneva a few weeks ago in response to the invitation of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who must relinquish the podium for an extended period. Mr. Munch is under medical advice to abstain for a while from conducting because of a circulatory disturbance which developed after a recent virus infection. Mr. Ansermet has visited in leading cities of America, where he has appeared as guest conductor with many of our major orchestras in the last four seasons. He first visited the United States as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe.

The Orchestre de la Suisse Romande is the creation of Ernest Ansermet, who has remained its conductor since its foundation in 1918, presenting symphonic concerts in the cities of French Switzerland and organizing yearly festivals. He last led the Boston Orchestra in January of 1949, and critics found his interpretations vivid and glowing, yet marked by a wonderful sense of balance and proportion. After five weeks of intensive rehearsal, Mr. Ansermet brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 18, for its third Brooklyn concert in the traditional series of five.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 9 - 1952

GEORGE JUDD, manager of Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown on arrival in Paris to arrange for first European tour of the famed orchestra. Judd will occupy the apartment of Charles Munch, orchestra's French conductor.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 11 1952

Anshel Brusilow, Violinist, Makes Boston Debut

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Two musical events were worthy of note on last week's calendar. The Friday afternoon Symphony concert saw the Boston debut of the young violinist Anshel Brusilow and Sunday afternoon brought Dame Myra Hess to Jordan Hall for one of her infrequent recitals.

Playing a request program which included sonatas by Beethoven, Brahms, and Schubert, Dame Myra performed in the flawless, musical manner which is her very own.

* * *

ALTHOUGH one can not say with any degree of truth that Dame Myra, as far as technique alone is concerned, plays badly, it does seem that the years have brought with them a kind of impatience with scales and the like. It is evident that she has lost none of her eagerness to "get at" the music. The fact remains—whatever she plays is good.

Ernest Ansermet, again substituting for Charles Munch, must be seeing soloists in his sleep. Since he has come to Boston, he has accompanied pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie, violinist Micheal Rabin, cellist Zara Nelsova and this week it was the young violinist Ansel Brusilow.

* * *

MR. BRUSILOW, although quite new to Boston, is not new to musical audiences. Born in Philadelphia, he has received all of his musical training in this country. It has been good training too.

He chose for his Boston debut the Tchaikovsky Concerto which has received a good working over as of late. Although next to the new things coming out, the Tchaikovsky sounds almost antiquated. Mr. Brusilow did manage an intelligent performance of the work and the concerto benefited from his playing.—F. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
JAN 29 1952

For Lonely Girls

By Eleanor Roosevelt

PARIS, Jan. 10.—I received a notice the other day that made me think back to our years in the White House when I used to meet far more frequently the groups of Girl Scouts and Campfire Girls. This notice tells me that the Campfire Girls will celebrate their birthday March 16 to 22.

Eleanor Roosevelt

The organized Campfire Girls was founded in 1910 for girls from 7 to 18. Youngsters in this age bracket are apt to feel lonely, and this organization was designed to help them make friends and develop means of self-expression. At the same time the aim was to give every girl a sense of personal responsibility in her home and family life which would lead to the development of a sense of responsibility as a citizen.

The Campfire Girls represent all religious, racial and economic backgrounds and the organization has a membership of 365,000 girls today. These young ladies are developing friendship and understanding not only within the United States but throughout the world.

* * *

Not so very long ago a speech delivered by Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, was reported in the newspapers. In it he commented that we in the Western World are not making the effort to have our culture understood that is being made by the Soviet countries.

In view of this, I listened with the greatest interest to a representative of the Congress for Cultural Freedom the other day tell me that there was to be an international exhibition of the arts of our time in Paris from April 29 to June 1.

This exhibition will feature the artists of the non-Communist world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first trip to Europe, with Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux conducting. There will be expositions of contemporary painting. There will be lectures on literary subjects and there also will be films and even dramatic presentations.

This may be, in the art world, one of the most exciting events in a long time, and it may awaken both our Allies and our enemies to a realization that the U.S. is not just a source of dollars but also a source of real artistic appreciation and production.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ernest Ansermet conducting and William Primrose, viola soloist, will present the following program Friday afternoon at 2:15 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. in Boston's Symphony Hall: Bartok's Viola Concerto, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee."

of his generation, Enrico Caruso is dead. But to his admirers he remains the dearest memory in this drab, prosaic age."

* * *

APRIL IN PARIS may be good enough reason for writing a popular song, but May in Paris this year will be cause for extra-special musical jubilation. As part of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, conceived to show the Western kind of intellectual independence as opposed to the Iron Curtain "party line" variety, the Boston Symphony will make its first European appearance. Charles Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, one of the great French musicians of this era to share the three concerts as conductor.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 10 1952

BSO Manager Now in Europe To Arrange Tour

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left by plane Friday for Europe, where he is arranging for the tour that the orchestra will make on the continent in the late spring.

Landing in Paris last Saturday, he will spend this week end in Holland. He plans to return about Jan. 18.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1952

Ansermet to Lead Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ernest Ansermet on the podium in place of the ailing Charles Munch will perform the following program Friday afternoon at 2:15 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. in Boston's Symphony Hall:

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," Stravinsky's Divertimento from the allegorical ballet "Le Basfer de la Fee" and Bartok's Concerto for Viola.

William Primrose, who commissioned the work from the composer, will be the soloist. Bartok was unable to complete the score before his death, and the orchestration of the work has been completed by his friend and compatriot, Tibor Serly. This will be the work's first performance in Boston.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 11 1952

French Pianist Electrifies Audience with Sure Playing

Mlle. Monique de la Bruchollerie, a petite French pianist, came to Bushnell Memorial's Colonial Room last night under auspices of the Musical Club and fresh from a triumph with Ernest Ansermet and the Boston Symphony. Her effect on last night's crowded hall was that of a major electric storm.

This gifted little lady, pert and cute as a bird, has lightning sheathed in her slim wrists. As soon as she was away into Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G Minor, this lightning was unleased with blinding sureness, and it was possible to see the audience literally sit up and smile with surprise.

* * *

THROUGHOUT the Bach and on into Mozart's playful Variations on "Ah! Vous dirai-je maman," this technical brilliance flashed and shimmered, the music rolling from her incredibly nimble fingers as if it could hardly wait to burst forth into the air.

Her playing, even in Chopin's Sonata in B Flat Minor which followed Mozart, was all hardness and bite. The celebrated Funeral March sounded fresh and new.

* * *

THE REMAINDER of her program—two dry, witty pieces by Poulenc, two by Debussy, Philipp's "Feux follets" and a Toccata by Saint-Saens—was given this same technically towering treatment.

On the whole it seemed that while Mlle. de la Bruchollerie's pianism is built on heroic, persuasively lean and masculine lines, her dynamism leads her often into a reliance upon her stunning technique rther than upon the inherent loveliness of the music itself.

But her technique is overpowering, and the enthusiastic audience called her back for three encores, each one as happy an event as all her program was. She can come back anytime.—E. C.

Symphony Manager Off by Air to Paris

NEW YORK (AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris last night aboard a Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour in May.

The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring with Charles Munch, the symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection.

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES
BROOKLYN, N.Y
JAN. 1952

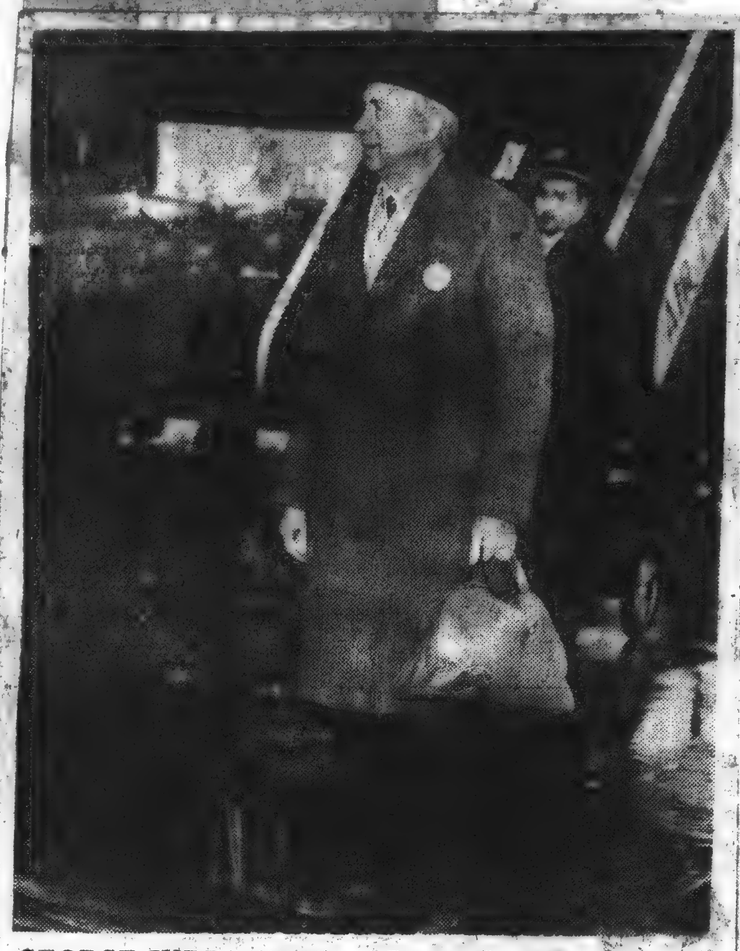
ANSERMET STEPS IN FOR MUNCH

Ernest Ansermet

THE DISTINGUISHED Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet, arrived in this country by air from Geneva a few weeks ago in response to the invitation of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who must relinquish the podium for an extended period. Mr. Munch is under medical advice to abstain for a while from conducting because of a circulatory disturbance which developed after a recent virus infection. Mr. Ansermet has visited in leading cities of America, where he has appeared as guest conductor with many of our major orchestras in the last four seasons. He first visited the United States as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe.

The Orchestre de la Suisse Romande is the creation of Ernest Ansermet, who has remained its conductor since its foundation in 1918, presenting symphonic concerts in the cities of French Switzerland and organizing yearly festivals. He last led the Boston Orchestra in January of 1949, and critics found his interpretations vivid and glowing, yet marked by a wonderful sense of balance and proportion. After five weeks of intensive rehearsal, Mr. Ansermet brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 18, for its third Brooklyn concert in the traditional series of five.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 9 - 1952



GEORGE JUDD, manager of Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown on arrival in Paris to arrange for first European tour of the famed orchestra. Judd will occupy the apartment of Charles Munch, orchestra's French conductor.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 11 1952

Anshel Brusilow, Violinist, Makes Boston Debut

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Two musical events were worthy of note on last week's calendar. The Friday afternoon Symphony concert saw the Boston debut of the young violinist Anshel Brusilow and Sunday afternoon brought Dame Myra Hess to Jordan Hall for one of her infrequent recitals.

Playing a request program which included sonatas by Beethoven, Brahms, and Schubert, Dame Myra performed in the flawless, musical manner which is her very own.

* * *

ALTHOUGH one can not say with any degree of truth that Dame Myra, as far as technique alone is concerned, plays badly, it does seem that the years have brought with them a kind of impatience with scales and the like. It is evident that she has lost none of her eagerness to "get at" the music. The fact remains—whatever she plays is good.

Ernest Ansermet, again substituting for Charles Munch, must be seeing soloists in his sleep. Since he has come to Boston, he has accompanied pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie, violinist Micheal Rabin, cellist Zara Nelsova and this week it was the young violinist Ansel Brusilow.

* * *

MR. BRUSILOW, although quite new to Boston, is not new to musical audiences. Born in Philadelphia, he has received all of his musical training in this country. It has been good training too.

He chose for his Boston debut the Tchaikovsky Concerto which has received a good working over as of late. Although next to the new things coming out, the Tchaikovsky sounds almost antiquated, Mr. Brusilow did manage an intelligent performance of the work and the concerto benefited from his playing.—F. S.

of his generation, Enrico Caruso is dead. But to his admirers he remains the dearest memory in this drab, prosaic age."

Phila Inq—Jan 10

APRIL IN PARIS may be good enough reason for writing a popular song, but May in Paris this year will be cause for extra-special musical jubilation. As part of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, conceived to show the Western kind of intellectual independence as opposed to the Iron Curtain "party line" variety, the Boston Symphony will make its first European appearance. Charles Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, one of the great French musicians of this era to share the three concerts as conductor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
JAN 10 1952

For Lonely Girls

By Eleanor Roosevelt

PARIS, Jan. 10.—I received a notice the other day that made me think back to our years in the White House when I used to meet far more frequently the groups of Girl Scouts and Campfire Girls. This notice tells me that the Campfire Girls will celebrate their birthday March 16 to 22.

Eleanor Roosevelt

The organized Campfire Girls was founded in 1910 for girls from 7 to 18. Youngsters in this age bracket are apt to feel lonely, and this organization was designed to help them make friends and develop means of self-expression. At the same time the aim was to give every girl a sense of personal responsibility in her home and family life which would lead to the development of a sense of responsibility as a citizen.

The Campfire Girls represent all religious, racial and economic backgrounds and the organization has a membership of 365,000 girls today. These young ladies are developing friendship and understanding not only within the United States but throughout the world.

* * *

Not so very long ago a speech delivered by Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, was reported in the newspapers. In it he commented that we in the Western World are not making the effort to have our culture understood that is being made by the Soviet countries.

In view of this, I listened with the greatest interest to a representative of the Congress for Cultural Freedom the other day tell me that there was to be an international exhibition of the arts of our time in Paris from April 29 to June 1.

This exhibition will feature the artists of the non-Communist world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first trip to Europe, with Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux conducting. There will be expositions of contemporary painting. There will be lectures on literary subjects and there also will be films and even dramatic presentations.

This may be, in the art world, one of the most exciting events in a long time, and it may awaken both our Allies and our enemies to a realization that the U.S. is not just a source of dollars but also a source of real artistic appreciation and production.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ernest Ansermet conducting and William Primrose, viola soloist, will present the following program Friday afternoon at 2:15 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. in Boston's Symphony Hall: Bartok's Viola Concerto, Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee."

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 10 1952

BSO Manager Now in Europe To Arrange Tour

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left by plane Friday for Europe, where he is arranging for the tour that the orchestra will make on the continent in the late spring.

Landing in Paris last Saturday, he will spend this week end in Holland. He plans to return about Jan. 18.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 10 1952

Ansermet to Lead Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ernest Ansermet on the podium in place of the ailing Charles Munch will perform the following program Friday afternoon at 2:15 p. m. and Saturday at 8:30 p. m. in Boston's Symphony Hall:

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," Stravinsky's Divertimento from the allegorical ballet "Le Basier de la Fee" and Bartok's Concerto for Viola.

William Primrose, who commissioned the work from the composer, will be the soloist. Bartok was unable to complete the score before his death, and the orchestration of the work has been completed by his friend and compatriot, Tibor Serly. This will be the work's first performance in Boston.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 11 1952

French Pianist Electrifies Audience with Sure Playing

Mlle. Monique de la Bruchollerie, a petite French pianist, came to Bushnell Memorial's Colonial Room last night under auspices of the Musical Club and fresh from a triumph with Ernest Ansermet and the Boston Symphony. Her effect on last night's crowded hall was that of a major electric storm.

This gifted little lady, pert and cute as a bird, has lightning sheathed in her slim wrists. As soon as she was away into Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G Minor, this lightning was unleased with blinding sureness, and it was possible to see the audience literally sit up and smile with surprise.

* * *

THROUGHOUT the Bach and on into Mozart's playful Variations on "Ah! Vous dirai-je maman," this technical brilliance flashed and shimmered, the music rolling from her incredibly nimble fingers as if it could hardly wait to burst forth into the air.

Her playing, even in Chopin's Sonata in B Flat Minor which followed Mozart, was all hardnes and bite. The celebrated Funeral March sounded fresh and new.

* * *

THE REMAINDER of her program—two dry, witty pieces by Poulenc, two by Debussy, Philipp's "Feux follets" and a Toccata by Saint-Saens—was given this same technically towering treatment.

On the whole it seemed that while Mlle. de la Bruchollerie's pianism is built on heroic, persuasively lean and masculine lines, her dynamism leads her often into a reliance upon her stunning technique rther than upon the inherent loveliness of the music itself.

But her technique is overpowering, and the enthusiastic audience called her back for three encores, each one as happy an event as all her program was. She can come back anytime.—E. C.

Ivanov, ... acter, is tentative and unresolved.

Symphony Manager Off by Air to Paris

NEW YORK (AP)—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left for Paris last night aboard an Air France transport to arrange details of the orchestra's continental tour next May.

The visit, under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, will be the orchestra's first European tour in its 71-year history.

Judd took off after conferring with Charles Munch, the symphony's conductor, who is recovering from illness resulting from a virus infection.

s Soloist — Primrose Discusses Bartók Work

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MUSIC

William Primrose Soloist in Boston Premiere of Bartok's Viola Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

William Primrose, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first local performance of the late Bela Bartok's Viola Concerto at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. He also was heard in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program, which will be repeated tonight, ended with the ballet score, "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Stravinsky. Ernest Ansermet conducted.

Bartok's work has been a little late in reaching us in concert performance. The composer left it in the form of a sketch when he died in September of 1945. The work of completion, including the whole plan of orchestration, was executed by Bartok's friend and compatriot, Tibor Serly. That, as Mr. Serly has written, was a task of extraordinary difficulty. It must have been due in part to the fact that Bartok was one of the most individual composers of the time.

At any rate, the finished work is a remarkably fine concerto, both for its intrinsic substance and its exploitation of the solo instrument. The first two of the three movements do not possess much "motion" in a conventional sense, but they are largely rhapsodic and allow the viola to sing in its own true fashion. The finale reverts to the Hungarian folk music influence which was so important in many of Bartok's compositions, even to touches of a drone bass effect. Here the technical capabilities of the solo instrument receive fullest play.

The idiom of the Viola Concerto is not so abstruse, which is to say not so dissonant, as other of Bartok's music. Some of his pieces require repeated hearings to arrive at a state of even approximate pleasure and understanding. This one, however, far from forbidding, is immediately attractive.

I suspect that the orchestration might have been a bit harsh had Bartok written it himself, although he did tell Mr. Primrose it was intended to be exceptionally light. That, however, is only a guess, and of little importance in view of the admirable total effect of Mr. Serly's work upon the rough sketch. I think he deserves congratulations for the skill of his work, and our appreciation for having undertaken the task at all. The repertory is richer for it.

Mr. Primrose was heartily applauded for his performances of both Bartok and Berlioz, the former of which seemed to be noticeably the better. Indeed, the entire reading of "Harold In Italy" was lacklustre and disappointing, lacking richness of orchestral tone, and often merely noisy when it ought to have been powerful. Perhaps Mr. Ansermet is not overly familiar with the piece, for he seemed to pay close attention to the printed score, and those myriad nuances which distinguished and made glorious the late Serge Koussevitzky's performance of "Harold In Italy" were sadly absent.

There were, too, many places where the ensemble was untidy to the point of raggedness. Furthermore, it would have been better program planning to place the lively, Tchaikovskyan but trifling ballet excerpts of Stravinsky at the beginning, and "Harold In Italy" at the end. That is what Mr. Koussevitzky, a master in this respect, surely would have done.

Primrose Plays Modern Instrument at Symphony

David W. Nilsson

William Primrose, viola soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its Symphony Hall concerts this week end. He will play the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" and the first Boston performance of Bartók's Viola Concerto. Mr. Primrose also will play at the orchestra's public rehearsal this evening.

Violist to Play Concerto With Symphony Orchestra

By Klaus George Roy

When the violist William Primrose appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the week-end concerts, he will be giving his thirty-ninth and fortieth performances of Béla Bartók's Viola Concerto in two years.

Since the première on Dec. 2, 1949, with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Antal Dorati, Mr. Primrose has taken the work on tour all over the world, including ten performances in Israel alone.

The work has a history which is not only interesting, but unusually affecting from a human and personal standpoint. Bartók had heard Primrose perform the Walton Viola Concerto, and found himself fascinated by the "sombre, more masculine character of the instrument," as he characterized it.

When Mr. Primrose commissioned Bartók to write a concerto for him in February, 1945, the composer set to work at once and had the draft completed by September of the same year. In a letter which he wrote to the violoist that month, he stated that he could provide the orchestral score in less than six weeks. It was not to be; the composer passed on shortly thereafter, and the visit which Mr. Primrose was to pay him—to discuss the problem of certain technical passages—came a few days too late.

* * *

It was most moving to talk with William Primrose, only an hour after his arrival in Boston last night, about the situation he faced in seeing the work dedicated to him completely sketched in the author's hand, but wellnigh unreadable to anyone else.

There was hope, again when Bartók's long-time friend, the Hungarian composer and conductor Tibor Serly, decided that he knew Bartók's style and intentions well enough to decipher and score the concerto. This most difficult task he accomplished. He had a similar experience in adding the final page to the composer's Third Piano Concerto, otherwise completed during the same year.

"I feel quite sure," Mr. Primrose said, "despite all doubts which have been raised, that Serly came very, very close to what Bartók himself had meant to do, and that his scoring and formal smoothing-out was the most sincere and truthful job possible."

The Concerto is 20 minutes long. The three movements follow each other without pause. The opening section is a Moderato with strong and varied activity for the soloist, with a polyphonic, tightly knit, yet always transparent texture in the orchestra. A quietly fading coda is succeeded by a brief Lento parlando in the manner of a "speaking" cadenza. This leads directly into the slow movement, Adagio religioso, the opening melody of which, with the characteristic interval of a falling fifth, recalls the second movement of the Violin Concerto of 1939.

* * *

"There is a tremendously exciting moment later on," Mr. Primrose pointed out. "It is like a great outcry, with the viola in its highest register, and all the woodwinds striving upward as if in desperation!"

The poignancy of the expression subsides, and another short interlude, Allegretto, brings us to the final Allegro vivace. This is a powerful and driving rondo, with the dancing and whirling figures so beloved by Bartók.

"It is a magnificent work, also from the player's point of view," the violist observed. "Very difficult, yes, but never once awkward."

Ernest Ansermet has himself been previously and intensely concerned with the piece; it was he who conducted the New York première with Mr. Primrose in February, 1950. The violist was delighted to hear that he would be playing the Bartók as well as Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" in Symphony Hall this evening at 7:30 during another public rehearsal.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 12 1952

Boston Symphony to Play First Concerts in Paris

By IRVING KOLODIN

AS PART of the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris this May, conceived to show the Western kind of intellectual independence as opposed to the Iron Curtain "party line" variety, the Boston Symphony will make its first European appearance ever. Charles Munch has invited Pierre Monteux, one of the great French musicians of this era, to share the three concerts as conductor.

The City Center Ballet will give several programs, and Virgil Thomson will conduct his "Four Saints in Three Acts," which is close to rounding out 20 years since its Hartford premiere in the '30s.

Other events will include the Vienna Philharmonic, the chorus and orchestra of St. Cecilia, Rome; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande (Geneva), as well as performances by Parisian groups. Nicolas Nabokov is secretary-general of the congress.

While abroad, the Boston Symphony will perform in Holland and Belgium, in Austria and Switzerland, and also in Munch's native Strasbourg.

* * *

HILDE GUEDEN, the Met's new lyric-coloratura soprano might well believe the stories about America as a land of opportunity. Barely a month and a half after making her Met debut, Miss Gueden found herself on a TV show with such people as Helen Hayes, Alfred Lunt, Oscar Hammerstein 2d, Robert E. Sherwood and Joe E. Brown. Kaertnerstrasse, Wien, is likely to seem rather dull after this. As a matter of fact, after a month (January) in Vienna, Miss Gueden is returning for the remainder of the Met season and the tour.

Rafael Kubelik's forthcoming trip to Europe, where he will serve as guest conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra for six weeks, will find his post as director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra being filled by Bruno Walter (four weeks) and George Schick. Kubelik was due to make this trip a year ago, but was prevented by illness and some apprehensions by his board of directors that international complications might prevent his return. Both his health and the international complications are in better shape now.

* * *

SOME LIFE-LONG friends and admirers of the late Arthur Schnabel have banded together to form a Memorial Committee to honor the great Austrian musician's belief that a truly representative artist should function in three capacities; as composer, as performer and as teacher. The intention of the Memorial Committee is to further the publication of Schnabel's compositions, promote the reissuance of his recordings and collect his many pedagogical writings for publication.

Among those who recently attended an organization meeting in New York were George Szell, Fritz Stiedry, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Carl Friedberg and Cesar Searchinger. Founder members who could not be present include Joseph Szigeti, Pablo Casals, Albert Einstein, Aldous Huxley, Thomas Mann and Bruno Walter. A fund-raising concert is planned for the Spring.

(Copyright S. R.)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
JAN 12 1952

John Brook

Ernest Ansermet, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be on the podium for the orchestra's concerts while on tour next week at New London, Conn., New York, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 12 1952

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Bartok and Stravinsky are names to strike terror to the tender-eared, but both composers are represented at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts by works which would not daunt the most conservative. Bartok's piece is the Concerto for Viola and Orchestra, written for William Primrose, who yesterday played it for the first time in Boston, while the Stravinsky number is the Divertimento, "The Fairy Kiss," drawn from the ballet of that name. This we had heard from Dr. Koussevitzky in 1936 and from the composer himself in '41, but in neither case, or so it seemed, was it as attractively set forth as it was yesterday under the direction of Ernest Ansermet.

When Mr. Primrose, or any eminent violist, plays with the Boston Symphony, the "Harold in Italy" of Berlioz is sure to find place on the program. It begins the present list. The performance yesterday was not one in which to take special delight. Mr. Ansermet's interpretation of the Symphony, less romantic and impassioned than that of Koussevitzky, tended, as this listener heard it, to emphasize the music's many weaknesses. Like so much of Berlioz, "Harold" combines the imaginative and the inane. One might almost say the inspired and the idiotic. Mr. Primrose yesterday played a viola made for him five years ago in Philadelphia, not the Stradivarius that he used in recording "Harold" with the Boston Symphony, and the tone of the instrument seemed lacking in warmth and richness, though in the Concerto of Bartok it produced a quite different effect.

At the time of Bartok's death, in 1945, the Viola Concerto remained in sketch form and the tremendous task of realizing the composer's intentions fell to his friend and compatriot, Tibor Serly. How different the piece would have been if Bartok had done the whole job is pure conjecture. However, as it stands, it is a deeply absorbing and often highly pleasurable work. There is real emotion in the second movement and true Hungarian fire in the last. The meagre list of concertos for the viola has received a substantial and valuable addition. One of the previous performances of the Concerto was by Mr. Ansermet and the NBC Orchestra, and he conducted yesterday with full measure of understanding and devotion, while Mr. Primrose gave an astonishing account of his part in a composition with which his name will be forever associated.

"The Fairy's Kiss" is based upon melodies of Tchaikovsky, a composer, strange as it may seem, to whom Stravinsky is deeply attached, and the first performance of this dance version of a tale by Hans Christian Andersen fell on the 35th anniversary of Tchaikovsky's death. The orchestration is Stravinskyan, not Tchaikovskyan, and the melodies have been recast in a more rigid mold. The total effect is still utterly charming.

ROCKLAND, ME
COURIER
1/12/52

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance next Spring at the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris. Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will direct the 104-member orchestra in three concerts in May at the French capital. Other appearances will be made in Belgium, Holland, Western Germany, Austria and Switzerland. The orchestra will sail for Europe on April 25 at the end of the 71st symphony season and will return for the annual Pops Concerts which start June 1.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 12 1952

MUSIC

William Primrose Soloist in Boston Premiere of Bartok's Viola Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

William Primrose, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first local performance of the late Bela Bartok's Viola Concerto at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. He also was heard in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The program, which will be repeated tonight, ended with the ballet score, "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Stravinsky. Ernest Ansermet conducted.

Bartok's work has been a little late in reaching us in concert performance. The composer left it in the form of a sketch when he died in September of 1945. The work of completion, including the whole plan of orchestration, was executed by Bartok's friend and compatriot, Tibor Serly. That, as Mr. Serly has written, was a task of extraordinary difficulty. It must have been due in part to the fact that Bartok was one of the most individual composers of the time.

At any rate, the finished work is a remarkably fine concerto, both for its intrinsic substance and its exploitation of the solo instrument. The first two of the three movements do not possess much "motion," in a conventional sense, but they are largely rhapsodic and allow the viola to sing in its own true fashion. The finale reverts to the Hungarian folk music influence which was so important in many of Bartok's compositions, even to touches of a drone bass effect. Here the technical capabilities of the solo instrument receive fullest play.

The idiom of the Viola Concerto is not so abstruse, which is to say not so dissonant, as other of Bartok's music. Some of his pieces require repeated hearings to arrive at a state of even approximate pleasure and understanding. This one, however, far from forbidding, is immediately attractive.

I suspect that the orchestration might have been a bit harsh had Bartok written it himself, although he did tell Mr. Primrose it was intended to be exceptionally light. That, however, is only a guess, and of little importance in view of the admirable total effect of Mr. Serly's work upon the rough sketch. I think he deserves congratulations for the skill of his work, and our appreciation for having undertaken the task at all. The repertory is richer for it.

Mr. Primrose was heartily applauded for his performances of both Bartok and Berlioz, the former of which seemed to be noticeably the better. Indeed, the entire reading of "Harold In Italy" was lacklustre and disappointing, lacking richness of orchestral tone, and often merely noisy when it ought to have been powerful. Perhaps Mr. Ansermet is not overly familiar with the piece, for he seemed to pay close attention to the printed score, and those myriad nuances which distinguished and made glorious the late Serge Koussevitzky's performance of "Harold in Italy" were sadly absent.

There were, too, many places where the ensemble was untidy to the point of raggedness. Furthermore, it would have been better program planning to place the lively, Tchaikovskyan but trifling ballet excerpts of Stravinsky at the beginning, and "Harold In Italy" at the end. That is what Mr. Koussevitzky, a master in this respect, surely would have done.

Primrose Plays Modern Instrument at Symphony

Most first-rank musical soloists who are string players, perform upon antique masterpieces of the art of instrument-making. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, however, William Primrose was an exception to the rule. He played, as soloist with the Boston Symphony, a modern viola made for him in 1946 by William Moennig Jr. of Philadelphia. This proves, perhaps, that the art of making superfine stringed instruments has not suffered complete decline.

Oklahoma City, Okla.
Oklahoman
1/12/52

Saturday Boston Attends Symphony

By ALICE HUGHES

FROM teen-age to septuagenarians, Saturday is America's date night. Real New Yorkers make a point of attending only home parties on Saturday. They wouldn't be caught dead in a restaurant, nightclub or theater the night when local yokels, visiting firemen or strangers come to do the town. Saturday night in Boston is Symphony night.

In the three weeks I spent convalescing in Beantown I went twice to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. Charles Munch, regular conductor, has been ill for over a month, so I heard guest conductors Pierre Monteux of the famed San Francisco symphony and also Ernest Ansermet of Geneva, Switzerland.

The night Monteux conducted, his wife sat two seats away from me, and dozed through several passages of Wagner's "Parsifal" and Debussy's "Gigue." Who hasn't nodded now and then at concerts? But henceforth I shall do so less guiltily.

WHEN Ansermet conducted he did something I have seen Milton Berle and other vaudevillians do, but never a dignified orchestra leader. Tall, white-headed and bearded, he turned full-front on the late-comers straggling to their seats, glowered and his lips and jaws moved, and his beard bobbed as if he were calling them unpleasant names under his breath. (Which he should have!) Either that, or he was counting the house, though why I don't know. It was full, as always.

The 104 players of the Boston Symphony are elated because they are invited by the Congress for Cultural Freedom to give concerts in Paris, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and Switzerland, next May. Most of the musicians have foreign roots, and are happy for this chance to go abroad.

DIRECTOR Munch will help with the conducting chores of Monteux, and the band is a little puffed up because, once again, they have been honored beyond other orchestras. It was the late Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony leader for years, whose sense of dramatic programming and showmanship lifted this musical group to the popular ne plus ultra of symphonic orchestras.

On the day this European music tour was announced, Hungary released our captured American army fliers. The Boston bandsmen were so sure that Soviet Russia was masquerading behind the Hungarian imprisonment that they doctored up an old joke to fit the case.

My French brother-in-law who fiddles with the Boston came home and told it to us: "One Englishman drinks whisky-and-soda. The Americans talk business. Three Germans rehash the war, and—four Russians are the Budapest string quartet."

This Clipping From
LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL
JAN 10 1952

My Day

By ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

PARIS — I have received a notice that makes me think back to our years in the White ... when I used to meet ... frequently the groups of Girl ... and Campfire Girls. The ... tells me that the Campfire ... will celebrate their birthday ... week of March 16 to 22. ... organized Campfire Girls ... founded in 1910 for girls from ... 18 years. The intention was ... give every girl the feeling that ... was a needed part of the ... Youngsters in this age ... bracket are apt to feel lonely and ... organization was designed to ... them make friends and ... up means of self-expression. ... same time the aim was ... every girl a sense of per... responsibility in her home ... family life which would ... to the development of a sense ... responsibility as a citizen. ...

The Campfire Girls represent ... groups, racial and economic ... backgrounds and the organization ... a membership of 365,000 ... These young ladies are ... forging friendship and understanding not only within the United States but throughout the world ... and it may well be that as they grow older they may be a real factor in the development of better understanding among ... in this very troubled and divided world.

OUR CULTURE IGNORED—Not very long ago a speech delivered by the Hon. Edward W Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, was reported in the newspapers and in it he commented that we in the Western world were not making the effort to have our culture understood ... was being made by the Soviet countries. Here in Europe ... very quickly aware of the fact that the U. S. has done very little to acquaint European people with the fact that there are artists and writers in our country who are well worth becoming acquainted with.

We have not taken part in many cultural exhibits over here such as the Soviet Union has recently had opportunity to show its wares made within its borders. In view of this, I listened with the greatest interest to a report ... Secretary to the Congress for Cultural Freedom the other day. ... there was to be an international exhibition of the arts ... of our time held in Paris between April 29 and June 1 this spring.

This exhibition will feature the artists of the non-Communist world. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first tour of Europe, with Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux conducting. There will be exposition of contemporary painting ... sculpture and lectures on literature and poetry ... there also will be ... perhaps even dramatic ... In fact, this plan ... world, one of the most exciting things that has been done in a long time and it may awaken both our allies and our enemies to the realization that the U. S. is not just a source of dollars but also a source of real artistic appreciation and production.

(World copyright, 1952, by United Feature Syndicate, Inc.)

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

A Woman's N...

Boston Satur... Center Arou...

By ALICE HUGHES

New York, Jan 7.—From te... age to septuagenarians, Saturd... is America's date night. R... New Yorkers make a point of ... tending only home parties ... Sat'day. They wouldn't be cau... dead in a restaurant, night c... or theater the night when lo... yokels, visiting firemen or str... gers come to do the town. Sat'... night in Boston is Sympho... night. In the three weeks I sp... convalescing in Beantown, I w... twice to hear the Boston Sy... phony Orchestra. Charles Mun... regular conductor, has been ill ... over a month, so I heard Gu... Conductors Pierre Monteux of t... famed San Francisco Sympho... and also Ernest Ansermet of G... neva, Switzerland.

The night Monteux conduct... his wife sat two seats away fr... me, and dozed through seve... passages of Wagner's "Parsif... and Debussy's "Gigue." W... hasn't nodded now and then ... concerts? But, henceforth, I sh... do so less guiltily. When Ans... met conducted he did somethi... I have seen Milton Berle a... other vaudevillians do, but nev... a dignified orchestra leader. Ta... white-headed and bearded, ... turned full-front on the late-co... ers straggling to their seats, glo... ered and his lips and jaws mov... and his beard bobbed as if ... were calling them unpleasa... names under his breath. (Whi... he should have!) Either that, ... he was counting the house, thou... why I don't know. It was f... as always.

Concerts Abroad Slated.

The 104 players of the Bos... Symphony are elated because th... are invited by the Congress ...

Boston Cultural Con... Extends ... For Ma...

PARIS (Special)—T... Symphony Orchestr... the world's great mus... izations, has accepted ... tion from the Congre... tural Freedom to ma... appearance in Europe ... it was announced ha... Munch, musical di... Pierre Monteux will ...

The company of 10... will give three concer... in May as a major Am... tribution to "Masterpi... 20th Century," the mo... position of the arts wi... at focusing attention ... tural achievements ... ness during the last 5... exposition will open ... April 29 and conti... May, centering about ... des Champs ...

The Paris ... stine the ... for Cultural ... strate the ... culture in ... show the ... work and ... ond, "Masterpieces ... Century" ... works in ... opera, ballet, ... ture and ...

The Boston ...

[67]

This Clipping From
LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL
JAN 10 1952

My Day

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

IS — I have received a notice that makes me think to our years in the White when I used to meet fa frequently the groups of Girl and Campfire Girls. This tells me that the Campfire will celebrate their birthday eek of March 16 to 22.
organized Campfire Girls ounded in 1910 for girls from 18 years. The intention was e every girl the feeling that was a needed part of the Youngsters in this age et are apt to feel lonely, and organization was designed to them make friends and de-means of self-expression. At same time the aim was to every girl a sense of per-responsibility in her home family life which would lead e development of a sense of nsibility as a citizen.
campfire Girls represent all ous, racial and economic grounds and the organization membership of 365,000 girls.
These young ladies are de-ing friendship and under-ing not only within the United s but throughout the world.
it may well be that as they older they may be a real r in the development of better rstanding among all peoples.
is very troubled and divided.

R CULTURE IGNORED—Not
ry long ago a speech delivery the Hon. Edward W. Barr
Assistant Secretary of State
Public Affairs, was reported he newspapers and in it he nented that we in the Western H were not making the effort have our culture understood h was being made by th
t countries. Here in Europe is very quickly aware of th that the U. S. has done very to acquaint European people the fact that there are artists writers in our country, who worth becoming acquainted have not taken part in many ural exhibits over here where he Soviet Union has neglected opportunity to show the ad es made within its borders.

view of this, I listened with greatest interest to a repre
ative of the Congress for Cul l Freedom the other day tell that there was to be an in ational exhibition of the arts ur time held in Paris between l 29 and June 1 this coming exhibition will feature the sts of the non-Communis

ld. The Boston Symphony Or stra will make its first trip t ope, with Charles Munch and re Montreux conducting. There be expositions of contempor painting. There will be lec s on literary subjects and e also will be films and pe
s even dramatic presentations fact, this may be, in the ar d, one of the most excitin gs that has been done in time and it may awaken bot allies and our enemies to ization that the U. S. is n a source of dollars but also ce of real artistic appreciation production.
World copyright, 1952, by ted Feature Syndicate, Inc.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

A Woman's New York

Boston Saturday Nights Center Around Symphony

By [illegible]

tural Freedom to give concerts in Paris, Holland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and Switzerland, next May. Most of the musicians have foreign roots, and are happy for this chance to go abroad. Director Munch will help with the conducting chores of Monteux, and the band is a little stiffed up because, once again, they have been honored beyond other orchestras. It was the late Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony leader for years, whose sense of dramatic programming and showmanship lifted this musical group to the popular ne plus ultra of symphonic orchestras.

On the day this European music tour was announced, Hungary released our captured American Army flyers. The Boston bandsmen were so sure that Soviet Russia was masquerading behind the Hungarian imprisonment that they doctored up an old joke to fit the case.

My French brother-in-law who fiddles with the Boston came home and told it to us: "One Englishman drinks whisky-and-soda. Two Americans talk business. Three Germans rehash the war, and—four Russians are the Budapest string quartet."

One of the distinctions of the Boston Symphony is the first-time appearance of guest artists who subsequently become famous and in demand thereafter. The night Ansermet conducted he pulled a switch which delighted the band and the audience by introducing Boston to a composition by a fellow Swiss, Frank Martin, whose exciting "Concerto for Seven Wind Instruments" called for seven solos. Ansermet had these played by the band's own members instead of calling in outsiders. Also he invited a lady cellist, Zara Nelsova, to play for the first time with the Boston band. She chose Dvorak's B Minor Concerto and music critics called her the foremost woman cellist of the day and—the equal of any male cellist!

Concerts Abroad Slated

The 104 players of the Bos[illegible]

No Woman's Instrument.

Far be it for me to tangle with the Boston critics, though I still hold that lady cellist Ria Garbousova is as good a cellist as Miss Nelsova. But the instrument itself is insurmountable for a woman. Up to 40 years ago, such daring females as attempted the cello were taught to play kneeling behind it. Both Nelsova and Garbousova straddle it between their knees by means of a dress with at least a nine-yard hemline, and while each player's fingering and bowing are admirable, the exertion of encompassing the cello takes its toll on the player's face. Both Garbousova, who is a beautiful woman, and Nelsova, who has spiritual beauty, are driven to facial distoritions when at the cello. It's not a woman's instrument, I agree.

Copyright, King Features Syndicate, Inc.

e and His Viola at Symphony

Soloist Gives Bartók Work In First Boston Performance

By Harold Rogers

Who could ask for anything more in the way of a solo work on a program than a performance of the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" by that superb violist William Primrose? But Symphony Hall audiences are getting something more at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week end. They are also getting Mr. Primrose in the first Boston performance of Béla Bartók's Viola Concerto—a bonus of singular beauty.

As if all this were not enough, Ernest Ansermet, who is winding up his current stint as guest conductor, brings the concert to a close with Stravinsky's ingratiating tribute to the music of Tchaikovsky—the Divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fée." It is a substantial and thoroughly satisfying program.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Primrose and his gleaming instruments cut a handsome figure on the platform. He plays a modern viola, fashioned five years ago in Philadelphia by William Moennig, Jr. From the opulent tones that Mr. Primrose draws from the instrument one might assume that the secrets of fine violin making were not exclusive to the Stradivari family.

But beautiful fiddles without beautiful playing can please only the eye. The beauty of Moennig's viola has its peer in the artistry of Mr. Primrose. Although it is true that in "Harold in Italy" Berlioz accomplished an amazing task—that of composing a heavily scored symphony in four movements with enough "air" in it for a single viola to sing through—it is also true that only a violist of stature can dominate the scene.

Mr. Primrose is such a violist. We never lose sight of Harold's contemplations, whatever the colorful scenery his eye beholds. The orchestra may be swept away with the exuberance of the mountaineer's serenade or the violence of the brigands' orgy, yet Mr. Primrose's viola always draws us back to Harold's reflections, eloquently set forth.

♪ ♪ ♪

A flat harmonic at the close of the second movement was an unfortunate note over which Mr. Primrose had no control. The tension of the string had evidently loosened so that when he touched his finger to it (in producing a harmonic the string is not pressed to the fingerboard but must be touched at a specific point or the harmonic will not sound) the tone was not up to pitch. In such a case the finger has no way of compensating.

The Bartók concerto has an interesting history, the details of which were given on this page last Wednesday. It was commissioned by Mr. Primrose and the preliminary sketch completed during the few weeks before the composer's passing. Tibor Serly, composer, conductor, and longtime friend of Bartók, assumed the task of deciphering Bartók's jottings and filling out the orchestration. It appears, on the first few hearings, to be as honest a job of reconstruction as could ever be accomplished.

♪ ♪ ♪

If Bartók was seeking simplification toward the end, as his close associates aver, his Viola Concerto is a beautiful example of economy of means, transparent orchestral texture, and lyrical statement. It is interesting to note that Bartók sounds the depths of the viola in the same songful way that Berlioz does, though their basic styles are hardly comparable.

There is aspiration in the opening Moderato. The second movement presents the viola first in a Lento, a lonely monologue, followed by a contemplative and serene Adagio religioso. A transitional Allegretto then leads to the final movement, an Allegro vivace that draws its mood from the Hungarian folk dances that were so dear to the composer.

Mr. Ansermet's reading of the Stravinsky was pure delight, not only for the music itself—entwined as it was with profuse Tchaikovsky quotations—but for the conductor's special way with anything Stravinskian.

Beecham for Boston

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits New York during the week to come, Sir Thomas Beecham will conduct its concerts for the week following its return to Boston. He will lead the fifth concert in the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall on Jan. 22, the thirteenth pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts on Jan. 25 and 26, and the third concert of the Sunday afternoon series on Jan. 27.

Sir Thomas will play the same program for all concerts. It will consist of the suite he arranged from Handel's opera, "The Faithful Shepherd"; the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; two short works by Frederick Delius—Marche Caprice and a nocturne, "Summer Night on the River"; and the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Le Coq d'Or."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 12 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 12th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. William Primrose, viola, was the soloist. The program:
"Harold in Italy" ..... Berlioz
Concerto for Viola ..... Bartok
"Baiser de la Fee" ..... Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"Pointing to these manuscript sheets, I inquired about the viola concerto. Bartok nodded wearily towards the night table, saying 'yes, that is the viola concerto.' To my question as to whether it was completed, his reply was 'yes and no.' He explained that while in the sketches the work was by and large finished, the details and the scoring had not yet been worked out." The following day the composer was taken to the hospital, and five days later he had died.

This is a quotation of Tibor Serly as printed in John Burk's program notes for this concert. In it hangs one of the strangest tales in contemporary music. For, exactly as Suessmayr completed Mozart's Requiem, Serly completed Bartok's viola concerto. The results, on the strength of one hearing yesterday afternoon as William Primrose gave the work its first Boston performance, have much in common. That is to say it is clear that both the Requiem and the Concerto might have been, and in many ways are, masterworks of the first order.

As in the case of the Requiem, the principal melodic lines of the concerto are apparently those of the author. The rest, which is to say the details of the extension of these lines in virtuoso passage-work of decoration, of voice leading in the contrapuntal textures, of harmonies and of instrumentation, is the work of Serly. And it must be said that it is in every way a compliment to his integrity; no dead composer ever had a more devoted posthumous amanuensis than Bartok in Serly.

Masterly Glimpse

Yet there is no sense in claiming that Bartok would have scored his concerto the way Serly did any more than Brahms would have scored his own G minor Piano Quartet for orchestra the way Schoenberg did. The Bartok method is often there, but the Bartok sound often isn't. For example, I am sure Bartok would never have written the harmonies and figures of the transition from the slow movement to the finale Still, saving this and various other reservations, there is little doubt that Mr. Serly has given us a masterly glimpse at what might have been one of Bartok's crowning achievements: a work of noble proportions for that noble but neglected instrument, the viola.

The line for the viola is striking throughout, though again to what extent Serly and Mr. Primrose himself edited it is not possible to say. The music exploits the instrument to give it a strong, virile character in contrast to the more feminine character given it by other writers for the viola, including Berlioz (whose "Harold," incidentally, is very happily programmed with it). In the slow movement, one of Bartok's finest melodic inspirations, the more melting tones of the viola are heard to great advantage, but no other work more powerfully displays its possibilities as a solo instrument than this.

It goes without saying that Mr. Primrose, who commissioned the concerto, is capable of mastering the difficulties of the work in a way to emphasize the latent brilliance of his instrument. The work, to be sure, is of a deep emotional hue; even melancholy to the point of tragedy, but the strength of the substance, and of Mr. Primrose's playing, makes it an invigorating experience. Needless to say, the violist made a deep impression with the work and, in the Berlioz that preceded it, achieved a great popular success

It may be added that Mr. Ansermet's reading of the Berlioz, though not quite so urgent and orgiastic as we have often heard it before, was notable for clarity of phrase and transparency of texture, the orchestra playing beautifully for him. Stravinsky's ballet suite "Baiser de la Fee" was exquisitely done too. The work is one of Stravinsky's most delightful; a piece in the most romantic vein, filled with tenderness and charm. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on January 25 with Sir Thomas Beecham as guest conductor.

THE STARS AND STRIPES

Boston Symphony to Tour Europe

Cultural Congress Extends Bid For May

PARIS (Special)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring, it was announced here. Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux will conduct.

The company of 104 musicians will give three concerts in Paris in May as a major American contribution to "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," the month-long exposition of the arts which is aimed at focusing attention on the cultural achievements made by free men during the last 50 years. The exposition will open in Paris April 29 and continue through May, centering about the Théâtre des Champs Elysées.

The Paris exposition will dramatize the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to demonstrate the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to show the soundness of freedom of work and expression. To this end, "Masterpieces of the 20th Century" will present outstanding works in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, which will present the Alban Berg opera, "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cécilia in Rome, the RIAS (Radio in American Sector) Orchestra from West Berlin, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields, American artists will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which Georges Balanchine is artistic director. The group will give six performances, one comprising the ballets of Igor Stravinsky, to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being made for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thompson-Gertrude Stein opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Art Exhibition

James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch and American paintings, including some that have not been shown in Paris for many years. Prominent American men of letters will participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will embark for Europe April 23, immediately upon conclusion of its 71st season in Symphony Hall.

Under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the orchestra plans also during its tour abroad to perform in Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Zurich, as well as in Belgium, Holland and Austria.

French Invitation

Since Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitsky as musical director of the Boston Symphony in 1949, the Alsatian-born conductor has maintained the celebrated orchestra at the peak to which it was brought in the 25 years of Koussevitsky's leadership. It was under Munch's direction that the Boston Symphony played a "command" performance in Washington last April during the visit of French President Vincent Auriol which won a warm invitation from Auriol to bring the orchestra to France.

Monteux, Munch's friend and colleague on the podium, is the only other living conductor of the nine who have led the Boston Symphony since its founding in 1881. Paris-born, with a distinguished musical background in that city, Monteux was the Boston orchestra's conductor from 1919 to 1924. At present, he is conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Munch, Monteux Will Share Baton

[68]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 13 1952

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

MINORITY opinions have their place. This one protests the choice of the Music Critics' Circle of Howard Swanson's "Short Symphony" as "the best orchestral work performed in New York" between October, 1950, and January, 1952. I have nothing against Mr. Swanson. I congratulate him and rejoice with him in this award. The fact that he is an American composer pleases me all the more, especially when European works were also voted upon for the first time in the existence of the Music Critics Circle.

I simply wish to go on record that in my opinion Honegger's Fifth Symphony is a finer work. The Swanson Symphony was selected on the fourth ballot after Swanson's "Short Symphony," Honegger's Fifth, and William Schuman's Sixth came out a triple tie on the first ballot. One wonders what induced a shift of votes sufficient to give the "Short Symphony" the majority.

* * *

Brevity is certainly a source of pleasure in Swanson's Symphony. It makes good listening. It has been neatly contrived and is inherently musical. To say it is cute is in no way derogatory.

The fact that Honegger's Symphony is longer is of no consequence. Its seriousness, however, its depth, and its notable skill do make a difference. Dedicated to the eternal note of sadness, it moves through its dark contrapuntal channels with tragic impact before it climbs up into a certain sense of serenity. It was not without keen discernment that Charles Munch chose it for the November Boston Symphony Concert dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. For me it is a work of much more substance, to say nothing of greater skill.

* * *

Glancing back at my reviews on the occasion of the first New York performances of both works, I find that without any thought of comparison I felt this way from the start. That others must have felt the same way does not establish this minority opinion as right. Believing as I did, I stand my ground and herewith voice my protest of "the best orchestral work."

The other awards I heartily indorse. Of course, the results agree with my opinion. In opera, the award went to Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge." In choral music it went to Britten's "Spring" Symphony. In music for the dance, it went to Schuman's ballet "Judith."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 13 1952

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By ROSS PARMENTER

THERE is a stirring in conducting assignments. Part of it has been caused by Charles Munch's illness lasting longer than was expected. It was hoped he would be back on the Boston Symphony's podium this month, but it has been learned that Ernest Ansermet, who is pinch-hitting for him, has been engaged to conduct the orchestra until late in February. But Mr. Ansermet will have a rest next week while Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the orchestra for three performances.

The fact that Pierre Monteux is retiring from the San Francisco Symphony at the end of this season is also causing some of the stir. Next season it is expected that the orchestra will carry on with guest conductors. Mr. Monteux is not quitting conducting, though, and next summer he will lead some of the concerts at the Berkshire Festival.

Dimitri Mitropoulos will be at the head of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony again and he will lead a larger proportion of the 1952-53 season than he is leading the current year, when he is directing sixteen of the orchestra's twenty-eight weeks. Rumors of departure notwithstanding, George Szell is also continuing with the Cleveland Symphony next season.

STRAVINSKY: The Metropolitan Opera has not yet announced

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Boston Sy... ony to Tour Europe

The Boston ... has accepted ... invitation ... Congress ... tural Free... ance in Eu... Munch ha... share in ... Paris in ... the Vien... monic Or... Chorus ... Orchestr... la Suiss... Conserva... City Ball... from the ... son's ope... The Bosto... Holland, ... Western Ge... fortnight ... the auspic... tural Free...

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Pierre Monteux Will Conduct At Tanglewood

NEW YORK—Pierre Monteux, who is retiring as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, will lead some of the concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, next summer, according to the New York Times.

According to the Times "there is a stirring in conducting assignments" throughout the country, part of which has been caused by the illness of Charles Munch. It was hoped Mr. Munch would be back as conductor of the Boston Symphony this month, but it has been learned Ernest Ansermet, who is pinch hitting for him, has been engaged to conduct the BSO until late in February.

Next week Sir Thomas Beecham will conduct the Boston Symphony for three performances.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To return once more to the subject of Charles Munch's illness, one of the anticipated pleasures of which it has apparently deprived us is the appearance, as soloist in an all-Wagner program, of Kirsten Flagstad. From such an event certain diehards might absent themselves, being unwilling to forgive the Norwegian soprano for rejoining her quisling husband, though no one actually has ever succeeded in proving that the singer herself was friendly to the Nazi cause. Anyway, Mr. Bing brought Mme. Flagstad back to the Met, something his predecessor had not dared to do, and soon she will rejoin that organization in its revival of Gluck's "Alceste" (in English).

* * *

The principal feature of the Symphony's Flagstad concert was to be a performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," probably with Mr. Svanholm as Siegmund, and the plan was to put that performance on records. Mr. Munch has not yet given us concertized opera and it would have been (or will be) interesting to see what he would do in that direction. Apparently he is even less experienced in opera than Koussevitzy was, yet the latter gave us the First Act of "Walkuere," the third of "Siegfried," the third of Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and but for the difficulty of obtaining Russian singers after the war started would have given us part of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

* * *

The whole issue of singers at symphony concerts is an intriguing one and bound up with the evolution of public taste. In the first part of the last century an orchestral concert, or "grand concert" as they would call it, might consist of an overture at the beginning and end, and perhaps one in the middle, with the rest devoted to vocal numbers, solo and ensemble, orchestrally accompanied. Our ancestors had healthy appetites, as far as entertainment went; they got to their places of amusement early and remained late. If they arrived late enough they got the benefit of the low "second price," which on very special occasions was dispensed with.

* * *

Our forebears also liked variety. What we call comic opera came about when short skits, called intermezzi, were introduced between the acts of a serious opera. Even in the last century, opera, drama, ballet and instrumental solos would be combined in one evening's gargantuan entertainment. Pianists like Lizst and Clara Schumann made history by giving the whole concert themselves, with no singer, or possibly fiddler, to help out. It was not uncommon for instrumental artists to appear, as an additional attraction, at a performance of opera or drama, playing before the show, after it, and between the acts, rather than risk a concert of their own.

* * *

It was not so long ago that singers would have a violinist or cellist spell them in the course of a recital and possibly furnish an obbligato in one or more of the numbers on the program. Even today some vocalists balk at occupying the stage for an afternoon or evening and have their accompanist furnish a group of solos along the way, though distinctly this is not done to satisfy a popular craving for variety.

* * *

The New York Philharmonic recently gave its 5000th concert, and almost on anniversary of the first, which took place on Dec. 7, 1842. The conductor's name was not mentioned on the program and, in fact, there were three: Ureli Corelli Hill (that really was his name), who founded the orchestra; D. G. Etienne and H. C. Timm. The musical fare offered was of the mixed variety: Orchestral, vocal and chamber music. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the "Oberon" Overture of Weber and an overture in D by Kalliwoda, revived out of sentiment at the 5000th concert, were the orchestral pieces; the third number was a quintet by Hummel, and the rest was operatic: arias by Mozart, Beethoven and Weber and a duet from Rossini's forgotten "Armida."

* * *

The Boston Symphony did some better at its first concert on Oct. 2, 1881. There was the still inevitable singer—Annie Louise Cary, who offered an air from Gluck's "Orpheus" and another from Bruch's "Odysseus"—but the rest was orchestral and consisted of Overtures by Beethoven and Weber, a Haydn Symphony and the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde."

* * *

Fifty years later, Sir George Henschel again led the Orchestra in the same program, but not quite the same. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude replaced the already outmoded "Jubilee" Overture of Weber; and there was no singer.

* * *

Koussevitzky did not dispense with soloists by an means, but he did cut down their number, and as far as the singers were concerned, he used them when the work that he wished to program called for them, but he did not let them appear in their own right, picking their own numbers to perform. In Boston, I suspect, those days are gone forever. Having Mme. This or That show up and sing an aria or two would strike us now as distinctly novel, though some would not object. What would seem even quainter would be to have a singer offer a group of songs with the conductor at the piano — not that Munch, any more than Koussevitzky or Monteux, could fill that role. But in the old days it used to be done. One singer, Marcella Sembrich, even accompanied herself. But that was only as an encore, she being of the privileged few that were allowed to give them. Yes, times have changed.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1952

Boston Symphony to Play Series Of Concerts at Paris Festival

New York —UP— The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the over-all title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R. I. A. S (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein Opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

This Clipping From
BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

Music World

...YORK, Jan. 12 —(U.P.)— ...Symphony Orchestra ...d an invitation from ...ss For Cultural Freedom ...its first appearance in Eu... ...t spring.

...aggregation of 104 play... ...ve three concerts in Paris ...t will be regarded as a ... ...ntribution from the Uni... ...to a month-long exposit... ...arts. The exposition is air... ...using the attention of ... ...upon the cultural achie... ...by free men during the f... ...the 20th century.

...festival will open in ... ...capitol on April 29 and ...hrough May. Charles Mu... ...sical director of the orch... ...s invited his colleague, Pi... ...ux, to share with him ...ting the concerts.

...nced by philanthropic ... ...the Paris exposition of ... ...a dramatization of the ...f the Congress for Cult... ...m to assert the existence ... culture in the free world. ...hat end, the Paris cavalc... ...bears the overall title" M... ...es of the 20th Century." ...undisputed bests in... ...of symphony, opera, ba... ...a, art, literature and ph...

...Boston Symphony Orc... ...ll join in Paris with ... ...f the free world's celebr... ...organizations as the ...tate Opera presenting ...Berg opera "Wozzeck;" ...Philharmonic Orches... ...orus and orchestra of ...y of St. Cecilia in Ro... ...I.A.S. (Radio) Orche... ...Vest Berlin; the Orche... ...Suisse Romande, from G... ...he Orchestre du Conse... ...nd the Orchestre Natio... ...om Paris.

...her fields the United St... ...represented by the ...City Ballet Company, ...George Balanchine is ...irector, in six performa... ...ogram of ballets with m... ...Stravinsky to be condu... ...composer. Plans are b... ...ted for an all-Negro c... ...o perform the Virgil Th... ...rtrude Stein opera "... ...in Three Acts."

...del Rosario, a 15-year... ...from the Philippines ...ist with The New York P... ...nic-Symphony Orchestra ...e baton of Igor Buketof... ...ie Hall on Saturday, Ja... ...be the second in the ...eries of Philharmonic y... ...'s concerts for boys and ...n the ages of nine and ...del Rosario is at prese... ...rship student at the C... ...te of Music in Philadel... ...as chosen by Vladimir H... ...lin Downes and Abram C... ...om among musically-g... ...olitan New York are... ...the 1951 finalists in ... ...WQQXR's "Musical T... ...Schools" broadcast ser... ...del Rosario began her ... ...in Manila under the ...r her mother at the a... ...nd a half. When the Ja... ...vaded the Philippines, ...os fled to safety in ...ainous interior, leavin... ...household effects and pe... ...essions behind them. ...ra del Rosario was re... ...ot even war should p... ...uld from developing th... ...ble talent she had ... ...determined mother p... ...0 men of the community ... risk of their lives, w... ...rts to carry Nena's sma... ...piano over rice paddie... ...nd down steep trails ...ain retreat where the ... ...as able to continue he... ...ce throughout the war

...ARTFORD.CO...
.../17/52

Betty A...

By MARY LYNCH

...y Allen, young Negr... ...rano will be the gue... ...th the Hartford Stri... ...a at its tenth anniv... ...rt, on Sunday, Janua... ...p. m. in the Weaver...

...ugh only 24, she h... ...attracted the attent... ...nding musicians. Las... ...hile a scholarship s... ...glewood, she sang ... ..."Aida" in a product... ...scenes and also w... ...when the "Jere... ...ony by Leonard Be... ...erformed. This past ... ...e went to the sem... ...Blanche Thebom au... ...New York every y... ...etropolitan soprano ...vsky, famous coa... ...panist for Lotte Le... ...gh praise for the ...

...viewed yesterday.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 13 1952

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

MINORITY opinions have their place. This one protests the choice of the Music Critics' Circle of Howard Swanson's "Short Symphony" as "the best orchestral work performed in New York" between October, 1950, and January, 1952. I have nothing against Mr. Swanson. I congratulate him and rejoice with him in this award. The fact that he is an American composer pleases me all the more, especially when European works were also voted upon for the first time in the existence of the Music Critics Circle.

I simply wish to go on record that in my opinion Honegger's Fifth Symphony is a finer work. The Swanson Symphony was selected on the fourth ballot after Swanson's "Short Symphony," Honegger's Fifth, and William Schuman's Sixth came out a triple tie on the first ballot. One wonders what induced a shift of votes sufficient to give the "Short Symphony" the majority.

* * *

Brevity is certainly a source of pleasure in Swanson's Symphony. It makes good listening. It has been neatly contrived and is inherently musical. To say it is cute is in no way derogatory.

The fact that Honegger's Symphony is longer is of no consequence. Its seriousness, however, its depth, and its notable skill do make a difference. Dedicated to the eternal note of sadness, it moves through its dark contrapuntal channels with tragic impact before it climbs up into a certain sense of serenity. It was not without keen discernment that Charles Munch chose it for the November Boston Symphony Concert dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. For me it is a work of much more substance, to say nothing of greater skill.

* * *

Glancing back at my reviews on the occasion of the first New York performances of both works, I find that without any thought of comparison I felt this way from the start. That others must have felt the same way does not establish this minority opinion as right. Believing as I did, I stand my ground and herewith voice my protest of "the best orchestral work."

The other awards I heartily indorse. Of course, the results agree with my opinion. In opera, the award went to Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge." In choral music it went to Britten's "Spring" Symphony. In music for the dance, it went to Schuman's ballet "Judith."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 13 1952

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By ROSS PARMENTER

THERE is a stirring in conducting assignments. Part of it has been caused by Charles Munch's illness lasting longer than was expected. It was hoped he would be back on the Boston Symphony's podium this month, but it has been learned that Ernest Ansermet, who is pinch-hitting for him, has been engaged to conduct the orchestra until late in February. But Mr. Ansermet will have a rest next week while Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the orchestra for three performances.

The fact that Pierre Monteux is retiring from the San Francisco Symphony at the end of this season is also causing some of the stir. Next season it is expected that the orchestra will carry on with guest conductors. Mr. Monteux is not quitting conducting, though, and next summer he will lead some of the concerts at the Berkshire Festival.

Dimitri Mitropoulos will be at the head of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony again and he will lead a larger proportion of the 1952-53 season than he is leading the current year, when he is directing sixteen of the orchestra's twenty-eight weeks. Rumors of departure notwithstanding, George Szell is also continuing with the Cleveland Symphony next season.

STRAVINSKY: The Metropolitan Opera has not yet announced

3
This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 15 1952

Boston Symphony to Tour Europe

The Boston [illegible]phony has accepted an invitation from [illegible]ne Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring. Charles Munch has in[illegible]d Pierre Monteux to share in con[illegible]ng three concerts in Paris in May. [illegible] series also presenting the Vienna S[illegible] Opera and Philharmonic Orchestra, the St. Cecilia Academy Chorus and Or[illegible]estra of Rome, RIAS Orchestra of [illegible] Berlin, Orchestre de la Suisse-Rom[illegible] Paris National and Conservatoire [illegible]chestras, New York City Ballet, a [illegible]n all-Negro company from the U. S[illegible]senting Virgil Thomson's opera, [illegible] Saints in Three Acts. The Boston S[illegible]phony also will visit Holland, Belgium, Bordeaux, Zurich, Western Germa[illegible] and Austria during its fortnight abroad, to give concerts under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedo[illegible]

Munch's Illne[illegible] From San

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 14 1952

[illegible]ierre Monteux [illegible]ill Conduct [illegible]t Tanglewood

NEW YORK—Pierre Monteux, who is retiring as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season, will lead some of the concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, next summer, according to the New York Times.

According to the Times "there is a stirring in conducting assignments" throughout the country, part of which has been caused by the illness of Charles Munch. It was hoped Mr. Munch would be back as conductor of the Boston Symphony this month, but it has been learned Ernest Ansermet, who is pinch hitting for him, has been engaged to conduct the BSO until late in February.

Next week Sir Thomas Beecham will conduct the Boston Symphony for three performances.

[illegible]/13/52 Boston Post

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To return once more to the subject of Charles Munch's illness, one of the anticipated pleasures of which it has apparently deprived us is the appearance, as soloist in an all-Wagner program, of Kirsten Flagstad. From such an event certain diehards might absent themselves, being unwilling to forgive the Norwegian soprano for rejoining her quisling husband, though no one actually has ever succeeded in proving that the singer herself was friendly to the Nazi cause. Anyway, Mr. Bing brought Mme. Flagstad back to the Met, something his predecessor had not dared to do, and soon she will rejoin that organization in its revival of Gluck's "Alceste" (in English).

* * *

The principal feature of the Symphony's Flagstad concert was to be a performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," probably with Mr. Svanholm as Siegmund, and the plan was to put that performance on records. Mr. Munch has not yet given us concertized opera and it would have been (or will be) interesting to see what he would do in that direction. Apparently he is even less experienced in opera than Koussevitzky was, yet the latter gave us the First Act of "Walkuere," the third of "Siegfried," the third of Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and but for the difficulty of obtaining Russian singers after the war started would have given us part of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

* * *

The whole issue of singers at symphony concerts is an intriguing one and bound up with the evolution of public taste. In the first part of the last century an orchestral concert, or "grand concert" as they would call it, might consist of an overture at the beginning and end, and perhaps one in the middle, with the rest devoted to vocal numbers, solo and ensemble, orchestrally accompanied. Our ancestors had healthy appetites, as far as entertainment went; they got to their places of amusement early and remained late. If they arrived late enough they got the benefit of the low "second price," which on very special occasions was dispensed with.

* * *

Our forebears also liked variety. What we call comic opera came about when short skits, called intermezzi, were introduced between the acts of a serious opera. Even in the last century, opera, drama, ballet and instrumental solos would be combined in one evening's gargantuan entertainment. Pianists like Liszt and Clara Schumann made history by giving the whole concert themselves, with no singer, or possibly fiddler, to help out. It was not uncommon for instrumental artists to appear as an additional attraction, at a performance of opera or drama, playing before the show, after it, and between the acts, rather than risk a concert of their own.

* * *

It was not so long ago that singers would have a violinist or cellist spell them in the course of a recital and possibly furnish an obbligato in one or more of the numbers on the program. Even today some vocalists balk at occupying the stage for an afternoon or evening and have their accompanist furnish a group of solos along the way, though distinctly this is not done to satisfy a popular craving for variety.

* * *

The New York Philharmonic recently gave its 5000th concert, and almost on anniversary of the first, which took place on Dec. 7, 1842. The conductor's name was not mentioned on the program and, in fact, there were three: Ureli Corelli Hill (that really was his name), who founded the orchestra; D. G. Etienne and H. C. Timm. The musical fare offered was of the mixed variety: Orchestral, vocal and chamber music. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the "Oberon" Overture of Weber and an overture in D by Kalliwoda, revived out of sentiment at the 5000th concert, were the orchestral pieces; the third number was a quintet by Hummel, and the rest was operatic; arias by Mozart, Beethoven and Weber and a duet from Rossini's forgotten "Armida."

* * *

The Boston Symphony did some better at its first concert on Oct. 2, 1881. There was the still inevitable singer—Annie Louise Cary, who offered an air from Gluck's "Orpheus" and another from Bruch's "Odysseus"—but the rest was orchestral and consisted of Overtures by Beethoven and Weber, a Haydn Symphony and the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde."

* * *

Fifty years later, Sir George Henschel again led the Orchestra in the same program, but not quite the same. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude replaced the already outmoded "Jubilee" Overture of Weber; and there was no singer.

* * *

Koussevitzky did not dispense with soloists by an means, but he did cut down their number, and as far as the singers were concerned, he used them when the work that he wished to program called for them, but he did not let them appear in their own right, picking their own numbers to perform. In Boston, I suspect, those days are gone forever. Having Mme. This or That show up and sing an aria or two would strike us now as distinctly novel, though some would not object. What would seem even quainter would be to have a singer offer a group of songs with the conductor at the piano — not that Munch, any more than Koussevitzky or Monteux, could fill that role. But in the old days it used to be done. One singer, Marcella Sembrich, even accompanied herself. But that was only as an encore, she being of the privileged few that were allowed to give them. Yes, times have changed.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1952

Boston Symphony to Play Series Of Concerts at Paris Festival

New York —UP— The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the over-all title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R. I. A. S (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein Opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

[69]

PASTE OVER

This Clipping From
BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

Music World

NEW YORK, Jan. 12 —(U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe the next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capitol on April 29 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, dramma, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horowitz, Olin Downes and Abram Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at the risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

Music loving pilgrims will gather in White Springs, Fla., on the banks of the Suwanee River, on Jan. 13 to pay homage to the memory of Stephen Collins Foster, just 88 years from the day that America's beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward at New York City's Bellevue Hospital.

He had 38 cents in his purse—a penny for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

Their shrine will be the Foster memorial museum erected by the State of Florida and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's memorial to its favorite composer is situated on the banks of the river made immortal by his "Way Down Upon The Suwanee River," and surrounded by 243 acres of woodland embracing both sides of the gentle stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks at Home." The Foster memorial is an impressive southern colonial building housing eight dioramas depicting Foster's most popular songs and other Foster relics.

The young American coloratura soprano, Graciela Rivera, has been added to the Metropolitan Opera's roster of artists for the current season. Miss Rivera appeared last fall with the New York City Opera, and early in December in solo recital at Carnegie Hall.

Born in Puerto Rico, Graciela Rivera began her musical studies there and continued her vocal training on scholarships won at the Juilliard School in New York. In 1945, she made her professional debut as Adele in "Rosalinda," the New Opera Company's adaption of "Fledermaus," singing her role more than 200 times on tour and overseas with the U.S.O. She has appeared extensively here and abroad.

GARFIELD, N.J.
NEWS
1/17/52

The World of Music

NEW YORK The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S (Radio) Orchestra from West Brelin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horowitz, Olin Downes and Abram Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 16 1952

Boston Symphony, Soloist Show Rare Form in Annual Concert at Conn. College

By ALBERT C. AMATO

The mere knowledge that the Boston symphony is returning creates a special atmosphere of festive expectation that no other concert group which has appeared locally can quite match. The annual appearance of this ensemble last night at Palmer auditorium provided another example of the unique artistry of this wonderful organization. On this occasion interest was further augmented by the announcement that we were to hear a budding, young violinist of considerable talent; but above all we were to witness in action another of the world's first-line conductors. Let me state right here that soloist, conductor and orchestra were in rare form.

The initial disappointment at not having Charles Munch in charge of the orchestra was considerably dinminished—and I may say entirely overcome—by the distinguished work of Ernest Ansermet. Mr. Munch, who has been seriously ill with a virus infection and subsequently with a circulatory disturbance, has had his place on the podium occupied first by Pierre Monteux and presently by Mr. Ansermet, regular conductor of the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande in Geneva. It was astonishing how much Mr. Ansermet in his brief period with the orchestra has transformed its sound and imposed his own appealing personality on it; and yet, it still remains the homogeneous, subtly responsive ensemble we have always known it to be.

Beethoven's C-Minor

Some of us may be at variance with Mr. Ansermet's reading of the Beethoven C-minor. The Fifth Symphony, with its imperious V-theme in the first and third movements, is a work which assumed vast political significance for all free men during the late war. This conductor's approach to it is on the whole in a lyrical and subdued vein as against the more militant interpretations which we are accustomed to hear nowadays. All arguments to the contrary, there are moments—for example, the tremendous crescendo which encompasses the transition from the 3rd to the 4th movement—which deservedly require an explosive outburst. But these are petty grievances, especially if one recalls the beauty and grace accorded the lovely andante movement—truly one of Beethoven's most inspired creations.

The Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D-major which constituted the larger portion of the post-intermission program is the composer's only complete example as is the case with the Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Brahms violin concertos. It was dedicated to the Hungarian violinist, Leopold Auer, then principal teacher of violin at the Leningrad conservatory. But Auer considered it so unviolinistic that he could not at the time make up his mind to grapple with its formidable difficulties, and he would not play it.

Violinist is Soloist

Anshel Brusilow, a 23 year old American born and American trained violinist, did wondrous justice to this prodigiously technical work. His playing was laudable both for vitality and momentum and occasional delicacy and fineness of dynamic shading. His is not a large tone; however, it possesses considerable carrying quality, especially did it seem so within the confines of Palmer auditorium. The highlights of his performance to this reviewer were his facile mastery of the first movement cadenza, the expressivity of the tender national melody of the adagio, and the surmounting of the technical development of the final movement, in reality a Russian dance—the Trekap. One can only envision a most brilliant future for this remarkable young artist.

The magnificence of rapport between the conductor and his men was best exemplified in the Stravinsky Divertimento, sub-titled The Fairy's Kiss, the closing composition.

Evening Well Spent

The music of Stravinsky, Ravel and Debussy is close to Mr. Ansermet's heart and he has a world-wide reputation for the brilliance he brings to these 20th century masterpieces. The Divertimento adheres to a firmer melodic line than do most works by this composer, basically because its principal themes are Tchaikovskyan melodies. But it is still characteristic and tasty Stravinsky just the same, with its intriguing rhythms and sumptuous coloristic effects.

Finally, I want to compliment the woodwind section in general for the admirable blending of their instrumental voices, and the first clarinetist, Mr. Cioffi, in particular for the silky, celestial tone and perfect intonation demonstrated in the solo passages. This will remain a cherished memory with me along with the other exalted moments of a delightfully spent evening.

ELLSWORTH, ME
AMERICAN
1/16/52

Monteux To Conduct Boston Symphony On European Tour

Pierre Monteux of Hancock, following his current final season with the San Francisco Symphony has accepted an invitation to be co-conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony on its first tour of Europe next spring, it was announced in the East yesterday.

The chief reason for the Boston orchestra's trip abroad will be to perform three concerts during the month-long Paris Exposition of the Congress for Cultural Freedom in May. Monteux received his invitation from Charles Munch, regular Boston conductor.

In addition to its Paris visit the Boston orchestra will play in Belgium, Holland, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Vienna and Zurich.

Sponsored by private donors, the Paris Exposition plans to give a monumental demonstration of the cultural achievements of the free democratic world during the last half century.

Its musical program will include performances of the Vienna State Opera, the Vienna Philharmonic the Accademia Cecilia orchestra and chorus of Rome; the Radio West Berlin orchestra, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande and the Paris Conservatoire and Nationale orchestras.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
JAN 17 1952

Ansermet At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

How Ernest Ansermet performed Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night should remain a vivid memory for a long time. His unfolding of the score was a revelation of insight, of sensitivity to orchestral textures and of experience.

Only long acquaintance with this music could have yielded the subtleties disclosed on this occasion. The performance included the first and fourth scenes and the final tragedy of Petrouchka. Its most remarkable moments came at the end though one heard many details elsewhere left untouched in other interpretations.

The Swiss conductor brought the authority of a master musician, the essence of quality, and epitome of good taste to this concert. The orchestra responded in kind. The approach may not have created the most satisfying kind of performance in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, but it did for Ravel's "Ma Mere L'Oye" and the Stravinsky.

Ansermet presented the classic Beethoven. The grandeur of his concept was one not of shattering brilliance but almost of under-statement. Its strength was structural projection, an overall grasp of a whole movement and the work in its entirety. Deliberate pacing and cumulative effect shaped its character. And its character was solid and fine.

It was a pleasure to hear the Ravel so beautifully fashioned and so lovingly played. The work became reclaimed with this performance, suggesting that it is not easy

Betty Allen Here

By MARY LYNCH

Betty Allen, young Negro mezzo-soprano will be the guest artist with the Hartford String Orchestra at its tenth anniversary concert, on Sunday, January 20, at 3 p. m. in the Weaver High School.

Though only 24, she has already attracted the attention of outstanding musicians. Last summer while a scholarship student at Tanglewood, she sang Amneris in "Aida" in a production of Opera scenes and also was the soloist when the "Jeremiah" Symphony by Leonard Bernstein was performed. This past December she went to the semi-finals in the Blanche Thebom auditions held in New York every year by the Metropolitan soprano. Paul Ulanowsky, famous coach and accompanist for Lotte Lehmann has high praise for the young singer.

Interviewed yesterday, Miss Allen stressed the fact that as a young Negro singer she finds sympathy and encouragement everywhere in contrast to even a few years ago, when the Negro artist felt that if they were not a Marion Anderson or Dorothy Maynor, they had little chance to be heard.

The singer is a student in voice of Sarah Peck Moore. She studies piano, theory and modern dance at the Hartford School of Music.

West Hartford players and contributors of the orchestra, who have a ten year record are: Mr. and Mrs. Frank Becker, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Roger M. Eldred, Mr. and Mrs. C. Walton Deckelman, Dr. and Mrs. Forrest D. Gibson, Miss Mary Gumbus, Miss Miriam Guleserian, Miss Marie Lipps, Mr. Edward Lorenz, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Nickels, Mr. Edward C. Roberts, and Mr. and Mrs. Francois Roulier.

PASTE OVER

This Clipping From
BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

Music World

NEW YORK, Jan. 12 — (U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capitol on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horowitz, Olin Downes and Abram Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at the risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

Music loving pilgrims will gather in White Springs, Fla., on the banks of the Suwanee River, on Jan. 13 to pay homage to the memory of Stephen Collins Foster, just 88 years from the day that America's beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward at New York City's Bellevue Hospital.

He had 38 cents in his purse—a penny for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

Their shrine will be the Foster memorial museum erected by the State of Florida and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's memorial to its favorite composer is situated on the banks of the river made immortal by his "Way Down Upon The Suwanee River," and surrounded by 243 acres of woodland embracing both sides of the gentle stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks at Home." The Foster memorial is an impressive southern colonial building housing eight dioramas depicting Foster's most popular songs and other Foster relics.

The young American coloratura soprano, Graciela Rivera, has been added to the Metropolitan Opera's roster of artists for the current season. Miss Rivera appeared last fall with the New York City Opera, and early in December in solo recital at Carnegie Hall.

Born in Puerto Rico, Graciela Rivera began her musical studies there and continued her vocal training on scholarships won at the Juilliard School in New York. In 1945, she made her professional debut as Adele in "Rosalinda," the New Opera Company's adaption of "Fledermaus," singing her role more than 200 times on tour and overseas with the U.S.O. She has appeared extensively here and abroad.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 15 1952

Symphony to Tour Europe

Boston Symph... accepted an... on from the ... ess for Cul... reedom to mal... first appear... n Europe next ... ing. Charles ... has invited ... Monteux to ... conducting ... concerts in ... May, at a se... presenting ... nna State ... nd Philhar... rchestra, the ... lia Academy ... and Orches... Rome, RIAS ... ra of West ... rchestre de ... e-Romande, ... ational and ... atoire Orche... New York ... llet, and an ... ro company ... U. S. presen... irgil Thom... era, Four Saint... Three Acts, ... ston Symphony ... will visit ... Belgium, Be... aux, Zurich, ... Germany and ... ia during its ... abroad, to give ... oncerts under ... pices of the Congress for Cul... reedom.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 14 1952

re Monteux ... Conduct ... Tanglewood

W YORK—Pierre Monteux, ... retiring as conductor of ... San Francisco Symphony ... stra at the end of this sea... will lead some of the con... at the Berkshire Music ... l, Tanglewood, next sum... According to the New York ...

...ording to the Times "there ... stirring in conducting as... ...ents" throughout the coun... ...part of which has been ... by the illness of Charles ... n. It was hoped Mr. Munch ... be back as conductor of ... Boston Symphony this ..., but it has been learned ... Ansermet, who is pinch ... for him, has been engaged ...nduct the BSO until late in ...ary.

...t week Sir Thomas ... will conduct the Boston ...hony for three perform...

The World of Music

NEW YORK The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S (Radio) Orchestra from West Brelin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horowitz, Olin Downes and Abram Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
JAN 14 1952

Ansermet At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

How Ernest Ansermet performed Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night should remain a vivid memory for a long time. His unfolding of the score was a revelation of insight, of sensitivity to orchestral textures and of experience.

Only long acquaintance with this music could have yielded the subtleties disclosed on this occasion. The performance included the first and fourth scenes and the final tragedy of Petrouchka. Its most remarkable moments came at the end though one heard many details elsewhere left untouched in other interpretations.

The Swiss conductor brought the authority of a master musician, the essence of quality, and epitome of good taste to this concert. The orchestra responded in kind. The approach may not have created the most satisfying kind of performance in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, but it did for Ravel's "Ma Mere L'Oye" and the Stravinsky.

Ansermet presented the classic Beethoven. The grandeur of his concept was one not of shattering brilliance but almost of under-statement. Its strength was structural projection, an overall grasp of a whole movement and the work in its entirety. Deliberate pacing and cumulative effect shaped its character. And its character was solid and fine.

It was a pleasure to hear the Ravel so beautifully fashioned and so lovingly played. The work became reclaimed with this performance, suggesting that it is not easy

---

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 16 1952

Boston Symphony, Soloist Show Rare Form in Annual Concert at Conn. College

By ALBERT C. AMATO

The mere knowledge that the Boston symphony is returning creates a special atmosphere of festive expectation that no other concert group which has appeared locally can quite match. The annual appearance of this ensemble last night at Palmer auditorium provided another example of the unique artistry of this wonderful organization. On this occasion interest was further augmented by the announcement that we were to hear a budding, young violinist of considerable talent; but above all we were to witness in action another of the world's first-line conductors. Let me state right here that soloist, conductor and orchestra were in rare form.

The initial disappointment at not having Charles Munch in charge of the orchestra was considerably dinminished—and I may say entirely overcome—by the distinguished work of Ernest Ansermet. Mr. Munch, who has been seriously ill with a virus infection and subsequently with a circulatory disturbance, has had his place on the podium occupied first by Pierre Monteux and presently by Mr. Ansermet, regular conductor of the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande in Geneva. It was astonishing how much Mr. Ansermet in his brief period with the orchestra has transformed its sound and imposed his own appealing personality on it; and yet, it still remains the homogeneous, subtly responsive ensemble we have always known it to be.

Beethoven's C-Minor

Some of us may be at variance with Mr. Ansermet's reading of the Beethoven C-minor. The Fifth Symphony, with its imperious V-theme in the first and third movements, is a work which assumed vast political significance for all free men during the late war. This conductor's approach to it is on the whole in a lyrical and subdued vein as against the more militant interpretations which we are accustomed to hear nowadays. All arguments to the contrary, there are moments—for example, the tremendous crescendo which encompasses the transition from the 3rd to the 4th movement—which deservedly require an explosive outburst. But these are petty grievances, especially if one recalls the beauty and grace accorded the lovely andante movement—truly one of Beethoven's most inspired creations.

The Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D-major which constituted the larger portion of the post-intermission program is the composer's only complete example as is the case with the Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Brahms violin concertos. It was dedicated to the Hungarian violinist, Leopold Auer, then principal teacher of violin at the Leningrad conservatory. But Auer considered it so unviolinistic that he could not at the time make up his mind to grapple with its formidable difficulties, and he would not play it.

Violinist is Soloist

Anshel Brusilow, a 23 year old American born and American trained violinist, did wondrous justice to this prodigiously technical work. His playing was laudable both for vitality and momentum and occasional delicacy and fineness of dynamic shading. His is not a large tone; however, it possesses considerable carrying quality, especially did it seem so within the confines of Palmer auditorium. The highlights of his performance to this reviewer were his facile mastery of the first movement cadenza, the expressivity of the tender national melody of the adagio, and the surmounting of the technical development of the final movement, in reality a Russian dance—the Trekap. One can only envision a most brilliant future for this remarkable young artist.

The magnificence of rapport between the conductor and his men was best exemplified in the Stravinsky Divertimento, sub-titled The Fairy's Kiss, the closing composition.

Evening Well Spent

The music of Stravinsky, Ravel and Debussy is close to Mr. Ansermet's heart and he has a world-wide reputation for the brilliance he brings to these 20th century masterpieces. The Divertimento adheres to a firmer melodic line than do most works by this composer, basically because its principal themes are Tchaikovskyan melodies. But it is still characteristic and tasty Stravinsky just the same, with its intriguing rhythms and sumptuous coloristic effects.

Finally, I want to compliment the woodwind section in general for the admirable blending of their instrumental voices, and the first clarinetist, Mr. Cioffi, in particular for the silky, celestial tone and perfect intonation demonstrated in the solo passages. This will remain a cherished memory with me along with the other exalted moments of a delightfully spent evening.

ELLSWORTH, ME.
AMERICAN
1/16/52

Monteux To Conduct Boston Symphony On European Tour

Pierre Monteux of Hancock, following his current final season with the San Francisco Symphony has accepted an invitation to be co-conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony on its first tour of Europe next spring, it was announced in the East yesterday.

The chief reason for the Boston orchestra's trip abroad will be to perform three concerts during the month-long Paris Exposition of the Congress for Cultural Freedom in May. Monteux received his invitation from Charles Munch, regular Boston conductor.

In addition to its Paris visit the Boston orchestra will play in Belgium, Holland, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Vienna and Zurich.

Sponsored by private donors, the Paris Exposition plans to give a monumental demonstration of the cultural achievements of the free democratic world during the last half century.

Its musical program will include performances of the Vienna State Opera, the Vienna Philharmonic the Accademia Cecilia orchestra and chorus of Rome; the Radio West Berlin orchestra, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande and the Paris Conservatoire and Nationale orchestras.

Betty Allen Here

By MARY LYNCH

Betty Allen, young Negro mezzo-soprano who ... last ... Hall ... Orchestra ... 20, ... her Hall ... is ... Marian Anderson or Dorothy Maynor, they had little chance to be heard.

The singer is a student in voice of Sarah Peck Moore. She studies piano, theory and modern dance at the Hartford School of Music.

Hartford players and contributors of the orchestra, who have a ten year record are: Mr. and Mrs. Frank Becker, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Roger M. Eldred, Mr. and Mrs. C. Walton Deckelman, Dr. and Mrs. Forrest D. Gibson, Miss Mary Gumbus, Miss Miriam Guleserian, Miss Marie Lipps, Mr. Edward Lorenz, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert L. Nickels, Mr. Edward C. Roberts, and Mr. and Mrs. Francois Roulier.

Interviewed yesterday, Miss Allen stressed the fact that as a young Negro singer she finds sympathy and encouragement everywhere in contrast to even a few years ago, when the Negro artist felt that if they were not a Marian Anderson or Dorothy Maynor, they had little chance to be heard.

[76]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 17 1952

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

Ansermet Leads Bostonians

The Swiss conductor Ernest Ansermet made his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, replacing the orchestra's still-indisposed musical director, Charles Munch.

Mr. Ansermet opened his program with the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. It seemed to me that the Swiss conductor's reading of this popular work was not up to the standard of other things he has done here. I suppose it is inevitable that when a work is performed and recorded as often as the Beethoven Fifth, the final result is a standardized performance. One becomes so accustomed to hearing it done in a certain way that one is a little astonished by any departure from the accepted norm.

Accordingly it was surprising to hear Mr. Ansermet begin the work at a somewhat lethargic and heavy-handed pace. The movement is marked "Allegro Con Brio," but the particular kind of musical excitement called "B[illegible]" was not always present. The combined ensemble of the Bostonians was ragged at places where it was most conspicuous—the sudden orchestral tutti of the opening movement, which ought to be sharp and precise as a whipcrack, and which last evening were more suggestive of a singer slurring up to a high note.

In the slow movement, it seemed to me that orchestral choirs were not always properly balanced, with the line of the theme-and-variations sometimes overwhelmed by subordinate voices.

The splendid thunders of the two final movements, however, brought the work to a conclusion that drew cheers from the capacity audience.

After the intermission, Mr. Ansermet returned to conduct works of composers with whom his name has long been associated, Ravel and Stravinsky.

Ravel was represented by his suite of five children's pieces, "Ma Mere L'Oye," the French equivalent of Mother Goose. Ravel was at his best in this sort of droll make-believe—his opera, "L'Enfant et les Sortileges," would probably be in the standard repertory were it not inordinately difficult to stage—and "Ma Mere L'Oye" is no less charming. It received a skillful and sympathetic performance from Mr. Ansermet and the Bostonians.

The concert ended with a brilliant reading of Stavinsky's "Petrouchka." Bernard Zighera was the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
JAN 17 1952

Music

Symphonic Coup Scored By Ansermet

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

To a local season already bursting with high-grade symphonic music, the Boston Orchestra added another liberal quota in Carnegie Hall last night.

With Ernest Ansermet conducting, the visiting band played with that smooth blend of quality and content that has long been its Carnegie hallmark, plus one or two variations deriving from Mr. Ansermet's special gifts.

The program fell into two parts, Beethoven's fifth symphony occupying this side of the intermission and Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" taking up the other. It was in the second half that Mr. Ansermet made news.

Brings Out Strength.

I don't mean to minimize the power of his reading of Beethoven's C minor. It had its moments of terrific drive, even of haunting poetry. But it was marred by strange shifts of pace, and a lack of intimation in the last two movements of the big things to come.

Still, he brought out the strength of the score and with it the strength, nourished by so many geniuses of the baton, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. So much for Beethoven's fifth. It was only after the intermission that I was certain I was hearing the real Ernest Ansermet.

Ravel's garden of nursery fables flowered beautifully in last night's reading, the Sleeping Beauties and Tom Thumbs springing up like magic from a bed of shimmering tone. Mr. Ansermet conducted as if long ago the spell of enchanted forests had settled upon him and remained.

The Acid of Stravinsky.

Each section told its tale of fantasy in a texture woven of wondrous color. A mood of make-believe became living reality in the dazzling web of strange sounds. One raced down the lane of years back to a childhood of open-eyed wonder.

Even more powerful was the Stravinsky Suite, though in another way. Here Mr. Ansermet caught the acid undertones of cynicism, working them into a shattering contrast of carnival rowdiness and misfit pathos. In places the orchestra fairly rocked with bearish rhythms.

Mr. Ansermet is conducting the Boston Symphony in place of its regular conductor, Charles Munch, who was ordered to take a long rest by his doctor after almost collapsing from nervous and physical fatigue at the close of his last concert several weeks ago.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 19 1952

Rene Voisin, BSO Trumpeter, Dies in Brighton

BOSTON—Rene Louis Voisin, 58, trumpeter for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died Wednesday in St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Brighton. He had been ill intermittently during the past season.

The late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought Mr. Voisin to this country from France to play with the Boston Symphony in 1927. He had been a member of the orchestra since that time. His son, Roger, is now first trumpeter with the orchestra.

Mr. Voison was born in Angers, France, Nov. 18, 1893, the son of a noted bandmaster and cornetist. His studies at the Paris Conservatoire were interrupted during World War I. As a bandmaster and stretcher bearer in the first Battle of the Marne, he was one of 10 survivors in a group of 38 attending the wounded. He later was wounded in the Argonne and was awarded the Croix de Guerre.

He resumed his studies following the war, and it was during his appearances with the Concerts Koussevitzky that the famed maestro noted his ability. Three years after Mr. Koussevitzky came to Boston he called Mr. Voison to the orchestra. Like his father, he taught his son the trumpet.

Survivors, in addition to the son, include his widow, Marie, and two grandchildren, Pierre, aged 2, and Anne who was born six days ago.

The entire company of the Boston Symphony will interrupt its current tour to return to Boston for funeral services which will be held in the Church of Notre Dame de la Victoire, Monday at 9 AM.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1952

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Third evening concert of the orchestra's New York series; guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The program:
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven
"Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose).....Ravel
Ballet, "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third New York visit of the season with last night's concert in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting its home concerts for the last five weeks in place of its still ailing regular director, Charles Munch. The noted Swiss conductor devoted his program to well known works, but added the prelude and "Danse du Rouet" to the five original pieces of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye"; these were drawn from the ballet score which Ravel made from this two-piano work. In the Stravinsky "Petrouchka" score Mr. Ansermet included the finale, with Petrouchka's death, besides the music from this ballet which is usually heard in concert; this gave a quiet, but none the less impressive ending to an impressive evening.

This was Mr. Ansermet's first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, although he is well known here through his conducting of the NBC Symphony and two concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra. His New York debut, with the Diaghileff Ballet, dates from much farther back, to 1916. One characteristic of last night's concert was that familiar music was played not as if all too well known and taken for granted by the musicians and the audience. Another was the unity of the style of the performance with that of the music in each of the three works in the program.

To the eye, Mr. Ansermet gave no impression of overt excitement on the podium; there was economy as well as significance of gesture. The constant impression of control, however, did not offset the frequent aural impression of intensity which was added to that of thorough understanding of the three differing scores. The vividness and freshness of the performance of the Beethoven symphony were achieved without departures from the essential directness of the music; the expressive resources of the work were realized with a notable blend of vigor and delicacy. The two sections which Ravel added to "Ma Mere l'Oye" as a prelude to its orchestral version as a ballet provide an appropriate beginning to the concert suite; the interpretation was constantly imaginative and atmospheric, with a luminous orchestral tone, fineness of dynamic shading and, in the most outspoken measures, impressive sonority.

But the most memorable feature of the evening was the interpretation of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" music, with which Mr. Ansermet has been long acquainted. Here, with vividness and subtlety of orchestra color, there was an exceptional communication of the dramatic essence and the national flavor of the music; the fair scenes carried their hearers into the essential atmosphere of the old Russian popular carnival depicted in the scenario and the score. Emotional detail was realized with absorbing emotional conviction, especially at the close, where Petrouchka's ghost haunts his uncomprehending showman.

Tenor in Recital

Ernst Wolff, tenor, who sang at Town Hall last night, chose a most refreshing list of songs, including composers who represent the major core of Lieder literature (Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wolf) in addition to a liberal supply of pre-nineteenth century music.

Mr. Wolff is an energetic, but careful artist. He brings out every shade of word-meaning and every detail of story, so much so that his interpretations, particularly of early music, often border on the elocutionary. Cavalli's "Donzelle, Fuggite" and Alessandro Scarlatti's "Chi vuole innamorarsi" were given a most pin-pointed dramatic treatment, with many retards, changes of tempi, and theatrical changes in diction.

The tenor did not oversing as much in the Lieder half of his program. His voice was at times rich and golden, as in Schubert's "Die Stadt," but often it suddenly became unfocussed and watery in quality, withdrawing support from the full, reflective lines of songs such as Schumann's "Fruehlingsfahrt" and Schubert's "Geheimes." But his intentions, which shine out, are as serious and imaginative as his program-making. Paul Meyer accompanied. T. M. S.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
[illegible] 1952

LEADS BOSTONIANS—Ernest Ansermet, substituting during Charles Munch's convalescence, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music Friday night.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
[illegible] 1952

Aldo Ciccolini Boston Symphony Piano Soloist

Special to The Hart[illegible]

Boston—Aldo Ciccolini was the piano soloist with the B[illegible] Symphony and [illegible] last week, is [illegible] virtuoso, and [illegible] everything he [illegible] his playing d[illegible] turity seldom fo[illegible] of 26.

Nevertheless, [illegible] does, when the [illegible] come through with [illegible] rotechnics, as he has [illegible] the past and more espe[illegible] he did about a year or two when he played the Tchaikov[illegible] Concerto with the Boston orche[illegible]tra. It was good to see that can and does adapt his style a[illegible] in his playing of the Beethov[illegible] Fourth Piano Concerto which he performed with the Symphony this week, it was a notable transformation indeed.

* * *

If THERE can be an criticism of Mr. Ciccolini's Beethoven one might say that it is not [illegible] enough. Much attention [illegible] directed toward the mechanics of the piece, but, although the framework is solid enough, the work as a whole is not round and full and strong as perhaps Beethoven should be. Personally, I found his playing a bit on the surface—a sort of a "granular" interpretation.

However, Mr. Ciccolini gave poised and calculating performance and, despite his zealous attention to details, a poetic and sensitive one, too. He was warmly applauded by the Symphony Hall audience, and most deservedly so. We would like to hear him again soon.

Baritone Thomas L. Thomas was an engaging soloist at the Boston Morning Musicales. The Musicales are a series of recitals by noted musicians which was started a number of years ago and which, as a general rule, we don't pay much attention to since they are fairly limited to society and would be of less general interest to the public.

* * *

MR. THOMAS, however, did provide an interesting program, including a few [illegible] songs, English songs, a Flemish [illegible] and some Welsh airs. The Welsh songs all had titles which [illegible] one of the top row of the [illegible] keys, but they are [illegible] folk songs and Mr. Thomas, a Welshman himself, does them well.

"Lady Be Tranquil," and "Forlorn Queen" in the English group of songs arranged by [illegible] were amusing, and the French group included Debussy's "Beau Soir," "Chanson Triste" by Duparc, and "Femme Sensible" from Mehul's "Ariodant."—F. S.

This Clipping From
RADIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Sales of FM Radios Skyrocket in Boston

BOSTON, MASS., M[illegible] radio sales have soared in [illegible] weeks in culture-conscious B[illegible] local dealers report.

Sales of FM receivers [illegible] tured by the Zenith Ra[illegible] Chicago, have tripled in [illegible] listeners have turned [illegible] WGBH, a strictly FM [illegible] ported only by local [illegible] seums and the Boston Sym[illegible] This station broadcasts [illegible] of education and classical [illegible] weekly without advertising.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
JAN 17 1952

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

Ansermet Leads Bostonians

The Swiss conductor Ernest Ansermet made his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, replacing the orchestra's still-indisposed musical director, Charles Munch.

Mr. Ansermet opened his program with the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. It seemed to me that the Swiss conductor's reading of this popular work was not up to the standard of other things he has done here. I suppose it is inevitable that when a work is performed and recorded as often as the Beethoven Fifth, the final result is a standardized performance. One becomes so accustomed to hearing it done in a certain way that one is a little astonished by any departure from the accepted norm.

Accordingly it was surprising to hear Mr. Ansermet begin the work at a somewhat lethargic and heavy-handed pace. The movement is marked "Allegro Con Brio," but the particular kind of musical excitement called "B[illegible]" was not always present. The[illegible]med ensemble of the Bostonians was ragged at places where it was most conspicuous—the sudden orchestral tutti of the opening movement, which ought to be sharp and precise as a whipcrack, and which last evening were more suggestive of a singer slurring up to a high note.

In the slow movement, it seemed to me that orchestral choirs were not always properly balanced, with the line of the theme-and-variations sometimes overwhelmed by subordinate voices.

The splendid thunders of the two final movements, however, brought the work to a conclusion that drew cheers from the capacity audience.

After the intermission, Mr. Ansermet returned to conduct works of composers with whom his name has long been associated, Ravel and Stravinsky.

Ravel was represented by his suite of five children's pieces, "Ma Mere L'Oye," the French equivalent of Mother Goose. Ravel was at his best in this sort of droll make-believe—his opera, "L'Enfant et les Sortileges," would probably be in the standard repertory were it not inordinately difficult to stage—and "Ma Mere L'Oye" is no less charming. It received a skillful and sympathetic performance from Mr. Ansermet and the Bostonians.

The concert ended with a brilliant reading of Stavinsky's "Petrouchka." Bernard Zighera was the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
JAN 17 1952

Music

Symphonic Coup Scored By Ansermet

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

To a local season already bursting with high-grade symphonic music, the Boston Orchestra added another liberal quota in Carnegie Hall last night.

With Ernest Ansermet conducting, the visiting band played with that smooth blend of quality and content that has long been its Carnegie hallmark, plus one or two variations deriving from Mr. Ansermet's special gifts.

The program fell into two parts, Beethoven's fifth symphony occupying this side of the intermission and Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" taking up the other. It was in the second half that Mr. Ansermet made news.

Brings Out Strength.

I don't mean to minimize the power of his reading of Beethoven's C minor. It had its moments of terrific drive, even of haunting poetry. But it was marred by strange shifts of pace, and a lack of intimation in the last two movements of the big things to come.

Still, he brought out the strength of the score and with it the strength, nourished by so many geniuses of the baton, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. So much for Beethoven's fifth. It was only after the intermission that I was certain I was hearing the real Ernest Ansermet.

Ravel's garden of nursery fables flowered beautifully in last night's reading, the Sleeping Beauties and Tom Thumbs springing up like magic from a bed of shimmering tone. Mr. Ansermet conducted as if long ago the spell of enchanted forests had settled upon him and remained.

The Acid of Stravinsky.

Each section told its tale of fantasy in a texture woven of wondrous color. A mood of make-believe became living reality in the dazzling web of strange sounds. One raced down the lane of years back to a childhood of open-eyed wonder.

Even more powerful was the Stravinsky Suite, though in another way. Here Mr. Ansermet caught the acid undertones of cynicism, working them into a shattering contrast of carnival rowdiness and misfit pathos. In places the orchestra fairly rocked with bearish rhythms.

Mr. Ansermet is conducting the Boston Symphony in place of its regular conductor, Charles Munch, who was ordered to take a long rest by his doctor after almost collapsing from nervous and physical fatigue at the close of his last concert several weeks ago.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 19 1952

Rene Voisin, BSO Trumpeter, Dies in Brighton

BOSTON—Rene Louis Voisin, 58, trumpeter for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died Wednesday in St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Brighton. He had been ill intermittently during the past season.

The late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought Mr. Voisin to this country from France to play with the Boston Symphony in 1927. He had been a member of the orchestra since that time. His son, Roger, is now first trumpeter with the orchestra.

Mr. Voison was born in Angers, France, Nov. 18, 1893, the son of a noted bandmaster and cornetist. His studies at the Paris Conservatoire were interrupted during World War I. As a bandmaster and stretcher bearer in the first Battle of the Marne, he was one of 10 survivors in a group of 38 attending the wounded. He later was wounded in the Argonne and was awarded the Croix de Guerre.

He resumed his studies following the war, and it was during his appearances with the Concerts Koussevitzky that the famed maestro noted his ability. Three years after Mr. Koussevitzky came to Boston he called Mr. Voison to the orchestra. Like his father, he taught his son the trumpet.

Survivors, in addition to the son, include his widow, Marie, and two grandchildren, Pierre, aged 2, and Anne who was born six days ago.

The entire company of the Boston Symphony will interrupt its current tour to return to Boston for funeral services which will be held in the Church of Notre Dame de la Victoire, Monday at 9 AM.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1952

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Third evening concert of the orchestra's New York series; guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The program:
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven
"Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose).....Ravel
Ballet, "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third New York visit of the season with last night's concert in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting its home concerts for the last five weeks in place of its still ailing regular director, Charles Munch. The noted Swiss conductor devoted his program to well known works, but added the prelude and "Danse du Rouet" to the five original pieces of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye"; these were drawn from the ballet score which Ravel made from this two-piano work. In the Stravinsky "Petrouchka" score Mr. Ansermet included the finale, with Petrouchka's death, besides the music from this ballet which is usually heard in concert; this gave a quiet, but none the less impressive ending to an impressive evening.

This was Mr. Ansermet's first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, although he is well known here through his conducting of the NBC Symphony and two concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra. His New York debut, with the Diaghileff Ballet, dates from much farther back, to 1916. One characteristic of last night's concert was that familiar music was played not as if all too well known and taken for granted by the musicians and the audience. Another was the unity of the style of the performance with that of the music in each of the three works in the program.

To the eye, Mr. Ansermet gave no impression of overt excitement on the podium; there was economy as well as significance of gesture. The constant impression of control, however, did not offset the frequent aural impression of intensity which was added to that of thorough understanding of the three differing scores. The vividness and freshness of the performance of the Beethoven symphony were achieved without departures from the essential directness of the music; the expressive resources of the work were realized with a notable blend of vigor and delicacy. The two sections which Ravel added to "Ma Mere l'Oye" as a prelude to its orchestral version as a ballet provide an appropriate beginning to the concert suite; the interpretation was constantly imaginative and atmospheric, with a luminous orchestral tone, fineness of dynamic shading and, in the most outspoken measures, impressive sonority.

But the most memorable feature of the evening was the interpretation of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" music, with which Mr. Ansermet has been long acquainted. Here, with vividness and subtlety of orchestra color, there was an exceptional communication of the dramatic essence and the national flavor of the music; the fair scenes carried their hearers into the essential atmosphere of the old Russian popular carnival depicted in the scenario and the score. Emotional detail was realized with absorbing emotional conviction, especially at the close, where Petrouchka's ghost haunts his uncomprehending showman.

Tenor in Recital

Ernst Wolff, tenor, who sang at Town Hall last night, chose a most refreshing list of songs, including composers who represent the major core of Lieder literature (Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wolf) in addition to a liberal supply of pre-nineteenth century music.

Mr. Wolff is an energetic, but careful artist. He brings out every shade of word-meaning and every detail of story, so much so that his interpretations, particularly of early music, often border on the elocutionary. Cavalli's "Donzelle, Fuggite" and Alessandro Scarlatti's "Chi vuole innamorarsi" were given a most pin-pointed dramatic treatment, with many retards, changes of tempi, and theatrical changes in diction.

The tenor did not oversing as much in the Lieder half of his program. His voice was at times rich and golden, as in Schubert's "Die Stadt," but often it suddenly became unfocussed and watery in quality, withdrawing support from the full, reflective lines of songs such as Schumann's "Fruehlingsfahrt" and Schubert's "Geheimes." But his intentions, which shine out, are as serious and imaginative as his program-making. Paul Meyer accompanied. T. M. S.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 16 1952

LEADS BOSTONIANS—Ernest Ansermet, substituting during Charles Munch's convalescence, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music Friday night.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 16 1952

Aldo Ciccolini Boston Symphony Piano Soloist

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Aldo Ciccolini who was the piano soloist with the Boston Symphony and Ernest Ansermet last week, is more poet than virtuoso, and although he has everything he needs technically, his playing displays a calm maturity seldom found in a musician of 26.

Nevertheless, Mr. Ciccolini does, when the need requires, come through with brilliant pyrotechnics, as he has done in the past and more especially, as he did about a year or two ago when he played the Tchaikovsky Concerto with the Boston orchestra. It was good to see that he can and does adapt his style and in his playing of the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto which he performed with the Symphony this week, it was a notable transformation indeed.

* * *

If THERE can be an criticism of Mr. Ciccolini's Beethoven, one might say that it is not "big" enough. Much attention has been directed toward the mechanics of the piece, but, although the framework is solid enough, the work as a whole is not round and full and strong as perhaps Beethoven should be. Personally, I found his playing a bit on the surface—a sort of a "granular" interpretation.

However, Mr. Ciccolini gave a poised and calculating performance and, despite his zealous attention to details, a poetic and sensitive one, too. He was warmly applauded by the Symphony Hall audience, and most deservedly so. We would like to hear him again soon.

Baritone Thomas L. Thomas was an engaging soloist at the Boston Morning Musicales. The Musicales are a series of recitals by noted musicians which was started a number of years ago and which, as a general rule, we don't pay much attention to, since they are fairly limited to society and would be of less general interest to the public.

* * *

MR. THOMAS, however, did provide an interesting program, including a few tongue-twisters, English songs, a French group, and some Welsh airs. The Welsh songs all had titles which remind one of the top row of typewriter keys, but they are remarkable folk songs and Mr. Thomas, a Welshman himself, does them well.

"Lady Be Tranquil," and "Forlorn Queen" in the English group of songs arranged by Hughes, were amusing, and the French group included Debussy's "Beau Soir," "Chanson Triste" by Duparc, and "Femme Sensible" from Mehul's "Ariodant."—F. S.

This Clipping From
RADIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 21 1952

Sales of FM Radios Skyrocket in Boston

BOSTON, MASS., Monday—FM radio sales have soared in recent weeks in culture-conscious Boston, local dealers report.

Sales of FM receivers manufactured by the Zenith Radio Corp., Chicago, have tripled as more listeners have turned to Station WGBH, a strictly FM outlet, supported only by local colleges, museums and the Boston Symphony. This station broadcasts 50 hours of education and classical music weekly without advertising.

[n]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 16 1952

Ciccolini ton Symphony
o Soloist

to The Hartford Times

n—Aldo Ciccolini who was o soloist with the Boston ny and Ernest Ansermet
ek, is more poet than and although he has ng he needs technically,
ying displays a calm maldom found in a musician

heless, Mr. Ciccolini hen the need requires, rough with brilliant py-s, as he has done in and more especially, as bout a year or two ago played the Tchaikovsky with the Boston orches-was good to see that he does adapt his style and playing of the Beethoven Piano Concerto which he ed with the Symphony
k, it was a notable trans-n indeed.

* * *

ERE can be an criti-
Mr. Ciccolini's Beethoven.
t say that it is not "big"
Much attention has been toward the mechanics of e, but, although the k is solid enough, the whole is not round and strong as perhaps Bee-hould be. Personally, I playing a bit on the
a sort of a "granular"
tion.
er, Mr. Ciccolini gave a nd calculating perform-d, despite his zealous at-to details, a poetic and one, too. He was warmly
d by the Symphony Hall
, and most deservedly so.
d like to hear him again

e Thomas L. Thomas engaging soloist at the Morning Musicales. The
are a series of recitals musicians which was number of years ago
h, as a general rule, we much attention to,
they are fairly limited to and would be of less gen-est to the public.

* * *

THOMAS, however, did
an interesting program,
a few tongue-twisters,
songs, a French group, Welsh airs. The Welsh had titles which remind the top row of typewriter ut they are remarkable gs and Mr. Thomas, a an himself, does them

Be Tranquil," and "Foren" in the English group
arranged by Hughes, using, and the French
cluded Debussy's "Beau Chanson Triste" by Du-nd "Femme Sensible"
ul's "Aviodant."—F. S.

This Clipping From
DIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 26 1952

ales of FM Radios
kyrocket in Boston

BOSTON, MASS., Monday—FM radio sales have soared in recent weeks in culture-conscious Boston, local dealers report.

Sales of FM receivers manufactured by the Zenith Radio Corp., Chicago, have tripled as more listeners have turned to Station WGBH, a strictly FM outlet, supported only by local colleges, museums and the Boston Symphony. This station broadcasts 50 hours of education and classical music weekly without advertising.

(From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times)

ERNEST ANSERMET SCORES ON PODIUM

Conducts Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall in Stirring Reading of Beethoven

By OLIN DOWNES

A ... distinguished musician, a ... conductor ... to exhibit the ... orchestra and ... efforts of ... wonderful subtlety and color, by ... virtue of his training and his extremely sensitive perceptions, and not by semi-choric gesticulations or other contortions as we were trying to listen to music led the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its ... conductor last night in Carnegie Hall, Ernest Ansermet.

Mr. Ansermet has been an infrequent guest on these podiums, notably as head of the N.B.C. Symphony ... and also as a guest ... with the Philadelphia Orchestra ... the last seasons ... city. But we have not had enough of him, as last night's performances showed.

He began with a performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony notable for its clarity, rhythmic vitality and distinction of phrase, and fine dramatic proportions. For in this performance the volcanic opening movement and the wild upsurge from the scherzo did not weaken the effect of the finale, the consummative movement of the work. That the "attack" of the four-note motive figure of the first movement, which seems so simple and is such a problem, was not invariably precise and unanimous was an inconsequential detail of the occasion. The following movement was sung, simply and nobly with minor variations of pace that were never artificial. The broad tempi of the finale became well the character of its themes and the grand proclamations of the concluding pages.

Music's Form Is Classic

More elemental, more overwhelmingly dramatic interpretations of this music there can be. The form, despite the revolutionary content, is classic, and Mr. Ansermet made it so. The Beethoven of the Fifth symphony is also, in moments, a wild romantic. This aspect of the music was not emphasized. If it had been, it would have been incongruous with a beautifully constructed reading.

The surpassing achievements of the evening came with Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the music from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." Ravel's score is one of exquisite tenderness and fantasy, and a unique skill in the subtle and imaginative employment of the instruments. We hear much today of scoring so effectively for a small orchestra that it sounds like a big one. Here is something else that likewise demonstrates mastery: scoring for a big full symphony orchestra and making it sound like a delicate little one.

The most interesting feature of the score is the use of percussion instruments not merely for rhythmic power, but for that of tone color. Mr. Ansermet missed none of its sophisticated wit and magic and adroitness of orchestral imagery.

"Petrouchka" Well Done

Yet the concert was a crescendo of accomplishment. The conducting of the "Petrouchka" music was ... a word in its representation. One thinks, after this, that no ... conductor knows the score! ... the most in... ... of characterization, ... of irregu... ... were ... effective con... ... its realism ... hand-or... ... with the ... on and ... ... as ... ... first home. ... a master who ... could almost have composed it ... music in his unequaled insight into its smallest meaning and his complete mastery in its revelation. One wonders if those who are not well acquainted with the ballet could have felt the full import of every accent and nuance and dramatic stress of Mr. Ansermet's performance. For this is music ... dependent upon ... every note ac... ... movement or ges... ... could make ... informed listener ... import of the ... would be Anser... He spoke the ... without the ... designed for ... realization, he ... unforgettably.

RENE LOUIS VOISIN

Rene Voisin Dies, Member Of Symphony

Rene Louis Voisin, 58, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1927 and the father and teacher of another orchestra musician, Roger Voisin, died Wednesday in St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Brighton. He had been ill intermittently during the past season.

He was born in Angers, France, Nov. 18, 1893, the son of a noted bandmaster and cornetist, who was his teacher. As a trumpeter, his post with the Symphony, he won first prize at the Paris Conservatoire. The first world war interrupted his studies. As a bandsman and stretcher bearer in the first Battle of the Marne, he was one of 10 survivors in a group of 38 men attending the wounded. He was wounded himself in the Argonne and received the Croix de Guerre.

He played after the war in Conservatoire society concerts, with the Paris Opera, in the Colonne and l'Amoureaux series and with the Concerts Koussevitzky. The maestro brought him to Boston in 1927, three years after his own debut here, to play the trumpet. The son, Roger, whom Rene tutored, is first trumpet of the Symphony.

Survivors are the widow, Marie Voisin, the son and two grandchildren, Pierre, aged 2, and Anne, who was born six days ago. The Voisin residence is at 106 Leland road, Brookline.

Services will be held in the Church of Notre Dame de la Victoire, Isabella street, at 9 A. M., Monday, with members of the orchestra, now on tour, present.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 18 1952

Boston Is Led By Ansermet At Academy

By Marion Kelley

The Philadelphia Forum brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy last night on what has become an annual visit of great anticipation for music lovers. And the crowded house was not disappointed, even though conductor Charles Munch had not recovered sufficiently from a recent illness to be on the podium.

In his place was Ernest Ansermet, well known to Philadelphians, who had been directing the orchestra in Boston for some five weeks.

VARIED OFFERINGS

Last night the noted Swiss conductor chose a program of familiar works blended with a touch of novelty. The varied program was both a challenge and a joy.

He opened with Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor and gave a reading which brought out all the monumental grandeur of its structure.

HINDEMITH WORK

There was subtlety of color and dynamic shading of tone in the rendition of Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione" and Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee."

Chabrier's "Joyeuse Marche" closed an evening of delightful music.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
JAN 18 1952

Swiss Conductor Ansermet Leads Boston Symphony in Annual Concert

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented by the Philadelphia Forum, made its welcome annual appearance at the Academy of Music last night.

In the absence of Charles Munch, the orchestra's regular conductor, who is recovering from illness, Ernest Ansermet, distinguished Swiss leader of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande of Geneva, conducted last evening's concert.

Mr. Ansermet is a musician whose approach is of a high intellectual order; his wide experience has been secured in a career of international importance.

Program Sharply Divided

Last night's program was sharply divided, the first half being entirely devoted to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, while the second half contained music of Stravinsky, Chabrier and Hindemith, in which the Swiss conductor enjoys a considerable reputation.

Mr. Ansermet's idea of the Beethoven symphony was a strong one; he made the music sound as though carved in granite. Forthright as the reading was, it hardly exhausted some of the subtler nuances and shadings and some of the vitality that can be obtained. And the Boston Symphony often came perilously close to playing at a tense volume that does not call forth its best tone qualities.

It was in the second half that conductor and orchestra came into their own. Mr. Ansermet's strong intellectuality served Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione" well. This is a handsome score and it was handsomely played.

Stravinsky Was Highlight

Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" divertimento was the highlight of the program. This extremely ingenious, skillfully orchestrated, often outrageous piece, called forth the virtuoso qualities of the Boston Symphony, and many of the solo players of the various sections gave evidence of what high caliber is their skill.

Mr. Ansermet elected to play the Stravinsky music and the final "Joyeuse Marche" of Alexis Emmanuel Chabrier without pause to the bewilderment of the audience, a bewilderment your reporter shared.

The Chabrier piece is one fairly rollicking with boistrous good humor. Conductor and orchestra received a prolonged ovation at its final chords.

Rene Voisin

Symphony Orchestra Artist Since 1927, at 59

Rene Louis Voisin, 59, trumpeter in the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1927 and father of the present first trumpet, Roger Voisin, died Wednesday at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Brighton, after a long illness. He lived at 106 Leland road, Brookline.

RENE VOISIN

Bron in France, Rene Voisin studied under his father and at the Paris Conservatory of Music under Alexander Petit. As a member of the French Army in World War I, he took part in the first Battle of the Marne and was awarded the Croix de Guerre for heroism in the Argonne engagement.

Before coming to the United States, he played in Paris in the famous Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, the Colonne Orchestra, the Opera, the Lamoureux Concerts and the Koussevitzky Concerts.

In 1935, his son Roger, at the age of 17, became the youngest player ever admitted to the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Voisin is survived by his wife, Marie, of Brookline; and his son, of Jamaica Plain.

Members of the orchestra now on tour will attend the funeral Monday at 9 at the Church of Notre Dame de la Victoire, Isabella st.

N.Y. Herald Tribune Jan. 18

Concert and Recital

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Third evening concert of the orchestra's New York series; guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet. The program:

Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven
"Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose).....Ravel
Ballet, "Petrouchka".....Stravinsky

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third New York visit of the season with Wednesday night's concert in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting its home concerts for the last five weeks in place of its still ailing regular director, Charles Munch. The noted Swiss conductor devoted his program to well known works, but added the prelude and "Danse du Rouet" to the five original pieces of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye"; these were drawn from the ballet score which Ravel made from this two-piano work. In the Stravinsky "Petrouchka" score Mr. Ansermet included the finale, with Petrouchka's death, besides the music from this ballet which is usually heard in concert; this gave a quiet, but none the less impressive ending to an impressive evening.

This was Mr. Ansermet's first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, although he is well known here through his conducting of the NBC Symphony and two concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra. His New York debut, with the Diaghileff Ballet, dates from much farther back, to 1916. One characteristic of Wednesday night's concert was that familiar music was played not as if all too well known and taken for granted by the musicians and the audience. Another was the unity of the style of the performance with that of the music in each of the three works in the program.

To the eye, Mr. Ansermet gave no impression of overt excitement on the podium; there was economy as well as significance of gesture. The constant impression of control, however, did not offset the frequent aural impression of intensity which was added to that of thorough understanding of the three differing scores. The vividness and freshness of the performance of the Beethoven symphony were achieved without departures from the essential directness of the music; the expressive resources of the work were realized with a notable blend of vigor and delicacy. The two sections which Ravel added to "Ma Mere l'Oye" as a prelude to its orchestral version as a ballet provide an appropriate beginning to the concert suite; the interpretation was constantly imaginative and atmospheric, with a luminous orchestral tone, fineness of dynamic shading and, in the most outspoken measures, impressive sonority.

But the most memorable feature of the evening was the interpretation of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" music, with which Mr. Ansermet has been long acquainted. Here, with vividness and subtlety of orchestra color, there was an exceptional communication of the dramatic essence and the national flavor of the music; the fair scenes carried their hearers into the essential atmosphere of the old Russian popular carnival depicted in the scenario and the score. Emotional detail was realized with absorbing emotional conviction, especially at the close, where Petrouchka's ghost haunts his uncomprehending showman.

Christian Science Monitor Jan. 23/52

European Tour Shaping Up

The itinerary which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will follow during its first European tour in May has almost reached final form, according to George E. Judd, the orchestra's manager. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Judd gave members of the press a report of his recent trip to Paris to work out the details for the projected tour.

Mr. Judd made it clear that official announcements regarding the itinerary will be made later, when plans have crystallized, by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the sponsoring organization. Meanwhile he was able to comment only on the broader outlines of the tour.

* * *

He said that the Congress for Cultural Freedom had given the orchestra a remarkable opportunity to go abroad on a completely noncommercial basis. The musicians will cross the Atlantic both ways on the Ile de France, leaving New York on April 28 and returning from Southampton on May 27. During their three-week travels on the Continent and in England they will play an average of two concerts every three days.

* * *

Their first concert will be at the Paris Opéra on May 6 under Charles Munch; their second at the Théâtre du Champs Elysées on May 8. It was at the latter auditorium that Pierre Monteux conducted the world première of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" 39 years ago. He will conduct it again at this concert. These first two Paris concerts will be devoted to music of the 20th century, in accord with the aims and purposes of the Congress.

The Boston Symphony will then go to Amsterdam, and it will be heard at The Hague. From The Hague it may go into Western Germany (although the details of the excursion into Germany are not yet fully worked out.) If the orchestra does not visit Germany at this point, it will then go to Belgium and will play in Brussels.

After Brussels the group will travel to Strasbourg for a performance at the University in Exile. Then to Italy, where the orchestra has been invited by Radio Turin for a broadcast. Upon their return to Paris they will play at least one more concert, drawing their program this time from the classics. There are a few days in this period that are still in flux; the orchestra may play a concert in Lille, France, in a new auditorium there.

The orchestra will then leave France for London. Its London concert will be broadcast from the BBC on May 26 from the Festival Hall. Sir Thomas Beecham is urging more than one London concert and may be able to make arrangements for more.

It is possible that the orchestra may play in Milan while in Italy. Rome, however, would be too far to travel in the time allotted.

H. R.

[7a]

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 3 1952

Music

by PAUL AFFELDER

Ansermet Conducts Boston Symphony; Primrose Soloist in Bartok Concerto

Having taken over the directorship of the Boston Symphony during the protracted illness of Charles Munch, the Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet, made his first appearance in Brooklyn with the orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Ansermet is a meticulous leader, a fact certainly in evidence throughout last night's concert. Everything was neat and clean, and we haven't heard the Boston Orchestra play with such clarity and refinement since the late Serge Koussevitzky gave up his command. For these blessings we are truly grateful.

But it takes more than clarity and refinement to stir an audience, and here is where Mr. Ansermet was wanting. His reading of Mozart's familiar Symphony No. 40 in G Minor was correct in every detail, but was heavy-sounding and completely lacking in charm or delicacy.

He fared somewhat better on the second half of the program, devoted to contemporary ballet music. The suite, "Noblissima Visione," from Paul Hindemith's ballet, "St. Francis," was brought forth with a certain degree of tonal warmth and refinement. Though this does not represent Hindemith in his most exciting mood, there could have been more excitement engendered in the March and the concluding Passacaglia.

The conductor did just about all he could with the Divertimento from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" ("The Fairy's Kiss")—that is, he let the music play itself in a fairly straightforward fashion, just as the composer would want it. The only question here is: Who is the composer? For this is Stravinsky at his most sterile point. There is, in fact, practically no Stravinsky at all; everything has been taken from various works by Tchaikovsky, watered down, then dried up. It all sounded terribly dull without the stage action to support it.

By far the outstanding performance of the evening was that of the eminent violist, William Primrose, who appeared as soloist in a work he had commissioned—the Viola Concerto by the late Bela Bartok. Though we heard him perform this work with Mr. Ansermet and the NBC Symphony in a broadcast concert two years ago, this was the first time the Concerto was given a public performance in New York.

This is a truly remarkable and beautiful work, with an almost unbroken solo line for the viola and an appropriately light orchestral accompaniment. Though it exploits the instrument to the fullest extent, here is no technical display for its own sake. The Concerto is rich in melodic invention, and is highly spiced with themes directly inspired by Hungarian and Romanian folk music.

What makes it even more remarkable, however, is the fact that it is the product of two creative minds. When he died in 1945, Bartok left this work only in the form of rough sketches, written in an individual shorthand that was almost undecipherable. His friend, the violist and composer, Tibor Serly, undertook the extremely difficult and thankless task of completing and orchestrating the Concerto. So skillfully has he done his job that the spirit of Bartok has been preserved throughout.

Mr. Primrose interpreted the Concerto with amazing virtuosity and exquisite tone and musicianship, and Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra co-operated in fine fashion. We cannot imagine a better performance.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

N 20 1952

Boston Symphony

Ansermet Is Conductor and Primrose Is Soloist

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet. Soloist, William Primrose, viola player. Third afternoon concert in the orchestra's New York season yesterday with the following program:

Symphony in G minor, K. 550.....Mozart
Concerto for viola and orchestra.....Bartok
"Noblissima Visione," concert suite from the ballet, "Saint Francis".....Hindemith
Suite from "Baiser de la Fee".....Stravinsky

Along with his distinguished and extraordinarily meticulous conducting, Ernest Ansermet demonstrated a rare gift for program building in his concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. For here was a list to suit the most cultivated taste while offering infinite pleasure and no problem to the mixed audience inevitable at a symphony concert. There was Mozart's lofty Symphony in G minor to start with, and, after that, all contemporary music, most of it drawn from the cream of twentieth century repertory.

I say "most of it," because Bartok's viola concerto teeters on the border line, since it seems to have had in it, at its conception, the makings of one of its composer's grandest achievements; but he never lived to complete it. Its middle movement is, however, beautifully turned out, and this, added to the fact that its only previous performance had been in an NBC broadcast of 1950, lent substantial consequence to yesterday's hearing. It also provided the occasion for uncommonly fine playing by William Primrose, its soloist.

Tibor Serly's selfless labors in orchestrating and otherwise realizing the shorthand score that Bartok left us must command our sincerest admiration. But I suspect that the composer, viewing the finished product, would have done something to vary the meandering first movement, whether with orchestral ingenuities or devices of texture and pitch. As to the finale, I am pretty convinced that he would not have allowed it to end so abruptly. It has two extended and inspired main ideas that would seem to lend themselves to extended development, but an upward scale soon brings the movement to a premature close. Once we have discounted these shortcomings, we may find many tender and expressive details, and as an addition to the almost negligible repertory for viola and orchestra this concerto must be cherished.

The second half of the program was made up of excerpts from two of the most striking ballet scores of our time, Hindemith's "Saint Francis" and Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee." The importance of both has been acknowledged for some time, yet it is long since we have heard any part of them in concert form. The Hindemith suite, which bears the special title, "Nobilissima Visone," has in it some of the composer's most luminous inventions, and the lovely sounds of triangle and flute are not usual features of his rather dark, Teutonic orchestration. This lovely score is likely to stand high on the list when the final tally of his disparate achievements is made.

This Clipping From
WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES-LEADER NEWS

JAN 13 1952

Bob Considine

Human Problem Neatly Solved By Resourceful Air Coach Crews

New York, Jan. 23—The passing show:

An understandably human problem has been neatly solved by airline pilots and crew members assigned to manning the big 4-engine jobs which have been converted to coach travel between the coasts.

In order to carry more people at the reduced rates the lines have dug the galleys, lounges and other gear out of their planes. Seats have been narrowed a bit and installed in sets of three and two instead of two and two. Standard Constellations and DC-6's have been going out of New York with as many as 80 passengers.

This has resulted in heavy traffic jams leading to the two rest rooms. Anyway, some bright pilot who found himself forced to queue up in a long line, when he wished to use the facilities in the rear of his plane, got a brilliant idea.

Now, whenever he wants to, let us say, wash his hands in a hurry and get back to his controls, he simply flips on the "fasten seat belts" light. This clears the aisle immediately. Other pilots and crews quickly caught on.

The Navy Department recently sent a sharp note to Jim Winchester, popular New York Sunday Mirror aviation writer and magazine free-lancer, rejecting a piece Jim had submitted (for clearance) on blimp-detection of submarines.

"This is top secret information and we cannot pass it." The Navy thundered. "Where did you get it?"

The answer was simple. The Navy had sent it to him, in unclassified periodicals.

The U. S. is going to give Europe something new: Culture.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's greatest, will make its first appearance there in Paris, at the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Purpose of the congress is to focus the attention of the world on the vitality of cultural achievements by free men.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 20 1952

ANSERMET OFFERS BARTOK CONCERTO

Primrose Viola Soloist With Boston Symphony in Work Serly Finished for Friend

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Ernest Ansermet, conductor. William Primrose, viola. At Carnegie Hall.

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Concerto for Viola and Orchestra.....Bartok
Nobilissima Visione.....Hindemith
Le Baiser de la fee.....Stravinsky

By OLIN DOWNES

Mr. Ansermet began his Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall as he had begun the program of Wednesday night, with a classic. In this instance the classic was Mazart of the G minor symphony, as the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven was the classic of the earlier concert.

We are of those who do not unqualifiedly admire Mr. Ansermet's classics. They seem very clear and artistic in conception, but small-gauged. We had intended to say of Mr. Ansermet's Fifth that it could be given a more elemental interpretation than the conductor bestowed upon it. We were represented, instead, by the proof reader, as having calculated that the Beethoven fifth "cannot" be read in more elemental fashion than it was on Wednesday evening!

Of Saturday afternoon let us say that Mozart's G minor symphony "can"—we do not mean "cannot"—be read with more depth of feeling and lyrical flow than it was in the performance, italicized and segmented, that it received yesterday.

Modern Music Stands Out

The great moment of the concert came with the modern music, or at least that part of the modern music on the program that was worthy of representative interpretation. We mean the Viola Concerto" of the late Béla Bartók, played for the first time at these concerts, and magnificently, and the ballet music, "Nobilissima Visione," which Paul Hindemith wrote in 1937 on the subject of "St. Frances: choreographic legend" for the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.

No one is in a position to ascertain exactly the form that the Bartók Viola Concerto would have had if the composer had not died before it was completed. The work had been fully sketched out, but the sketches had not received their final shaping, and the orchestral score was yet to come, when the composer passed away, in this city, on Sept. 26, 1945.

Fortunately for the concerto and theerfore for us, Bartók's friend, Tibor Serly, the musician and composer of this city, was near him at the end, when Bartók indicated the night, laden with manuscript sheets, and said in response to Mr. Serly's inquiry, "Yes, that is the viola concerto." He explained, in Mr. Serly's words that while the work "was by and large finished, the details and scoring had not yet been worked out." The day following this conversation Bartók was taken to the hospital and five days later he died.

It was then Mr. Serly's task to assemble the sketches with reverent solicitude and care. The pages were unnumbered, the script was very difficult to decipher, the harmonies were often merely intimated; in many places the composer had interlined and added without erasures notes different from the ones he had first put on paper! But if we can never be sure of knowing exactly how this work was intended by the composer, we have occasion to know the effectiveness of the masterly job that Mr. Serly has done upon the score and the wonderful essential quality of the music.

On preliminary acquaintance its finest pages, the simplest, the deepest in feeling, the richest in beautiful, natural and heartfelt melodic thoughts, are in the slow movement, which must surely rank among Bertók's most haunting and inspired pages. The passage is also remarkably suited to the tone qualities of the viola. For that matter, the whole instrumental scheme is remarkably spaced and colored, in a way that seems to release the full capacities of the orchestra as it does those of the solo instrument, and to throw each into the most effective relief.

Flavor of Hungarian Song

The flavor of Hungarian song is in the whole work, which is shot through with these melodic strands woven into the tonal fabric. One needs to know the music much better before attempting any detailed discussion of it. At this stage of acquaintance the movement, in particular, has episodic effect, and the coda does not seem to us really in place, let us say, planned as it sounds.

But the concerto may be profoundly enjoyed as it stands. Probably it would have been less impressive if some one other than Mr. Primrose had played it. For his performance, so far as we can say at this stage of unfamiliarity with the music, was in every respect masterful and affecting, in its color, its articulation of the melody, its technical proficiency such that very difficult passages were no more in the way of free and rhapsodic expression than the simplest ones. Nor has Mr. Primrose always played, to this writer's mind, with so much of the sensuous and emotional in performance.

In turn the Hindemith music was given a memorable reading by Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra. The broad song of the opening movement is the simplest and the grandest music in the score. The second part, the March, is trivial and circus-like by comparison. Ossa is piled on Pelion in the variations of the final movement, the passacaglia. This of course is the time-honored procedure and indeed tradition of the Passacaglia—the building of an imposing tonal edifice upon a fixed bass repeated as many times as the composer desires. But we must admit to the feeling of a terrific lot of lumber as well as stone piled up for this particular building.

However, these are matters of opinion. But the quality of the music that ended the program can hardly be a matter of mere opinion, provided it is unprejudiced and untinctured by the Stravinsky idolatory of the choice spirits for whom the master, under no circumstances or conditions, can conceivably do anything that is wrong. The fact is that the Stravinsky music for the ballet "Le Baiser de Fee" is so hackneyed, dreary and cheap, that if it were not signed with the name of Stravinsky, the Boston Symphony would be criticized for putting such stuff on its program.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JAN [illegible]

Campfire Girls Praised As Factors in World Harmon

By ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Paris—I received a notic[illegible] to our years in the White H[illegible] more frequently the groups of [illegible] This notice tells me the Campfire Girls birthday the week of Mar. 10 to 22.

The organized Campfire Girls was founded in 1910 for girls from 7 to 18 years. The intention was to give every girl the feeling that she was a needed part of the group. Youngsters in this age bracket are apt to feel lonely, and this organization was designed to help them make friends and develop means of self-expression. At the same time its aim was to give every girl a sense of personal responsibility in the home and family life which would lead to the development of a sense of responsibility as a citizen.

MRS. ROOSEVELT

The Campfire Girls represent all religious, racial and economic backgrounds and the organization has a membership of 365,000 girls. These young ladies are developing friendship and understanding not only within the United States but throughout the world, and it may well be that as they grow older they may be a real factor in the development of better understanding among all peoples in this troubled and divided world.

• • •

NOT SO VERY LONG AGO a speech delivered by Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, was reported in the newspapers and in it he commented that we in the West-

---

This Clipping From
SANTA BARBARA
NEWS-PRESS

Music Afte

Monteux W
Take Part
In Festival

By CLOVER

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

JAN 21 1952

na Berger in Lied

MILES KASTENDIECK

Berger sang the first of ree lieder recitals in Town yesterday afternoon. Most program centered on Schu- and Strauss. She opened C. Bach's "Three Vaux- ongs," sung in questionable h, and concluded with Han- "Alleluja".

until she reached the ss did Miss Berger do her- full justice. Her treatment Schubert sounded overre- Song followed song with- pecial identification.

ht and Traume" approached al standard, but "Gretchen pinnrade" emerged singu- ool. "Totus in Corde Lan- with the clarinet concert- y David Weber had too restraint.

reservations vanished when ng Strauss' "Three Songs belia." She came alive onally in these. "Wiegen- was so lovely that the ce demanded an encore. the virtuosity of "Schla- Herzen" won her an n.

inging the Strauss group s a person and as an artist, hieved the perfection for she is noted.

n McArthur played singu- ooden accompaniments in t half of the recital. Those second half were better.

• • •

rmet shone again in the

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JAN 23 1952

YMPHONY OUR PLANS ARRANGED

gland, Germany Included—Munch Improved

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

George E. Judd, manager of the on Symphony Orchestra, who to France on Jan. 4 to make ements for its European tour ay, is back in Boston, having ed in New York last Friday.

MUNCH BETTER

he did before leaving, he lted in New York with Charles ch, the orchestra's music di- r, who has been ill "in that or several weeks, and reported arked improvement" in the r's health and spirits. We can- however, expect to have him with us right away.

a press interview at Symphony yesterday, Mr. Judd disclosed in changes in the schedule. and, not on the original ary, will definitely be visited. e will be one concert in London possibly more. The date agreed is May 26, just before the stra returns to this country e Ile de France, on which ship ll embark for Europe on April

Going to Germany

not included in the original in a trip into Germany under auspices of the U. S. army. ife arrangements have not completed. The cities thus onsidered are Hamburg, Frank- and Berlin. A very good possi , not previously contemplated visit to Turin, sponsored by Italian Radio, with a possibl trip to Milan.

ile in Paris Mr. Judd discussed her but considerably more re possibility, namely, an appear in Dublin. There is a tran tion problem here, since th ees have stated that they wi sk the orchestra to make an ey by plane.

Three Weeks of Concerts

orchestra's concerts, at th of two in every three d consume a full three

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 2 1952

Music

by PAUL AFFELDER

Ansermet Conducts Boston Symphony; Primrose Soloist in Bartok Concerto

Having taken over the directorship of the Boston Symphony during the protracted illness of Charles Munch, the Swiss conductor, Ernest Ansermet, made his first appearance in Brooklyn with the orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music.

Mr. Ansermet is a meticulous leader, a fact certainly in evidence throughout last night's concert. Everything was neat and clean, and we haven't heard the Boston Orchestra play with such clarity and refinement since the late Serge Koussevitzky gave up his command. For these blessings we are truly grateful.

But it takes more than clarity and refinement to stir an audience, and here is where Mr. Ansermet was wanting. His reading of Mozart's familiar Symphony No. 40 in G Minor was correct in every detail, but was heavy-sounding and completely lacking in charm or delicacy.

He fared somewhat better on the second half of the program, devoted to contemporary ballet music. The suite, "Noblissima Visione," from Paul Hindemith's ballet, "St. Francis," was brought forth with a certain degree of tonal warmth and refinement. Though this does not represent Hindemith in his most exciting mood, there could have been more excitement engendered in the March and the concluding Passacaglia.

The conductor did just about all he could with the Divertimento from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" ("The Fairy's Kiss")—that is, he let the music play itself in a fairly straightforward fashion, just as the composer would want it. The only question here is: Who is the composer? For this is Stravinsky at his most sterile point. There is, in fact, practically no Stravinsky at all; everything has been taken from various works by Tchaikovsky, watered down, then dried up. It all sounded terribly dull without the stage action to support it.

By far the outstanding performance of the evening was that of the eminent violist, William Primrose, who appeared as soloist in a work he had commissioned—the Viola Concerto by the late Bela Bartok. Though we heard him perform this work with Mr. Ansermet and the NBC Symphony in a broadcast concert two years ago, this was the first time the Concerto was given a public performance in New York.

This is a truly remarkable and beautiful work, with an almost unbroken solo line for the viola and an appropriately light orchestral accompaniment. Though it exploits the instrument to the fullest extent, here is no technical display for its own sake. The Concerto is rich in melodic invention, and is highly spiced with themes directly inspired by Hungarian and Romanian folk music.

What makes it even more remarkable, however, is the fact that it is the product of two creative minds. When he died in 1945, Bartok left this work only in the form of rough sketches, written in an individual shorthand that was almost undecipherable. His friend, the violist and composer, Tibor Serly, undertook the extremely difficult and thankless task of completing and orchestrating the Concerto. So skillfully has he done his job that the spirit of Bartok has been preserved throughout.

Mr. Primrose interpreted the Concerto with amazing virtuosity and exquisite tone and musicianship, and Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra co-operated in fine fashion. We cannot imagine a better performance.

This Clipping From
WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES-LEADER NEWS
JAN 23 1952

Bob Considine

Human Problem Neatly Solved By Resourceful Air Coach Crews

New York, Jan. 23—The passing show:

An understandably human problem has been neatly solved by airline pilots and crew members assigned to manning the big 4-engine jobs which have been converted to coach travel between the coasts.

In order to carry more people at the reduced rates the lines have dug the galleys, lounges and other gear out of their planes. Seats have been narrowed a bit and installed in sets of three and two instead of two and two. Standard Constellations and DC-6's have been going out of New York with as many as 80 passengers.

This has resulted in heavy traffic jams leading to the two rest rooms. Anyway, some bright pilot who found himself forced to queue up in a long line, when he wished to use the facilities in the rear of his plane, got a brilliant idea.

Now, whenever he wants to, let us say, wash his hands in a hurry and get back to his controls, he simply flips on the "fasten seat belts" light. This clears the aisle immediately. Other pilots and crews quickly caught on.

The Navy Department recently sent a sharp note to Jim Winchester, popular New York Sunday Mirror aviation writer and magazine free-lancer, rejecting a piece Jim had submitted (for clearance) on blimp-detection of submarines.

"This is top secret information and we cannot pass it." The Navy thundered. "Where did you get it?"

The answer was simple. The Navy had sent it to him, in unclassified periodicals.

The U. S. is going to give Europe something new: Culture.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's greatest, will make its first appearance there in Paris, at the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Purpose of the congress is to focus the attention of the world on the vitality of cultural achievements by free men.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 20 1952

Boston Symphony

Ansermet Is Conductor and Primrose Is Soloist

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL
Guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet. Soloist, William Primrose, viola player. Third afternoon concert in the orchestra's New York season yesterday with the following program:
Symphony in G minor, K. 550.....Mozart
Concerto for viola and orchestra.....Bartok
"Nobilissima Visione," concert suite from the ballet, "Saint Francis".....Hindemith
Suite from "Baiser de la Fee".....Stravinsky

Along with his distinguished and extraordinarily meticulous conducting, Ernest Ansermet demonstrated a rare gift for program building in his concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. For here was a list to suit the most cultivated taste while offering infinite pleasure and no problem to the mixed audience inevitable at a symphony concert. There was Mozart's lofty Symphony in G minor to start with, and, after that, all contemporary music, most of it drawn from the cream of twentieth century repertory.

I say "most of it," because Bartok's viola concerto teeters on the border line, since it seems to have had in it, at its conception, the makings of one of its composer's grandest achievements; but he never lived to complete it. Its middle movement is, however, beautifully turned out, and this, added to the fact that its only previous performance had been in an NBC broadcast of 1950, lent substantial consequence to yesterday's hearing. It also provided the occasion for uncommonly fine playing by William Primrose, its soloist.

Tibor Serly's selfless labors in orchestrating and otherwise realizing the shorthand score that Bartok left us must command our sincerest admiration. But I suspect that the composer, viewing the finished product, would have done something to vary the meandering first movement, whether with orchestral ingenuities or devices of texture and pitch. As to the finale, I am pretty convinced that he would not have allowed it to end so abruptly. It has two extended and inspired main ideas that would seem to lend themselves to extended development, but an upward scale soon brings the movement to a premature close. Once we have discounted these shortcomings, we may find many tender and expressive details, and as an addition to the almost negligible repertory for viola and orchestra this concerto must be cherished.

The second half of the program was made up of excerpts from two of the most striking ballet scores of our time, Hindemith's "Saint Francis" and Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee." The importance of both has been acknowledged for some time, yet it is long since we have heard any part of them in concert form. The Hindemith suite, which bears the special title, "Nobilissima Visone," has in it some of the composer's most luminous inventions, and the lovely sounds of triangle and flute are not usual features of his rather dark, Teutonic orchestration. This lovely score is likely to stand high on the list when the final tally of his disparate achievements is made.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 20 1952

ANSERMET OFFERS BARTOK CONCERTO

Primrose Viola Soloist With Boston Symphony in Work Serly Finished for Friend

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Ernest Ansermet, conductor. William Primrose, viola. At Carnegie Hall.
Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Concerto for Viola and Orchestra.....Bartok
Nobilissima Visione .....Hindemith
Le baiser de la fee.....Stravinsky

By OLIN DOWNES

Mr. Ansermet began his Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall as he had begun the program of Wednesday night, with a classic. In this instance the classic was Mazart of the G minor symphony, as the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven was the classic of the earlier concert.

We are of those who do not unqualifiedly admire Mr. Ansermet's classics. They seem very clear and artistic in conception, but small-gauged. We had intended to say of Mr. Ansermet's Fifth that it could be given a more elemental interpretation than the conductor bestowed upon it. We were represented, instead, by the proof reader, as having calculated that the Beethoven fifth "cannot" be read in more elemental fashion than it was on Wednesday evening!

Of Saturday afternoon let us say that Mozart's G minor symphony "can"—we do not mean "cannot"—be read with more depth of feeling and lyrical flow than it was in the performance, italicized and segmented, that it received yesterday.

Modern Music Stands Out

The great moment of the concert came with the modern music, or at least that part of the modern music on the program that was worthy of representative interpretation. We mean the Viola Concerto" of the late Béla Bartók, played for the first time at these concerts; and magnificently, and the ballet music, "Nobilissima Visione," which Paul Hindemith wrote in 1937 on the subject of "St. Frances: choreographic legend" for the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo.

No one is in a position to ascertain exactly the form that the Bartók Viola Concerto would have had if the composer had not died before it was completed. The work had been fully sketched out, but the sketches had not received their final shaping, and the orchestral score was yet to come, when the composer passed away, in this city, on Sept. 26, 1945.

Fortunately for the concerto and theerfore for us, Bartók's friend, Tibor Serly, the musician and composer of this city, was near him at the end, when Bartók indicated the night, laden with manuscript sheets, and said in response to Mr. Serly's inquiry, "Yes, that is the viola concerto." He explained, in Mr. Serly's words that while the work "was by and large finished, the details and scoring had not yet been worked out." The day following this conversation Bartók was taken to the hospital and five days later he died.

It was then Mr. Serly's task to assemble the sketches with reverent solicitude and care. The pages were unnumbered, the script was very difficult to decipher, the harmonies were often merely intimated; in many places the composer had interlined and added without erasures notes different from the ones he had first put on paper. But if we can never be sure of knowing exactly how this work was intended by the composer, we have occasion to know the effectiveness of the masterly job that Mr. Serly has done upon the score and the wonderful essential quality of the music.

On preliminary acquaintance its finest pages, the simplest, the deepest in feeling, the richest in beautiful, natural and heartfelt melodic thoughts, are in the slow movement, which must surely rank among Bertók's most haunting and inspired pages. The passage is also remarkably suited to the tone qualities of the viola. For that matter, the whole instrumental scheme is remarkably spaced and colored, in a way that seems to release the full capacities of the orchestra as it does those of the solo instrument, and to throw each into the most effective relief.

Flavor of Hungarian Song

The flavor of Hungarian song is in the whole work, which is shot through with these melodic strands woven into the tonal fabric. One needs to know the music much better before attempting any detailed discussion of it. At this stage of acquaintance the last movement, in particular, has an episodic effect, and the coda does not seem to us really in place, or let us say, planned as it sounds.

But the concerto may be profoundly enjoyed as it stands. Probably it would have been less impressive if some one other than Mr. Primrose had played it. For his performance, so far as we can say at this stage of unfamiliarity with the music, was in every respect masterful and affecting, in its color, its articulation of the melody, its technical proficiency, such that very difficult passages were no more in the way of free and rhapsodic expression than the simplest ones. Nor has Mr. Primrose always played, to this writer's mind, with so much of the sensuous and emotional in performance.

In turn the Hindemith music was given a memorable reading by Mr. Ansermet and the orchestra. The broad song of the opening movement is the simplest and the grandest music in the score. The second part, the March, is trivial and circus-like by comparison. Ossa is piled on Pelion in the variations of the final movement, the passacaglia. This of course is the time-honored procedure and indeed tradition of the Passacaglia—the building of an imposing tonal edifice upon a fixed bass repeated as many times as the composer desires. But we must admit to the feeling of a terrific lot of lumber as well as stone piled up for this particular building.

However, these are matters of opinion. But the quality of the music that ended the program can hardly be a matter of mere opinion, provided it is unprejudiced and untinctured by the Stravinsky idolatory of the choice spirits for whom the master, under no circumstances or conditions, can conceivably do anything that is wrong. The fact is that the Stravinsky music for the ballet "Le Baiser de Fee" is so hackneyed, dreary and cheap that if it were not signed with the name of Stravinsky, the Boston Symphony would be criticized for putting such stuff on its program.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
JAN 22 1952

Campfire Girls Praised As Factors in World Harmony

By ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Paris—I received a notice today that made me think back to our years in the White House when I used to see more frequently the groups of Girl Scouts and Campfire Girls. This notice tells me the Campfire Girls will celebrate their birthday the week of Mar. 16 to 22.

The organized Campfire Girls was founded in 1910 for girls from 7 to 18 years. The intention was to give every girl the feeling that she was a needed part of the group. Youngsters in this age bracket are apt to feel lonely, and this organization was designed to help them make friends and develop means of self-expression. At the same time the aim was to give every girl a sense of personal responsibility in her home and family life which would lead to the development of a sense of responsibility as a citizen.

MRS. ROOSEVELT

The Campfire Girls represent all religious, racial and economic backgrounds and the organization has a membership of 365,000 girls today. These young ladies are developing friendship and understanding not only within the United States but throughout the world, and it may well be that as they grow older they may be a real factor in the development of better understanding among all peoples in this very troubled and divided world.

• • •

NOT SO VERY LONG AGO a speech delivered by Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, was reported in the newspapers and in it he commented that we in the West-

SANTA BARBARA
NEWS-PRESS

Music Afte

Monteux W
Take Pa
In Festiv

By CLOVER

It will truly be Paris" this year of the French
Pierre Monteux
concert series
The French symphony
cently relinquish
ed San Francisco
called "the Paris World," giving up the San Francisco and continuing appearances in has been invited league, Charles duct the Boston
chestra in certs in Paris next

The Boston
make the trip for pean appearances on tion of the Congress
Freedom to month-long exposition arts. Financed interests, the Paris
a dramatization of the Congress to
tence of a vital free world.

Entitled "Master 20th Century," the will attempt to talent and works in symphony, opera,
art, literature and
Other musical participate include
State Opera, presenting Berg's opera, "Wozzeck"
Vienna Philharmonic
the chorus and orchestra
Academy of St. Cecilia the West Berlin Radio
the Orchestre de la Suisse mande of Geneva du Conservatoire and chestre National
The United States represented by the New City Ballet Company,
George Balanchine
formances, as well as of ballets by Igor Stravinsky be conducted by the
An all-Negro company
planning to perform
Thompson's operatic
Gertrude Stein's "Four Three Acts."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
JAN 21 1952

na Berger in Lie

MILES KASTENDIECK

Berger sang the first of ree lieder recitals in Town yesterday afternoon. Most program centered on Schuand Strauss. She opened C. Bach's "Three Vaux-ongs," sung in questionable
h, and concluded with Han-
"Alleluja".

until she reached the s did Miss Berger do her-ull justice. Her treatment chubert sounded overre-Song followed song withpecial identification.
ht and Traume" approached al standard, but "Gretchen innrade" emerged singuool. "Totus in Corde Lan-with the clarinet concert-y David Weber had too restraint.
reservations vanished when ng Strauss' "Three Songs belia." She came alive nally in these. "Wiegenwas so lovely that the ce demanded an encore.
the virtuosity of "Schla-Herzen" won her an n.
inging the Strauss group
a person and as an artist, hieved the perfection for she is noted.
n McArthur played singu-ooden accompaniments in t half of the recital. Those econd half were better.

• • •

rmet shone again in the

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 23 1952

YMPHONY OUR PLANS ARRANGED

gland, Germany ncluded—Munch Improved

WARREN STOREY SMITH

orge E. Judd, manager of the n Symphony Orchestra, who to France on Jan. 4 to make gements for its European tour ay, is back in Boston, having ed in New York last Friday.

MUNCH BETTER

he did before leaving, he lted in New York with Charles h, the orchestra's music dir, who has been ill in that or several weeks, and reported arked improvement in the r's health and spirits. We can-however, expect to have him with us right away.

n press interview at Symphony yesterday, Mr. Judd disclosed in changes in the schedule.
and, not on the original ary, will definitely be visited.
e will be one concert in London possibly more. The date agreed is May 26, just before the stra returns to this country
e Ile de France, on which ship ll embark for Europe on April

Going to Germany

o not included in the original is a trip into Germany under auspices of the U. S. army.
ite arrangements have not completed. The cities thus onsidered are Hamburg, Frank nd Berlin. A very good possi
, not previously contemplated visit to Turin, sponsored by Italian Radio, with a possibl trip to Milan.

ile in Paris Mr. Judd discusse er but considerably more re possibility, namely, an appea in Dublin. There is a tran tion problem here, since th ees have stated that they w sk the orchestra to make ar ey by plane.

Three Weeks of Concerts

orchestra's concerts, at of two in every three consume a full three

THIS EXHIBITION

[77]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

Erna Berger in Lieder Recital

By MILES KASTENBIECK

[illegible] the first of [illegible] Town [illegible] May [illegible] Schu- [illegible] opened [illegible] B[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

SANTA BARBARA NEWS-PRESS

Music Afar

Monteux V
Take Part
In Festival

By CLOVER SUMM

It will truly be "Spring in Paris" this year for music lovers of the French capital, for Pierre Monteux, long missed in his native land, will come home.

The white-haired master of French symphonic sch... recently reluctantly left his ... San Francisco, the ... called "the Paris of t... World," giving up the ... the San Francisco Sy... and confining his talents ... appearances in the East. ... has been invited to join ... league, Charles Munch, ... duct the Boston Sym... chestra in a series of ... certs in Paris next May.

The Boston orchestra will make the trip for its first ... pean appearances on the ... tion of the Congress for ... Freedom to participate ... month-long exposition of ... arts. Financed by private ... interests, the Paris exposition ... a dramatization of the ... the Congress to assert the ... istence of a vital culture ... free world.

Entitled "Masterpieces of 20th Century," the ex... will attempt to present ... talent and works in the ... symphony, opera, ballet, ... art, literature and phi... Other musical organizations ... participate include the ... State Opera, presenting ... Berg's opera, "Wozzeck"; ... Vienna Philharmonic Or... the chorus and orchestra ... Academy of St. Cecilia ... the West Berlin Radio Or... the Orchestre de la Sui... mande of Geneva; the Or... du Conservatoire and ... chestre National, both of ... The United States will be represented by the New ... City Ballet Company, dire... George Balanchine in ... formances, as well as a p... of ballets by Igor Stravin... be conducted by the co... An all-Negro company is planning to perform ... Thompson's operatic set... Gertrude Stein's "Four Saints ... Three Acts."

...re Girls Praised
...in World Harmo...

...EANOR ROOSEVELT

...notice today that made me think ...White House when I used to me... ...ups of Girl Scouts and Campfire ... ...Campfire Girls will celebrate ...ar. 16 to 22.

...ern world were not making ...fort to have our culture und... which was being made by the ... countries. Here in Europe ... very quickly aware of the f... the U. S. has done very litt... quaint European people ... fact that there are artists a... ers in our country who are ... becoming acquainted with.

We have not taken ... many cultural exhibits ov... whereas the Soviet Uni... neglected no opportunity ... the advances made with... borders.

In view of this, I listen... the greatest interest to a rep... tive of the Congress for ... Freedom tell me the ou... that there is to be an inter... exhibition of the arts of ... held in Paris Apr. 29 and ...

• • •

THIS EXHIBITION will ... the artists of the non-Co... world. The Boston Symph... chestra will make its first ... Europe, with Charles Mu... Pierre Montreux as its con... There will be expositions ... temporary painting. There ... lectures on literary subje... there also will be films and ... even dramatic presentations.

In fact, this may be, in ... world, one of the most ... things that has been done ... time and it may awaken ... allies and our enemies to a... tion that the U. S. is no ... source of real artistic appr... and production.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

Erna Berger in Lieder Recital

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Erna Berger sang the first of ... Town ... Mozart ... Schubert ... She opened ... Brahms ... Wolf ... Hahn Songs, sung in quite ... English and concluded with Handel's "Alcina."

Not until she reached the Strauss did Miss Berger do herself full justice. Her treatment of Schubert sounded overrefined. Song followed song without special identification.

"Ständchen" and "Träume" approached ... but "Gretchen ... Strauss ... emerged singularly ... The Sun Comes Lan... Wolf ... The clear, concentrated ... by Hans Weber had too much restraint.

All reservations vanished when she sang Strauss' "Three Songs of Ophelia." She came alive emotionally in these. "Wiegenlied" was so lovely that the audience demanded an encore. And the virtuosity of "Schlagende Herzen" won her an ovation.

In singing the Strauss group both as a person and as an artist, she achieved the perfection for which she is noted.

Edwin McArthur played singularly wooden accompaniments in the first half of the recital. Those of the second half were better.

• • •

Ansermet shone again in the modern works in the Boston Symphony concert of Saturday afternoon. The program began with a forthright interpretation of Mozart's G Minor Symphony.

Its highlight was the performance of Bartok's Viola Concerto with William Primrose as soloist. Hindemith's "Noblissima Visione" and Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" completed the list.

The Bartok still ranks as a novelty. Of its three movements the second is a gem. Since Mr. Primrose played with consummate artistry, the work emerged at its best, not perhaps quite on the level of Bartok's other music in his final years.

As the years pass, the Hindemith score retains its beauty and quality. Though "Le Baiser" rates as lesser Stravinsky, I found it more ingratiating in this performance than ever before. Ansermet serves contemporary music nobly.

• • •

Fritz Reiner achieved a feat of virtuoso conducting with the NBC Symphony in Carnegie Hall early Saturday evening. He played Debussy, Bartok, Ravel, and Strauss with incredible clarity at a faster pace than most of the music usually goes. It was all quite refreshing.

Bartok's two Romanian dances and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" found him quite in his element. The latter came off in a highly colorful performance.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SYMPHONY TOUR PLANS ARRANGED

England, Germany Included—Munch Improved

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

George E. Judd, manager of the ... Orchestra, who ... last ... to make ... mean tour ... E. tour having ... last Friday.

MUNCH BETTER

As he did before leaving, he consulted in New York with Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director, who has been ill in that city for several weeks, and reported a marked improvement in the latter's health and spirits. We cannot, however, expect to have him ... with us right away.

At Symphony ... Judd disclosed ... engagements in the schedule ... will not ... for Europe on April ...

Going to Germany

... decided ... into Germany under ... auspices of ... Symphony ... not ... Germany ... Boston ... Frankfurt ... Munich ... Berlin ... Hamburg ... Dusseldorf ... Stuttgart ... Baden-Baden

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 25 1952

Sir Thomas Beecham Laments Symphony's Lone London Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

The well-known and acidulous wit of Sir Thomas Beecham had another workout yesterday afternoon as the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra aired his views on a variety of subjects. They ranged from Handel and the alleged musical backwardness of Paris to the fact that the Boston Symphony is making a grave mistake in not planning at least three concerts in London during the European visit next May.

The Beecham wit is expressed with a leisurely grace of manner, and a polished conversational style which make him virtually unique. Sitting back in an armchair, his head carried a little back and his goatee-adorned chin and long cigar tilted up, Sir Thomas is likely to fire a verbal blast like a battleship firing her 16-inch guns.

His sense of fun was to the fore when a party from the press rapped at his suite in the Copley Plaza. The door opened to reveal only Lady Beecham, the former Betty Humby and a famed pianist. Sir Thomas stood grinning behind the door.

"Really, if I may take the liberty to do so, I must say that the Boston Symphony is making a grave mistake in not planning at least three concerts in London," he said. The musical public there is more considerable than in any other city of the world, and they are very curious. If the Boston Symphony plays only once the public will speak its disapproval."

"Round English" Lacking

On Paris, Sir Thomas voiced his opinion in tones of mingled honey and nitric acid:

"Paris is the most unmusical city in the world. There's no public there that is musical. They've always been unmusical. I think it was Rousseau who first pointed that out, and he added 'It will be a misfortune if they ever do become musical.'"

On Handel, in tones of solid British faith, confidence and enthusiasm:

"Handel is the only composer who ever showed a true epic grandeur, except for fragments of Wagner and Beethoven, and I suppose of Bach. Certainly the greatest choral writer who ever lived was Handel. Do I prefer the choral Handel to the choral Bach? Good God, yes! More variety, more drama, in some things like 'Surley, surely' in 'Messiah,' absolutely unique.'

On opera in English, in tones of purely serious artistic conviction:

"I'm against it on principle, but I will say there are some operas which are less objectionable if sung in English than others. English just can't be sung generally. There are too many monosyllables involving consonants. Like the words 'white,' 'black' and 'but.' You can sing 'bianco,' noir' (atlhough that makes a nasty noise because it involves the nose) and you can sing 'ma' or 'mais.' But you can't sing those words in English. English has dramatic power when spoken, but it is not a vocal language."

at Ryan's on 52nd st.

Post Jan 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Sir Thomas Beecham is a stimulating conductor. He brings to music an individual and sometimes challenging approach; he has a sovereign command over the orchestra. Nevertheless, not even his great gifts could wholly redeem the program he has elected to present in Boston this week. It was heard, by the way, last Tuesday evening. It was repeated yesterday afternoon and will be heard both tonight and tomorrow.

Sir Thomas has his preferences among composers and makes no secret of the fact. The list in question assembles four of his favorites: Handel, Sibelius, Delius and Rimsky-Korsakov. The Handel is not straight Handel but Handel very much fixed up by Sir Thomas himself: the Suite drawn from the opera "Il Pastor Fido" (The Faithful Shepherd), which was heard last Tuesday for the first time in Boston. The program notes state that not all of the music has come from this particular source, but in any event, it is all pleasant to hear. There is beauty in the Adagio; the Bouree and finale are exciting and the other five sections are in their several ways agreeable.

No doubt, some attention should be paid here to Sibelius, who last month passed his 86th birthday. However, the Sixth is the dreariest, drabbest, barrenest of the seven symphonies. And it is this that Sir Thomas is inflicting upon us. Yesterday, as on Tuesday, he did for the Symphony all that might be done for it, but for this listener, among others, that all was not enough.

Frederick Delius is a composer who has been little honored by the Boston Symphony, though, to be sure, he has never enjoyed in this country anything like the prestige that is his in his native country. Sir Thomas, the chief apostle of Delius among living conductors, might have given us one of his major works, instead, he preferred to introduce to us two minor ones: "Summer Night on the River" and "Marche Caprice," the former composed in 1911, is a companion piece to the much better known "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." It is a pleasant bit of impressionism and, though slight, was balm to the ears after the Sibelius. The "Marche Caprice" was written when Delius was 26, or in 1888, the year in which he completed his belated studies in Leipzig. It was first published a year ago, as edited and arranged by Sir Thomas. It is pop concert rather than symphony concert material, and that is about the present status of the Suite from "Rimsky's "Coq d'Or," which Sir Thomas brings to a brilliant performance. The Handel aside, when the concert was not dull it bordered on the trivial. And more's the pity.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 26 1952

MUSIC

Memorable Afternoon: Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday was a memorable afternoon at Symphony Hall, for Sir Thomas Beecham was up there on the stage guest-conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management has repaired a grave omission of many years' standing by inviting Sir Thomas to return this week. He last appeared in this capacity in 1928, and 24 years is altogether too long a time to go without the Beecham personality and his unique interpretive quality, as a Boston Symphony guest.

Unfortunately, it must be said, Sir Thomas elected to give us only one program for last Tuesday, yesterday afternoon, tonight and tomorrow afternoon. But it is a varied and a good program, and strikingly unlike those we have heard this season. First comes a Handel Suite: Movements from "The Faithful Shepherd" arranged by Mr Beecham, followed by the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; two scores by Frederick Delius: "Summer Night on the River" and Marche Caprice, and, as finale, the Suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or."

Sir Thomas is a personality whether conducting, writing a book talking or making orchestral arrangements. He is also a strong temperament. Both qualities show in his Handel orchestration, which has enriched considerably the fine old Handelian texture. Except for the side-drum and the triangle at the end—which lend a fine touch of Eric Coates—this is not too modern a costuming of the Handelian frame. But it is rich and elegant, well-cut and made to last, which should be the object of any gentleman's dress.

As happened last Tuesday, the audience broke into applause after the sonorous, broad cadence of the other of the Beecham qualities, and Suite was finished. The house lights went up and late-comers were admitted. But instead of pointing out this error, verbally as he had done on Tuesday, Sir Thomas was content to smile and wait patiently for quiet.

This conductor is much more than a personality, however. He is a good deal of an interpretive virtuoso, and in his own way a genius of orchestral technic and discipline. His ear is extraordinarily keen for the full, mellow sound of a string tone which, orchestrally, should be sweet and clear and balanced, not in the least degree forced. He maintains that same vital balance with woodwinds and brass.

The result is a tone of much warmth, which played a highly important part in the Sibelius Symphony, that characteristic work of gradually integrated small fragments of themes. Sibelius can be made to sound cold, though it is altogether wrong when that happens. Steady, even rhythm is another o fthe Beecham qualities, and it is essential to the unfolding of the Finnish composer's tightly-woven fabric of constant inward motion and shifting colors. Perhaps the last work on the Beecham performance of this brief, enigmatic symphony, with its abrupt conclusion to each movement, is the fact that there was no sense either of dryness or bleakness. That proves true mastery of the Sibelius style and of Beecham's own kindling imagination.

The Delius pieces don't amount to much, but each is pleasant. "Summer Night on the River," a descriptive mood piece, is what Sir Thomas, said of its companion piece, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring": ". . . a lollypop; sweet, soothing and soporific. The Marche Caprice is a competently-wrought work of a developing amateur. The whole of the "Coq d'Or" Suite (yes, by Jove, every last 16th note and general pause of it!) made the concert too long, but in a pleasant way.

Sir Thomas, mustached and goatee'd, cutaway-coated and gray-vested, looking more than ever like John Bull (beg pardon, Sir John Bull!) won a most cordial reception. He deserved every last handclap of it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Sir Thomas Beecham is a stimulating conductor. He brings to music an individual and sometimes challenging approach; he has a sovereign command over the orchestra. Nevertheless, not even his great gifts could wholly redeem the program he has elected to present in Boston this week. It was heard, by the way, last Tuesday evening. It was repeated yesterday afternoon and will be heard both tonight and tomorrow.

Sir Thomas has his preferences among composers and makes no secret of the fact. The list in question assembles four of his favorites: Handel, Sibelius, Delius and Rimsky-Korsakov. The Handel is not straight Handel but Handel very much fixed up by Sir Thomas himself: the Suite drawn from the opera "Il Pastor Fido" (The Faithful Shepherd), which was heard last Tuesday for the first time in Boston. The program notes state that not all of the music has come from this particular source, but in any event, it is all pleasant to hear. There is beauty in the Adagio; the Bouree and finale are exciting and the other five sections are in their several ways agreeable.

No doubt, some attention should be paid here to Sibelius, who last month passed his 86th birthday. However, the Sixth is the dreariest, drabbest, barrenest of the seven symphonies. And it is this that Sir Thomas is inflicting upon us. Yesterday, as on Tuesday, he did for the Symphony all that might be done for it, but for this listener, among others, that all was not enough.

Frederick Delius is a composer who has been little honored by the Boston Symphony, though, to be sure, he has never enjoyed in this country anything like the prestige that is his in his native country. Sir Thomas, the chief apostle of Delius among living conductors, might have given us one of his major works, instead, he preferred to introduce to us two minor ones: "Summer Night on the River" and "Marche Caprice," the former composed in 1911, is a companion piece to the much better known "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." It is a pleasant bit of impressionism and, though slight, was balm to the ears after the Sibelius. The "Marche Caprice" was written when Delius was 26, or in 1888, the year in which he completed his belated studies in Leipzig. It was first published a year ago, as edited and arranged by Sir Thomas. It is pop concert rather than symphony concert material, and that is about the present status of the Suite from "Rimsky's "Coq d'Or," which Sir Thomas brings to a brilliant performance. The Handel aside, when the concert was not dull it bordered on the trivial. And more's the pity.

Counterpoint Four

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 25 1952

Plans Now Complete for Boston Symphony's First European Tour With Fourteen Concerts, the First in Paris, in 21 Days

(Reprinted from the column of Rudolph Elie in the Boston Herald.)

EVER since it was announced that the Boston Symphony orchestra had been invited to tour Europe this spring, I have been keeping my fingers crossed for fear something might go wrong with the plans, as they have several times before when this scheme has been put forth.

But George Judd, manager of the orchestra, returned to town yesterday [Jan. 22] after a fortnight in Paris and told the assembled music editors and critics that we could uncross our fingers. At last, after 71 years of dreaming of the possibility, the Boston Symphony is to tour Europe, and under the most remarkable auspices at that, as you shall hear.

On April 27, following the final concert of the regular season, the men of the Boston Symphony orchestra leave for New York to board the Ile de France which, through the courtesy of the French Line, is moving up its sailing date to facilitate matters, and will sail early on the morning of the 28th for Le Havre. The first concert of the orchestra on foreign soil, according to Mr. Judd, will take place at the Paris Opera House on the night of May 6 with Charles Munch conducting. (Mr. Munch, happily enough, is rapidly recovering from the illness that has kept him from conducting the orchestra most of this season, and is expected to return to duty in March.)

* * *

On the night of the eighth an historical re-creation will take place when Pierre Monteux conducts the orchestra in a performance of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" in the Champs Elysees Theatre almost exactly 39 years after he gave this pivotal work its first performance in the very same theatre. (The music produced a first class riot on that occasion, with Stravinsky escaping through a window.)

The next day the orchestra entrains for The Hague, Holland, where on the 10th it plays again under Mr. Munch. On the 11th, under Monteux, it plays in Amsterdam. There follows a period of three or four days that is not yet definitely settled, Mr. Judd explained, indicating that there was a possibility that the orchestra might be invited by the U.S. Army to perform for both soldiers and civilians in several German cities. This, however, remains to be seen.

In any case the orchestra will play in Brussels, Belgium, either before or after the engagements in Germany, and on May 17 will make its debut in Strasbourg, Mr. Munch's home town. There then follows another period of indefinite plans at the moment, but everything seems to point to a very interesting side trip to visit a number of cities that have expressed great eagerness to hear the orchestra, which holds a European reputation second to none in the world and which, indeed, is more responsible for the cultural reputation of Boston than any other agency.

* * *

Additional concerts are planned for Paris following the visit through southern Europe, with other appearances outside Paris. Then on May 26 the orchestra makes its London debut in the famed Festival Hall. As things stand now, Mr. Judd explained, the orchestra sails for home on the Ile de France from Southampton on May 27, arriving in time to do the final month of the Pops under Arthur Fiedler.

Stating that the visit of the orchestra is one of the most keenly anticipated events of the European season this spring, Mr. Judd said he thought that the orchestra would play what amounted to two concerts every three days during the 21 days in Europe. This comes out, according to my slide rule, to about 14 concerts. He explained, however, that rigorous although this schedule might seem, it was somewhat less difficult than the regular Western tour of the orchestra and actually covered much less ground mileage.

* * *

While he could not estimate the total expenses of such a tour, he explained that they are formidable. By far the largest percentage of the expenses are being met by the agency that invited the orchestra, the Congress of Cultural Freedom, an independent organization with committees in the United States and in many of the European capitals. Its purpose is pretty clearly expressed in its title, Mr. Judd said, for it is dedicated to the advancement and understanding of the cultures of the free nations represented. Secretary general of the Congress, with headquarters in Paris, is Nicholas Nabokov.

Supported by civic and culturally minded people of the free nations, the Congress is completely non-commercial. Any proceeds of the concerts go to meet the Congress' immense deficits in guaranteeing the visit of the orchestra. There are, however, Mr. Judd said, certain individuals who are also contributing to the expense of the tour; American philanthropists, he indicated. But he didn't know who they were. "I don't think they're Bostonians, though," he added.

* * *

Yet it is clear that Bostonians, though they may not be shouldering any of the expenses of the unprecedented honor of having their orchestra make its European debut—and it should be made clear that the Boston orchestra was specifically requested for the honor—stand to reap all the glory. It promises to be, all in all, the most historic milestone in the cultural life of the city in our time.

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JAN 30

Like going to dentist—

Modern music painful, hurts, says Goldovsky

"Listening to modern music is like going to the dentist.

"It is unpleasant and boring and painful—but necessary."

"But modern music, when endured, will open new doors, bring stimulating experiences. And you may even like some of it."

That's the opinion expressed last night by Boris Goldovsky, noted musical authority. Goldovsky is intermission commentator on the Metropolitan Opera matinee broadcasts, and head of the opera department of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. He was speaking at the Museum of Art, an event of the Festival of Music and Art now in progress here.

* * *

"PEOPLE GENERALLY dislike modern music.

"But modern music always has been disliked—even by our grandparents."

Reason for this reaction, which Mr. Goldovsky assured his audience: "Is disliked as much at first by professional musicians as the layman," is that "almost any unusual combination of sounds hurts. And you don't understand them.

But, he pointed out, you don't have to understand them, and if you listen they will in time prove stimulating and interesting.

Comparing the music of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and other "old masters" with modern composers, he said:

"Sonatas by the earlier composers were pleasant and comfortable—like relaxing in a warm bath."

COMPARING MUSIC of the 19th Century with that of the 20th, Mr. Goldovsky said that the music of the earlier composers was "like a pretty girl." That of the later composers "like some girls who are not pretty, but when you get to know them, are more fascinating than the pretty girls.

"It is our duty to listen to modern music today—even if it hurts—because this music will be pop concert music of our grandchildren," he said.

[75]

'IAN SCIENC
Registered in U. S. Patent Office
AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER
BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1952

Sharps and Flats

By Longhaired Lassie

'Let's Make Music'

Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

"O. K., maestro, sound off," says three-year-old Tonu Kalam of Melrose, Mass., as Ludwig Juht, well-known virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starts the youngster off on a music lesson with a half-size violin. Object: A spot in the symphony for little Tonu about 20 years hence. Mr. and Mrs. Juht sponsored Tonu and his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Endel Kalam, as immigrants to the United States. They were DP refugees from Estonia. Mr. Kalam is a violinist and conductor.

The aggregation of 104 pl ill give three concerts in May. It will be regarded ajor contribution from nited States to a month position of the arts. The c on is aimed at focusing t ention of the world upon th ural achievements by free uring the first half of the entury.

The ... opens ... April 28 at
... May Charles ... director of the ...
... his colleague Pierre Monteux to share with ...
... concerts.

Financed by philanthropic ... erests, the Paris exposition ... the arts is a dramatization of ... efforts of the Congress for Cul... ural Freedom to assert the exist... ence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris caval... ... bears the overall title "Mas... ... ers of the 20th Century," ... ... undisputed bests in the ... fields of symphony, opera, ballet, ... art, literature and philoso... ...

The Boston Symphony Orches... will join in Paris with such ... other of the free world's cele... brated musical organizations as ... the Vienna State Opera present... ing the Alban Berg opera "Woz... zeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orch... estra of the Academy of St. Ce... cilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Ra... dio) Orchestra from West Ber... lin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Or... chestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States ... be represented by the New ... ... City Ballet Company, of ... which George Balanchine is artis... ... director, in six performances ... the program of ballets with music ... Igor Stravinsky to be conducted ... the composer. Plans are being ... ... lated for an all-Negro com... ... pany to perform the Virgil Thom... son-Gertrude Stein opera "Four ... ... s in Three Acts."

The young Amer... ... tura soprano, Grace ... has been added to the ... tan Opera's roster ... the current season ... appeared last fall ... York City Opera ... December in ... Carnegie Hall.

Born in Pa... Rivera began ... there and ... U... Jo... Sc... Po... de... A... N... m... o... a... a...

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting, gave the 13th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Suite from "Il Pastor Fido" ..... Handel-Beecham
Symphony No. 6, Op. 107 ..... Sibelius
Summer Night on the River; Marche Caprice ..... Delius
Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There are few conductors today who are more interesting and, indeed, more amusing to watch than Sir Thomas Beecham.

He returned this week to conduct the Boston orchestra for the first time since 1928 (he was here with the Royal Philharmonic last season) and he was very nearly the whole show himself. This is not to say he didn't demonstrate his immense orchestral authority or that he did intrude his personality in the reading of the music beyond its capacity to accept intrusion. It is to say, however, that the program he chose was of such little consequence and required such a slim musical attention that there was little else to do but concentrate almost entirely on Sir Thomas himself.

To the eye he is a marvelous character. Short, portly but as solid and sturdy as a barrel, he marches down through the orchestral ranks like a bishop restraining a wink at spotting his closest crony in the congregation. Indeed, his entrance is so drolly majestic the men of the orchestra, as fascinated as the audience, yesterday forgot to rise (though perhaps Sir Thomas, who is reputed to have once instructed his men not to rise on the ground that he was not the "Star Spangled Banner" may have asked them not to).

Surges Across

As he faces the audience his personality surges across the division of stage and auditorium; magnificently in command, as dogged and unyielding as his compatriot Winston Churchill, he stands in triumphant aplomb. His attitude doesn't quite say we are fortunate to live in the same era and to have a chance to see him (as indeed we are), but there is nonetheless conveyed a delicious equanimity mingled with a humorous awareness of all the circumstances that is wonderfully warming; you know, the moment you see him, he is the one and only Sir Thomas, and that you're going to love every minute of him.

His conducting is no less fascinating. One moment he exhorts his men like an angry colonel (though it is hard to imagine him really angry) with lightning slashes of his baton. The next, with a gently springing rhythm of his knees, he is the picture of poetry and repose. And the next, hurling cues with a peremptory left hand, he faces the various choirs and carves the most intricate patterns in the air with his stick. Indeed, he is the only conductor I ever saw who can not only perform an aerial arpeggio with his baton but actually perform a trill with it. He seems to be personally playing every instrument.

And in point of fact he is. For all the fore going is the purely visual aspect of the matter the facade from behind which Sir Thomas operates in one of the most advanced musical esthetics of the day. Under him each instrument or instrumental ensemble is always heard, yet always perfectly blended. The line is always there; for Sir Thomas uses no score and consequently the music always moves in a continous revelation. Nuance is there, too, and infinite shades of coloration and expressivity. The contract between the movement of the Handel suite in his own charming arrangement of it, for instance: here were not the conventional alternating lights and shades but entirely different textural approaches to each. The same was true of the Rimsky-Korsakov; each movement of the adventures of Kind Dodon was framed in Sir Thomas in a different light.

Doesn't Speak Anew

It is doubtless true that he did all anyone ever could for Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and for the Delius miniatures as well. But the Sixth is almost fantastically dull; all the Sibelius sounds and procedures are there, as is the introspective melancholy. There is also Sibelius' obvious intention to extend his art and explore a higher esthetic realm than that, for example, of the Fifth. But he doesn't quite speak anew. On the contrary, he even reminisces and, in the end, proves not even to have reminisced effectively. The Delius pieces are no great shakes, either, but at least they are sure of purpose and, in the March Caprice, directly to the point.

It may be said that the orchestra was in its best estate for Sir Thomas. Needless to say, he'd see to that anyway, but it did sound especially well in the Handel suite. As for Georges Laurent, the first flutist, he never played quite so beautifully as he did in this exquisite suite set of pieces; it was some of the finest flute playing I ever heard anywhere.

Mr. Ansermet returns next week to do Bach's D major Suite, Mozart's G major Violin Concerto (with Arthur Grumiaux, soloist) and works by Honegger and Ravel.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 26 1952

MUSIC

Memorable Afternoon: Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday was a memorable afternoon at Symphony Hall, for Sir Thomas Beecham was up there on the stage guest-conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management has repaired a grave omission of many years' standing by inviting Sir Thomas to return this week. He last appeared in this capacity in 1928, and 24 years is altogether too long a time to go without the Beecham personality and his unique interpretive quality, as a Boston Symphony guest.

Unfortunately, it must be said, Sir Thomas elected to give us only one program for last Tuesday, yesterday afternoon, tonight and tomorrow afternoon. But it is a varied and a good program, and strikingly unlike those we have heard this season. First comes a Handel Suite: Movements from "The Faithful Shepherd" arranged by Mr. Beecham, followed by the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; two scores by Frederick Delius: "Summer Night on the River" and Marche Caprice, and, as finale, the Suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or."

Sir Thomas is a personality, whether conducting, writing a book, talking or making orchestral arrangements. He is also a strong temperament. Both qualities show in his Handel orchestration, which has enriched considerably the fine old Handelian texture. Except for the side-drum and the triangle at the end—which lend a fine touch of Eric Coates—this is not too modern a costuming of the Handelian frame. But it is rich and elegant, well-cut and made to last, which should be the object of any gentleman's dress.

As happened last Tuesday, the audience broke into applause after the sonorous, broad cadence of the other of the Beecham qualities, and Suite was finished. The house lights went up and late-comers were admitted. But instead of pointing out this error, verbally as he had done on Tuesday, Sir Thomas was content to smile and wait patiently for quiet.

This conductor is much more than a personality, however. He is a good deal of an interpretive virtuoso, and in his own way a genius of orchestral technic and discipline. His ear is extraordinarily keen for the full, mellow sound of a string tone which, orchestrally, should be sweet and clear and balanced, not in the least degree forced. He maintains that same vital balance with woodwinds and brass.

The result is a tone of much warmth, which played a highly important part in the Sibelius Symphony, that characteristic work of gradually integrated small fragments of themes. Sibelius can be made to sound cold, though it is altogether wrong when that happens. Steady, even rhythm is another o fthe Beecham qualities, and it is essential to the unfolding of the Finnish composer's tightly-woven fabric of constant inward motion and shifting colors. Perhaps the last work on the Beecham performance of this brief, enigmatic symphony, with its abrupt conclusion to each movement, is the fact that there was no sense either of dryness or bleakness. That proves true mastery of the Sibelius style and of Beecham's own kindling imagination.

The Delius pieces don't amount to much, but each is pleasant. "Summer Night on the River," a descriptive mood piece, is what Sir Thomas said of its companion piece, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring": ". . . a lollypop; sweet, soothing and soporific. The Marche Caprice is a competently-wrought work of a developing amateur. The whole of the "Coq d'Or" Suite (yes, by Jove, every last 16th note and general pause of it!) made the concert too long, but in a pleasant way.

Sir Thomas, mustached and goatee'd, cutaway-coated and gray-vested, looking more than ever like John Bull (beg pardon, Sir John Bull!) won a most cordial reception. He deserved every last handclap of it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 26 1952

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 30 1952

MUSIC

Fine French Pianist, Mme. de la Bruchollerie, in First Boston Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Monique de la Bruchollerie, the fine French pianist, gave her first solo concert in Boston at Jordan Hall, last night. It was high time, too, for when she made her local debut at Boston Symphony concerts Dec. 14 and 15, it was evident that she has a tremendous keyboard technic and is a powerful musical personality. Her concert last night was the first in a series to be given free to the public by the Fanny Peabody Mason Foundation.

Mme. de la Bruchollerie's keyboard prowess puts her in the first rank of the piano virtuosi. She can play with dazzling speed, octaves, full chords and all, and with a high degree of accuracy even in such a fiendishly difficult piece as the Saint-Saens Toccata, which ended the program. But technic alone does not make a musician; that is governed by intelligence, command of style and an innate grace and polish of phrase together with a sense of rhythm and the gift of making music sing.

These attributes Mme. de la Bruchollerie has in abundance, as she proved in her admirable and distinguished performance of the Mozart Variations upon "Ah! Vous dirai-je Maman," and in five items of Debussy: "La Cathedrale Engloutie," "General Lavine," "La Fille aux cheveux de lin," "Jardins sous la pluie" and "La plus que lente."

These pieces, further, gave a very good idea of her personal approach. All was vigorous, forthright and honest. Mozart was full-bodied, not overly delicate. There was none of the amorphous, shadowy fussing with Debussy that used to be—and incorrectly—the object in performing that French composer. Mme. de la Bruchollerie plays him with spirit and backbone and a splendid integration of rhythm and phrase.

All these went so well that it was amazing that she gave the Chopin B-flat minor Sonata such a mannered, hurried and generally strained performance as she did. The only ready explanation is that temperament ran away with her musicianship and good common sense. That is sometimes the way with big talents: they require firm control.

All the same, it was a very pleasant experience to hear a full evening of Mme. de la Bruchollerie's playing. She will be welcome whenever she comes again. Last night's audience, which filled every seat (some people were turned away), applauded and cheered her for minutes on end.

SOLOMON, famed British pianist, will give his only Boston concert this season in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
FEB 1 - 1952

Boston Orchestra Europe-Bound

Special to The Louisville Times

New York, Feb. 1.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut in Paris May 6, initiating a three-week tour that will take the 104-piece organization through six countries.

The symphony will be conducted by Charles Munch, its musical director who is recovering from a lengthy illness, and a longtime collegue, Pierre Monteux.

The first concert will be under the aegis of the Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom. The theme of the convention is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievement by free men in the past half-century.

Programs, scheduled on an average of about two every three days, will be given in Holland, Western Germany, Belgium, France, Italy and England.

[76]

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y
HERALD
2/1/52

Sharps and Flats

By Longhaired Lassie

The Boston Symphony Orc
as accepted an invitation fro
Congress For Cultural Freed make its first appearance in E next spring.

The aggregation of 104 pl will give three concerts in in May. It will be regarded major contribution from United States to a month exposition of the arts. The ex tion is aimed at focusing th attention of the world upon th tural achievements by free during the first half of the century.

The festival will open i French capital on April 28 an ast through May. Charles M he musical director of the or hestra, has invited his colleague,
Pierre Monteux, to share with him
the conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Or-chestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestre National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, the program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

The young American coloratura soprano, Graciela Rivera, has been added to the Metropolitan Opera's roster of artists for the current season. Miss Rivera appeared last fall with the New York City Opera, and early in December in a recital at
Carnegie Hall.

Born in Puert
Rivera began her
there and contin training on schol
Juilliard Scho
1945, she ma
debut as Adele
New Opera Co
"Fledermaus," more than 200 overseas with appeared ext abroad.

IAN SCIENC Monitor
Registered in U. S. Patent Office
AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER
BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1952

'Let's Make Music'

Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

"O. K., maestro, sound off," says three-year-old Tonu Kalam of Melrose, Mass., as Ludwig Juht, well-known virtuoso of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starts the youngster off on a music lesson with a half-size violin. Object: A spot in the symphony for little Tonu about 20 years hence. Mr. and Mrs. Juht sponsored Tonu and his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Endel Kalam, as immigrants to the United States. They were DP refugees from Estonia. Mr. Kalam is a violinist and conductor.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting, gave the 13th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Suite from "Il Pastor Fido" ..... Handel-Beecham
Symphony No. 6, Op. 107 ..... Sibelius
Summer Night on the River; Marche Caprice ..... Delius
Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There are few conductors today who are more interesting and, indeed, more amusing to watch than Sir Thomas Beecham.

He returned this week to conduct the Boston orchestra for the first time since 1928 (he was here with the Royal Philharmonic last season) and he was very nearly the whole show himself. This is not to say he didn't demonstrate his immense orchestral authority or that he did intrude his personality in the reading of the music beyond its capacity to accept intrusion. It is to say, however, that the program he chose was of such little consequence and required such a slim musical attention that there was little else to do but concentrate almost entirely on Sir Thomas himself.

To the eye he is a marvelous character. Short, portly but as solid and sturdy as a barrel, he marches down through the orchestral ranks like a bishop restraining a wink at spotting his closest crony in the congregation. Indeed, his entrance is so drolly majestic the men of the orchestra, as fascinated as the audience, yesterday forgot to rise (though perhaps Sir Thomas, who is reputed to have once instructed his men not to rise on the ground that he was not the "Star Spangled Banner" may have asked them not to).

Surges Across

As he faces the audience his personality surges across the division of stage and auditorium; magnificently in command, as dogged and unyielding as his compatriot Winston Churchill, he stands in triumphant aplomb. His attitude doesn't quite say we are fortunate to live in the same era and to have a chance to see him (as indeed we are), but there is nonetheless conveyed a delicious equanimity mingled with a humorous awareness of all the circumstances that is wonderfully warming; you know, the moment you see him, he is the one and only Sir Thomas, and that you're going to love every minute of him.

His conducting is no less fascinating. One moment he exhorts his men like an angry colonel (though it is hard to imagine him really angry) with lightning slashes of his baton. The next, with a gently springing rhythm of his knees, he is the picture of poetry and repose. And the next, hurling cues with a peremptory left hand, he faces the various choirs and carves the most intricate patterns in the air with his stick. Indeed, he is the only conductor I ever saw who can not only perform an aerial arpeggio with his baton but actually perform a trill with it. He seems to be personally playing every instrument.

And in point of fact he is. For all the fore going is the purely visual aspect of the matter the facade from behind which Sir Thomas operates in one of the most advanced musical esthetics of the day. Under him each instrument or instrumental ensemble is always heard, yet always perfectly blended. The line is always there; for Sir Thomas uses no score and consequently the music always moves in a continous revelation. Nuance is there, too, and infinite shades of coloration and expressivity. The contract between the movement of the Handel suite in his own charming arrangement of it; for instance: here were not the conventional alternating lights and shades but entirely different textural approaches to each. The same was true of the Rimsky-Korsakov; each movement of the adventures of Kind Dodon was framed in Sir Thomas in a different light.

Doesn't Speak Anew

It is doubtless true that he did all anyone ever could for Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and for the Delius miniatures as well. But the Sixth is almost fantastically dull; all the Sibelius sounds and procedures are there, as is the introspective melancholy. There is also Sibelius' obvious intention to extend his art and explore a higher esthetic realm than that, for example, of the Fifth. But he doesn't quite speak anew. On the contrary, he even reminisces and, in the end, proves not even to have reminisced effectively. The Delius pieces are no great shakes, either, but at least they are sure of purpose and, in the March Caprice directly to the point.

It may be said that the orchestra was in its best estate for Sir Thomas. Needless to say, he'd see to that anyway, but it did sound especially well in the Handel suite. As for Georges Laurent, the first flutist, he never played quite so beautifully as he did in this exquisite suite set of pieces; it was some of the finest flute playing I ever heard anywhere.

Mr. Ansermet returns next week to do Bach's D major Suite, Mozart's G major Violin Concerto (with Arthur Grumiaux, soloist) and works by Honegger and Ravel.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 26 1952

MUSIC

Memorable Afternoon: Sir Thomas Beecham Conducts at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday was a memorable afternoon at Symphony Hall, for Sir Thomas Beecham was up there on the stage guest-conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The management has repaired a grave omission of many years' standing by inviting Sir Thomas to return this week. He last appeared in this capacity in 1928, and 24 years is altogether too long a time to go without the Beecham personality and his unique interpretive quality, as a Boston Symphony guest.

Unfortunately, it must be said, Sir Thomas elected to give us only one program for last Tuesday, yesterday afternoon, tonight and tomorrow afternoon. But it is a varied and a good program, and strikingly unlike those we have heard this season. First comes a Handel Suite: Movements from "The Faithful Shepherd" arranged by Mr. Beecham, followed by the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; two scores by Frederick Delius: "Summer Night on the River" and Marche Caprice, and, as finale, the Suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or."

Sir Thomas is a personality, whether conducting, writing a book, talking or making orchestral arrangements. He is also a strong temperament. Both qualities show in his Handel orchestration, which has enriched considerably the fine old Handelian texture. Except for the side-drum and the triangle at the end—which lend a fine touch of Eric Coates—this is not too modern a costuming of the Handelian frame. But it is rich and elegant, well-cut and made to last, which should be the object of any gentleman's dress.

As happened last Tuesday, the audience broke into applause after the sonorous, broad cadence of the other of the Beecham qualities, and Suite was finished. The house lights went up and late-comers were admitted. But instead of pointing out this error, verbally as he had done on Tuesday, Sir Thomas was content to smile and wait patiently for quiet.

This conductor is much more than a personality, however. He is a good deal of an interpretive virtuoso, and in his own way a genius of orchestral technic and discipline. His ear is extraordinarily keen for the full, mellow sound of a string tone which, orchestrally, should be sweet and clear and balanced, not in the least degree forced. He maintains that same vital balance with woodwinds and brass.

The result is a tone of much warmth, which played a highly important part in the Sibelius Symphony, that characteristic work of gradually integrated small fragments of themes. Sibelius can be made to sound cold, though it is altogether wrong when that happens. Steady, even rhythm is another o fthe Beecham qualities, and it is essential to the unfolding of the Finnish composer's tightly-woven fabric of constant inward motion and shifting colors. Perhaps the last work on the Beecham performance of this brief, enigmatic symphony, with its abrupt conclusion to each movement, is the fact that there was no sense either of dryness or bleakness. That proves true mastery of the Sibelius style and of Beecham's own kindling imagination.

The Delius pieces don't amount to much, but each is pleasant. "Summer Night on the River," a descriptive mood piece, is what Sir Thomas said of its companion piece, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring": ". . . a lollypop; sweet, soothing and soporific. The Marche Caprice is a competently-wrought work of a developing amateur. The whole of the "Coq d'Or" Suite (yes, by Jove, every last 16th note and general pause of it!) made the concert too long, but in a pleasant way.

Sir Thomas, mustached and goatee'd, cutaway-coated and gray-vested, looking more than ever like John Bull (beg pardon, Sir John Bull!) won a most cordial reception. He deserved every last handclap of it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 26 1952

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 30 1952

MUSIC

Fine French Pianist, Mme. de la Bruchollerie, in First Boston Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Monique de la Bruchollerie, the fine French pianist, gave her first solo concert in Boston at Jordan Hall, last night. It was high time, too, for when she made her local debut at Boston Symphony concerts Dec. 14 and 15, it was evident that she has a tremendous keyboard technic and is a powerful musical personality. Her concert last night was the first in a series to be given free to the public by the Fanny Peabody Mason Foundation.

Mme. de la Bruchollerie's keyboard prowess puts her in the first rank of the piano virtuosi. She can play with dazzling speed, octaves, full chords and all, and with a high degree of accuracy even in such a fiendishly difficult piece as the Saint-Saens Toccata, which ended the program. But technic alone does not make a musician; that is governed by intelligence, command of style and an innate grace and polish of phrase together with a sense of rhythm and the gift of making music sing.

These attributes Mme. de la Bruchollerie has in abundance, as she proved in her admirable and distinguished performance of the Mozart Variations upon "Ah! Vous dirai-je Maman," and in five items of Debussy: "La Cathedrale Engloutie," "General Lavine," "La Fille aux cheveux de lin," "Jardins sous la pluie" and "La plus que lente."

These pieces, further, gave a very good idea of her personal approach. All was vigorous, forthright and honest. Mozart was full-bodied, not overly delicate. There was none of the amorphous, shadowy fussing with Debussy that used to be—and incorrectly—the object in performing that French composer. Mme. de la Bruchollerie plays him with spirit and backbone and a splendid integration of rhythm and phrase.

All these went so well that it was amazing that she gave the Chopin B-flat minor Sonata such a mannered, hurried and generally strained performance as she did. The only ready explanation is that temperament ran away with her musicianship and good common sense. That is sometimes the way with big talents: they require firm control.

All the same, it was a very pleasant experience to hear a full evening of Mme. de la Bruchollerie's playing. She will be welcome whenever she comes again. Last night's audience, which filled every seat (some people were turned away), applauded and cheered her for minutes on end.

SOLOMON, famed British pianist, will give his only Boston concert this season in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
FEB 1 - 1952

Boston Orchestra Europe-Bound

Special to The Louisville Times

New York, Feb. 1.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut in Paris May 6, initiating a three-week tour that will take the 104-piece organization through six countries.

The symphony will be conducted by Charles Munch, its musical director who is recovering from a lengthy illness, and a long-time collegue, Pierre Monteux.

The first concert will be under the aegis of the Exposition of the Arts, sponsored by the Congress of Cultural Freedom. The theme of the convention is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievement by free men in the past half-century.

Programs, scheduled on an average of about two every three days, will be given in Holland, Western Germany, Belgium, France, Italy and England.

[76]

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1952

The World Of Music

NEW YORK, (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concert sin Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital cultures in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Venna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestra National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Pans are being formuated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic — Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horo-Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

Music loving pilgrims will gather in White Springs Fla. on the banks of the Suwanee River, on Jan. 13 to pay homage to the memory of Stephen Collins Foster, just 88 years from the day that America's beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward at New York City's Belleveue Hospital.

He had 38 cents in his purse—a penny for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

Their shrine will be the Foster memorial museum erected by the State of Flordia and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's memorial to its favorite composer s stituated on the banks of the rver made immortal by his "Way Down Upon The Suwanee River," and surrounded by 243 acres of wood and embracing both sides of the gentle stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memeory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks At Home." The Foster memorial isan impressive southern colonial building housing eight dioramas depicting Foster's most popular songs and other Foster relics.

The young American coloratura, rano, Graciela Rivera, has been led to the Metropolitan Opera's ter of artists for the current son. Miss Rivera appeared last with the New Yorker City Op- and early in December in solo ita lat Carnege Hall.

Born on Puerto Rico. Graciela era began her musical studies re and continue her vocal ining on scholorship won at Juilliard School in New York. 1945. she made her professional ut as Adele in "Rosalinda," the w Opera Company's adaptation "Fledermaus." singing her role re than 200 times on hour and rseas with the U. S. She has eared extensively here and oad."

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

JAN 26 1952

ALSO at Carnegie Hall last week, Ernest Ansermet, a Swiss conductor who has demonstrated, through recordings, his superior handling of some of Stravinsky's early ballet scores, led the Boston Symphony in a program that included parts of "Petrouchka," which he often conducted when he was musical director of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. The first, second, and last scenes of the ballet were offered, and, in the two of these that have the fair as a setting, Ansermet delineated the numerous tumultuous episodes with extraordinary clarity. However, this score is so closely tied to the stage action, which it is meant to heighten but not supersede, that the lack of the extra dimension is undeniably felt in a concert performance. By itself, the music is wry and taintalizing at best, and, listening to it, I was reminded that it's about time one of our major dance companies restored this ballet to its repertory. Ansermet also conducted an exquisite performance of Ravel's children's pieces, "Ma Mère l'Oye," and a somewhat light but enlivening reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

[77]

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 71,974) (S 124,271)

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

Fiedler Conducts Airmen's Concert

With a borrowed baton, Arthur Fiedler, famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra and originator of the Esplanade concerts, conducted the San Antonio Symphony Orchestra in a special concert for Airmen at Lackland Air Force Base Wednesday night.

Saturday, Fiedler will be the San Antonio Syhphony's guest conductor at its regular weekly concert in the Municipal Auditorium. By that time, he hopes to recover his lost luggage so that he will have a dress suit to wear on the podium.

Fiedler's luggage, consisting of a large leather bag, was lost somewhere along the air lanes from Seattle, where he conducted the Seattle Symphony at its opening concert on Monday. On arrival here Tuesday night, he bought a toothbrush, razor and other equipment, then spent most of the night trying to trace his lost bag, which may be anywhere between Seattle and the end of the line at Houston.

But the stocky, gray-haired 57-year-old conductor lost none of his poise with his luggage. Despite loss of sleep, he conducted a lively rehearsal of the San Antonio Symphony Wednesday afternoon and had no hesitation about taking on the Lackland concert in the evening.

Fiedler, who organized the Boston Esplanade concerts in 1929, has since become known as possibly the world's leading conductor of the lighter classics and the better sort of popular tunes. Besides conducting public concerts in Boston for three months each year in the spring and summer, and making numerous guest appearances, Fiedler and his orchestra have made dozens of recordings.

In an interview Wednesday, Fiedler explained some of the workings of his two famous orchestras, both of which are really the same orchestra, made up of members of the Boston Symphony.

The Esplanade concerts were Fiedler's own idea. He not only assembled the orchestra but went out personally to raise the needed funds from private donors. His object, as it has been ever since, was to bring good music to more people, music free of charge, just as they use free public libraries and visit free museums. Only after the Esplanade concerts became successful were they taken over by the Boston Symphony.

In 1930, the year after he established the Esplanade concerts, Fiedler was appointed conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra, a Symphony subsidiary which had been operating successfully since 1885.

Fiedler doesn't really think the lighter type of music in which he [illegible] than the "heavier" type [illegible] by symphony orchestras.

But, he declares, "pop [illegible] is very important" because many people it is their first introduction to anything better than tin-pan alley tunes or hillbilly ditties. By sandwiching a Bach fugue in between selections from "Oklahoma" or "The Desert Song," Fiedler feels he is educating his public in the most painless way.

Light music is not necessarily easier to conduct and [illegible]

NOTHING TO WEAR, mourns Arthur Fiedler, impeccable conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, as he faces dreary prospect of wearing this tweed jacket to conduct the San Antonio Symphony in concert at Lackland. Fiedler's evening clothes and baton are in bag which was mislaid somewhere between Seattle and San Antonio.—Staff Photo.

This Clipping From
SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN

ERNEST ANSERMET

Ansermet Conducts Rare Ravel Suite

As a matter of the tenuous and the impalpable, Ernest Ansermet has few peers among current conductors thus when he chooses to include Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite on the program of his first appearance in Carnegie Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it behooves the wise music-lover to listen. Wise or not, this one did, and found the effort more than rewarding.

Ansermet contr[illegible] long-loved work a[illegible] by including two sec[illegible] ballet score that a[illegible] in the customary [illegible] prejude (which e[illegible] ly enough, at the [illegible] a "Danse du Roi[illegible] lows immediately [illegible] pleasant enough, [illegible] with material fo[illegible] "Pavane of the S[illegible] and the "Dance of [illegible] er conventional k[illegible] wheel music pa[illegible] from the Suite [illegible] d'Omphale." The [illegible] ly played, of co[illegible] the familiar mel[illegible] vane," "Hop o[illegible] "Beauty and t[illegible] that Ansermet [illegible] bres together with his try and a kind of pur[illegible] sensitivity which can ne[illegible] overfamiliar. Richard [illegible] olin playing reminds [illegible] the conductor is no[illegible] performers, with a [illegible] incidental solo that [illegible] and finesse.

The evening began [illegible] thoven No. 5 (Symph[illegible] fication is necessary [illegible] with a high sense of [illegible] no overwhelmingly po[illegible] tude, and ended with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," which Ansermet plays like an old master. Clearly it is a master who means even more to him than that older one, Beethoven.

—IRVING KOLODIN

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

MUSICAL

[illegible] loving pilgrims gathered [illegible] Springs, Fla., on the [illegible] the Suwanee River to [illegible]nage to the memory of [illegible] Collins Foster, just 88 [illegible]m the day that America's [illegible]olk song composer died in [illegible] ward in New York City's [illegible] Hospital.

[illegible]d 38 cents in his purse—a [illegible] each year of his tempes- [illegible]t rewarding life.

[illegible]ter Memorial Museum has [illegible]cted by the State of Flor- [illegible] opened to the public little [illegible]an a year ago. America's [illegible]l to its favorite composer [illegible]ted on the banks of the [illegible]de immortal by his 'Way [illegible]pon the Suwanee River," [illegible]rrounded by 243 acres of [illegible]d bordering both sides of [illegible]tle stream.

[illegible]State of Florida has hon- [illegible]ster's memory by choosing [illegible] official state song, "Old [illegible]t Home," perhaps his best- [illegible]ng.

* * *

[illegible]ela Rivera, young Puerto [illegible]oloratura who used to sing [illegible]e San Carlo Opera Co., [illegible]n added to the Metropoli- [illegible]era's roster of artists for [illegible]rent season. Miss Rivera [illegible]d last Fall with the New [illegible]ty Opera and early in De- [illegible] in solo recital at Carnegie [illegible] She was heard in Los An- [illegible]with the San Carlo com- [illegible] Gilda in "Rigoletto."

[illegible] Pearson, Hollywood so- [illegible]rano and former Atwater Kent [illegible]Auditions winner, has just won [illegible]the Young Artists Auditions spon- [illegible]sored by the Federation of Wom- [illegible]en's Clubs in Portland, Ore.

[illegible]Her prize will be an appear- [illegible]ance with the Portland Symphony [illegible]Orchestra on March 17. Miss [illegible]Pearson was soloist here with the [illegible]Lyric Club and was a member of [illegible]the Hollywood Oratorio Singers.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has [illegible] invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring.

The aggregation of 104 players under the direction of Charles Munch, and Pierre Monteux, will give three concerts in Paris in May, as the major U.S. contribution to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century.

In other fields, the U.S. will be represented by the New York City Ballet Co., of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are afoot for an all-Negro company to perform Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," which has a text by Gertrude Stein.

* * *

[illegible] is organizing an 80-piece concert orchestra next month with membership open free to qualified instrumentalists in this community.

Stephen De'ak head of the string instruments department in the SC School of Music, will be the orchestra's conductor, assisted by Edwin F. Jones, staff assistant.

The Vine St. Chamber Group is the name of a new instrumental ensemble which will perform classical and contemporary works. Personnel includes Adrian Holland, violin, Morrie Brenner, viola, Joseph DiTullio, cello and Carmen Coppolo, flute, and will be enlarged as the organization grows.

* * *

Julius Klatchen, pianist, will be soloist tomorrow night on the third concert of the Beverly Hills Philharmonic Artists Assn.'s current season.

David Frisina, concertmaster of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, will share the solo spotlight, performing two movements from Respighi's "Gregoriano" concerto. Young Klatchen will play the Beethoven "Emperor"

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1952

The World Of Music

NEW YORK, (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concert sin Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital cultures in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Venna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestra National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Pans are being formuated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic — Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horo-Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown. The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

Music loving pilgrims will gather in White Springs Fla. on the banks of the Suwanee River, on Jan. 13 to pay homage to the memory of Stephen Collins Foster, just 88 years from the day that America's beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward at New York City's Belleveue Hospital.

He had 38 cents in his purse—a penny for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

Their shrine will be the Foster memorial museum erected by the State of Flordia and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's memorial to its favorite composer s stituated on the banks of the rver made immortal by his "Way Down Upon The Suwanee River," and surrounded by 243 acres of wood and embracing both sides of the gentle stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memeory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks At Home." The Foster memorial isan impressive southern colonial building housing eight dioramas depicting Foster's most popular songs and other Foster relics.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 26 1952

ALSO at Carnegie Hall last week, Ernest Ansermet, a Swiss conductor who has demonstrated, through recordings, his superior handling of some of Stravinsky's early ballet scores, led the Boston Symphony in a program that included parts of "Petrouchka," which he often conducted when he was musical director of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. The first, second, and last scenes of the ballet were offered, and, in the two of these that have the fair as a setting, Ansermet delineated the numerous tumultuous episodes with extraordinary clarity. However, this score is so closely tied to the stage action, which it is meant to heighten but not supersede, that the lack of the extra dimension is undeniably felt in a concert performance. By itself, the music is wry and tantalizing at best, and, listening to it, I was reminded that it's about time one of our major dance companies restored this ballet to its repertory. Ansermet also conducted an exquisite performance of Ravel's children's pieces, "Ma Mère l'Oye," and a somewhat light but enlivening reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

The young American coloratura rano, Graciela Rivera, has been led to the Metropolitan Opera's ter of artists for the current son. Miss Rivera appeared last with the New Yorker City Op-. and early in December in solo ita lat Carnege Hall.

Born on Puerto Rico. Graciela era began her musical studies re and continue her vocal ining on scholorship won at Juilliard School in New York. 1945, she made her professional but as Adele in "Rosalinda," the w Opera Company's adaptation "Fledermaus," singing her role re than 200 times on hour and erseas with the U. S. She has eared extensively here and oad."

[77]

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 71,974) (S 124,271)
This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
JAN 17 1952

Fiedler Conducts Airmen's Concert

San Antonio Express
THURSDAY, JAN. 17, 1952 S SECTION B

With a borrowed baton, Arthur Fiedler, famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra and originator of the Esplanade concerts, conducted the San Antonio Symphony Orchestra in a special concert for Airmen at Lackland Air Force Base Wednesday night.

Saturday, Fiedler will be the San Antonio Syhphony's guest conductor at its regular weekly concert in the Municipal Auditorium. By that time, he hopes to recover his lost luggage so that he will have a dress suit to wear on the podium.

Fiedler's luggage, consisting of a large leather bag, was lost somewhere along the air lanes from Seattle, where he conducted the Seattle Symphony at its opening concert on Monday. On arrival here Tuesday night, he bought a toothbrush, razor and other equipment, then spent most of the night trying to trace his lost bag, which may be anywhere between Seattle and the end of the line at Houston.

But the stocky, gray-haired 57-year-old conductor lost none of his poise with his luggage. Despite loss of sleep, he conducted a lively rehearsal of the San Antonio Symphony Wednesday afternoon and had no hesitation about taking on the Lackland concert in the evening.

Fiedler, who organized the Boston Esplanade concerts in 1929, has since become known as possibly the world's leading conductor of the lighter classics and the better sort of popular tunes. Besides conducting public concerts in Boston for three months each year in the spring and summer, and making numerous guest appearances, Fiedler and his orchestra have made dozens of recordings.

In an interview Wednesday, Fiedler explained some of the workings of his two famous orchestras, both of which are really the same orchestra, made up of members of the Boston Symphony.

The Esplanade concerts were Fiedler's own idea. He not only assembled the orchestra but went out personally to raise the needed funds from private donors. His object, as it has been since, was to bring good music to more people, music free of charge, just as they use free public libraries and visit free museums. Only after the Esplanade concerts became successful were they taken over by the Boston Symphony.

In 1930, the year after he established the Esplanade concerts, Fiedler was appointed conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra, a Symphony subsidiary which had been operating successfully since 1885.

Fiedler doesn't really think the lighter type of music in which he [illegible] than the "heavier" type played by symphony orchestras.

But, he declares, "pop music is very important" because to many people it is their first introduction to anything better than tin-pan alley tunes and hillbilly ditties. By sandwiching a Bach fugue in between selections from "Oklahoma" or "The Desert Song," Fiedler feels he is educating his public in the most painless way.

Light music is not necessarily easier to conduct and play than the more serious music, Fiedler avers. In fact, he says, it may be more difficult. "There is nothing harder to conduct than a Strauss waltz," he declares. Orchestral music has not been very successful on television, Fiedler noted in passing, because there is not enough action to entertain the eye. "Things that are going on in a radio shive are good enough for TV shows," he declares.

Alessandro took a hand in the interview to point out that Fiedler has probably given a hand to more young conductors than any dozen other orchestra leaders," by giving them an opportunity to be heard as soloists with his orchestra. Fiedler has also been a champion of American composers and conductors, Alessandro pointed out.

Fiedler himself, when presented by Alessandro, admitted that he, "discovered" Leroy Anderson, who has since become a top-level popularity as a composer of "semi-popular" tunes many of which were written expressly for the Boston Pops.

NOTHING TO WEAR, mourns Arthur Fiedler, impeccable conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, as he faces dreary prospect of wearing this tweed jacket to conduct the San Antonio Symphony in concert at Lackland. Fiedler's evening clothes and baton are in bag which was mislaid somewhere between Seattle and San Antonio.—Staff Photo.

This Clipping From
SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD-TIMES
JAN 27 1952

ERNEST ANSERMET

Ansermet Conducts Rare Ravel Suite

As a matter of the tenuous and the impalpable, Ernest Ansermet has few peers among current conductors thus when he chooses to include Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite on the program of his first appearance in Carnegie Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it behooves the wise music-lover to listen. Wise or not, this one did, and found the effort more than rewarding.

Ansermet contrived to give the long-loved work a tinge of novelty by including two sections from the ballet score that are not included in the customary concert suite. A prelude (which comes, appropriately enough, at the beginning) and a "Danse du Rouet" follows immediately. The [illegible] pleasant enough, though [illegible] with material found in the [illegible] "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty" and the "Dance du Rouet" is [illegible] er conventional kind of [illegible] wheel music not much different from the Saint-Saens "[illegible] d'Omphale." These were [illegible] ly played, of course, but [illegible] the familiar miniatures [illegible] vane," "Hop o' My [illegible] "Beauty and the Bee[illegible] that Ansermet fitted tones [illegible] bres together with his special artistry and a kind of purely personal sensitivity which can never become overfamiliar. Richard Burgin's violin playing reminded us again that the conductor is no better than his performers, with a treatment of the incidental solo that was all deftness and finesse.

The evening began with the Beethoven No. 5 (Symphony, if identification is necessary) assembled with a high sense of integration, if no overwhelmingly personal attitude, and ended with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," which Ansermet plays like an old master. Only it is a master who means even more to him than that older one, Beethoven.

—IRVING KOLODIN

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

MUSICAL

loving pilgrims gathered Springs, Fla., on the
the Suwanee River to age to the memory of Collins Foster, just 88
m the day that America's olk song composer died in ward in New York City's Hospital.
38 cents in his purse—a each year of his tempesrewarding life.

er Memorial Museum has cted by the State of Flor-opened to the public little an a year ago. America's to its favorite composer ed on the banks of the de immortal by his "Way pon the Suwanee River," rounded by 243 acres of bordering both sides of le stream.

State of Florida has hon-ster's memory by choosing official state song, "Old Home," perhaps his best-ng.

• • •

la Rivera, young Puerto oloratura who used to sing
e San Carlo Opera Co., added to the Metropoliera's roster of artists for rent season. Miss Rivera last Fall with the New ty Opera and early in Dein solo recital at Carnegie e was heard in Los An-ith the San Carlo com-
Gilda in "Rigoletto."

Pearson, Hollywood so-nd former Atwater Kent
s winner, has just won ng Artists Auditions sponthe Federation of Wombs in Portland, Ore.
prize will be an appear-
th the Portland Symphony ra on March 17. Miss was soloist here with the lub and was a member of llywood Oratorio Singers.

• • •

Boston Symphony Orches-
s accepted invitation
he Congress for Cultural m to make its first appear-Europe next Spring.
aggregation of 104 players
the direction of Charles and Pierre Monteux, will hree concerts in Paris in s the major U.S. contribua month-long exposition of ts. The exposition is aimed using the attention of the upon the cultural achieve-by free men during the first the 20th Century.
other fields, the U.S. will be ented by the New York City
o., of which George Bae is artistic director, in rformances, one program of with music by Igor Stra-to be conducted by the oser. Plans are afoot for an egro company to perform Thomson's opera, "Four s in Three Acts," which has t by Gertrude Stein.

• • •

is organizing an 80-piece rt orchestra next month membership open free to fied instrumentalists in this unity.
ephen De'ak head of the string uments department in the SC ol of Music, will be the orra's conductor, assisted by n F. Jones, staff assistant.
e Vine St. Chamber Group is name of a new instrumental ome which will perform
ical and contemporary works.
onnel includes Adrian Hol-violin, Morrie Brenner, viooseph DiTullio, cello and Car-Coppolo, flute, and will be ged as the organization s.

• • •

lius Klatchen, pianist, will be ist tomorrow night on the l concert of the Beverly Hills harmonic Artists Assn.'s curseason.
avid Frisina, concertmaster of Los Angeles Philharmonic Or-tra, will share the solo spot
, performing two movements n Respighi's "Gregoriano" certo. Young Klatchen will the Beethoven "Emperor

TIGHT BINDING

PASTE OVER

This Clipping From GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE
JAN 17 1952

The World Of Music

NEW YORK, (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next spring.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concert sin Paris in May. It will be regarded as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th century.

The festival will open in the French capital on April 28 and will last through May. Charles Munch, the musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital cultures in the free world.

To that end, the Paris cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck;" the Venna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the R.I.A.S. (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestre du Conservatoire and the Orchestra National, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director, in six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Pans are being formuated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

Nena del Rosario, a 15-year-old pianist from the Philippines will be soloist with The New York Philharmonic — Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Igor Buketoff at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, Jan. 5. It will be the second in the current series of Philharmonic young people's concerts for boys and girls between the ages of nine and 15.

Miss del Rosario is at present a scholarship student at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. She was chosen by Vladimir Horo-Chasins from among musically-gifted high school students in the metropolitan New York area as one of the 1951 finalists in Radio Station WQXR's "Musical Talent in Our Schools" broadcast series.

Miss del Rosario began her piano studies in Manila under the tutelage of her mother at the age of three and a half. When the Japanese invaded the Philippines, the Rosarios fled to safety in the mountainous interior, leaving all their household effects and personal possessions behind them.

Senora del Rosario was resolved that not even war should prevent the child from developing the remarkable talent she had shown The determined mother pleaded with 20 men of the community who, at risk of their lives, worked in shifts to carry Nena's small upright piano over rice paddies and up and down steep trails to a mountain retreat where the youngster was able to continue her daily practice throughout the war years.

Music loving pilgrims will gather in White Springs Fla. on the banks of the Suwanee River, on Jan. 13 to pay homage to the memory of Stephen Collins Foster, just 88 years from the day that America's beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward at New York City's Belleveue Hospital.

He had 38 cents in his purse—a penny for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

Their shrine will be the Foster memorial museum erected by the State of Flordia and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's memorial to its favorite composer s stituated on the banks of the rver made immortal by his "Way Down Upon The Suwanee River," and surrounded by 243 acres of wood and embracing both sides of the gentle stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memeory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks At Home." The Foster memorial isan impressive southern colonial building housing eight dioramas depicting Foster's most popular songs and other Foster relics.

The young American coloratura rano, Graciela Rivera, has been led to the Metropolitan Opera's ter of artists for the current son. Miss Rivera appeared last with the New Yorker City Op-, and early in December in solo ita lat Carnege Hall.

born on Puerto Rico, Graciela era began her musical studies re and continue her vodal ining on scholorship won at Juilliard School in New York. 1945, she made her professional out as Adele in "Rosalinda," the w Opera Company's adaptation "Fledermaus," singing her role re than 200 times on hour and erseas with the U. S. She has peared extensively here and oad."

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 26 1952

ALSO at Carnegie Hall last week, Ernest Ansermet, a Swiss conductor who has demonstrated, through recordings, his superior handling of some of Stravinsky's early ballet scores, led the Boston Symphony in a program that included parts of "Petrouchka," which he often conducted when he was musical director of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. The first, second, and last scenes of the ballet were offered, and, in the two of these that have the fair as a setting, Ansermet delineated the numerous tumultuous episodes with extraordinary clarity. However, this score is so closely tied to the stage action, which it is meant to heighten but not supersede, that the lack of the extra dimension is undeniably felt in a concert performance. By itself, the music is wry and tantalizing at best, and, listening to it, I was reminded that it's about time one of our major dance companies restored this ballet to its repertory. Ansermet also conducted an exquisite performance of Ravel's children's pieces, "Ma Mère l'Oye," and a somewhat light but enlivening reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

[77]

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 71,974) (S 124,271)
This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.,
EXPRESS
JAN 17 1952

Fiedler Conducts Airmen's Concert

San Antonio Express
THURSDAY, JAN. 17, 1952 S SECTION B

With a borrowed baton, Arthur Fiedler, famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra and originator of the Esplanade concerts, conducted the San Antonio Symphony Orchestra in a special concert for Airmen at Lackland Air Force Base Wednesday night.

Saturday, Fiedler will be the San Antonio Syhphony's guest conductor at its regular weekly concert in the Municipal Auditorium. By that time, he hopes to recover his lost luggage so that he will have a dress suit to wear on the podium.

Fiedler's luggage, consisting of a large leather bag, was lost somewhere along the air lanes from Seattle, where he conducted the Seattle Symphony at its opening concert on Monday. On arrival here Tuesday night, he bought a toothbrush, razor and other equipment, then spent most of the night trying to trace his lost bag, which may be anywhere between Seattle and the end of the line at Houston.

But the stocky, gray-haired 57-year-old conductor lost none of his poise with his luggage. Despite loss of sleep, he conducted a lively rehearsal of the San Antonio Symphony Wednesday afternoon and had no hesitation about taking on the Lackland concert in the evening.

Fiedler, who organized the Boston Esplanade concerts in 1929, has since become known as possibly the world's leading conductor of the lighter classics and the better sort of popular tunes. Besides conducting public concerts in Boston for three months each year in the spring and summer, and making numerous guest appearances, Fiedler and his orchestra have made dozens of recordings.

In an interview Wednesday, Fiedler explained some of the workings of his two famous orchestras, both of which are really the same orchestra, made up of members of the Boston Symphony.

The Esplanade concerts were Fiedler's own idea. He not only assembled the orchestra but went out personally to raise the needed funds from private donors. His object, as it has been since, was to bring good music to more people, music free of charge, just as they use free public libraries and visit free museums. Only after the Esplanade concerts became successful were they taken over by the Boston Symphony.

In 1930, the year after he established the Esplanade concerts, Fiedler was appointed conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra, a Symphony subsidiary which had been operating successfully since 1885.

Fiedler doesn't really think the lighter type of music in which he [illegible] than the "heavier" type played by symphony orchestras.

But, he declares, "pop music is very important" because for many people it is their first introduction to anything better than tin-pan alley tunes and hillbilly ditties. By sandwiching a Bach fugue in between selections from "Oklahoma" or "The Desert Song," Fiedler feels that he is educating his public in the most painless way.

Light music is not necessarily easier to conduct and play than the more serious Fiedler avers. In fact, it may be more difficult. "There is nothing harder to conduct than a Strauss waltz."

Orchestral music has become very successful on radio, Fiedler noted in part because there is not enough television to entertain the eye. "Things that are going over on radio alive are good musical news," he declares.

Alessandro took a hand in the interview to point out that "Fiedler has probably given a hand to more young conductists than any dozen orchestra leaders," by giving them an opportunity to be heard as soloists with his orchestra. Fiedler, has also been a friend to new composers and encouraged Alessandro pointed out.

Fiedler himself, acknowledged by Alessandro, admitted he, "discovered" Leroy Anderson, who has since become top-level popularity as a composer of "semi-popular" music many of which were written expressly for the Boston Pops.

NOTHING TO WEAR, mourns Arthur Fiedler, impeccable conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, as he faces dreary prospect of wearing this tweed jacket to conduct the San Antonio Symphony in concert at Lackland. Fiedler's evening clothes and baton are in bag which was mislaid somewhere between Seattle and San Antonio.—Staff Photo.

This Clipping From
SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD-TIMES
JAN 27 1952

ERNEST ANSERMET

Ansermet Conducts Rare Ravel Suite

As a matter of the tenuous and the impalpable, Ernest Ansermet has few peers among current conductors thus when he chooses to include Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite on the program of his first appearance in Carnegie Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it behooves the wise music-lover to listen. Wise or not, this one did, and found the effort more than rewarding.

Ansermet contrived to give the long-loved work a tinge of novelty by including two sections from the ballet score that are not included in the customary concert suite: A prelude (which comes, appropriately enough, at the beginning) and a "Danse du Rouet," which follows immediately. The prelude is pleasant enough, though it deals with material found in the familiar "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," and the "Dance du Rouet" is rather conventional kind of spinning-wheel music not much different from the Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale." These were beautifully played, of course, but it was in the familiar miniatures—the "Pavane," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Beauty and the Beast," etc.—that Ansermet fitted tones and timbres together with his special artistry and a kind of purely personal sensitivity which can never become overfamiliar. Richard Burgins violin playing reminded us again that the conductor is no better than his performers, with a treatment of the incidental solo that was all deftness and finesse.

The evening began with the Beethoven No. 5 (Symphony, if identification is necessary) assembled with a high sense of integration, if no overwhelmingly personal attitude, and ended with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," which Ansermet plays like an old master. Only it is a master who means even more to him than that older one, Beethoven.

—IRVING KOLODIN

Concert

han the more serious cl Fiedler avers. In fact, he may be more difficult, " nothing harder to co
han a Strauss waltz," he Orchestral music has not very successful on telev Fiedler noted in passing cause there is not enou
tion to entertain the eye.
things that are going to radio alive are good music
news," he declares.

Alessandro took a hand interview to point out
Fiedler has probably giv
hand to more young concer
tists than any dozen othe chestra leaders," by giving an opportunity to be hea soloists with his orchestra.
ler has also been a frien
new composers and conduc
Alessandro pointed out.
Fiedler himself, when pr
ed by Alessandro, admitted
he, "discovered" Leroy A son, who has since leape
top-level popularity as a poser of "semi-popular" t
many of which were writte
cially for the Boston Pop to give the tinge of novelty sections from the

are not included concert suite: A mes, appropriate-
e beginning) and uet," which fol-
The prelude is though it deals
d in the familiar leeping Beauty," u Rouet" is rath-nd of spinning-
much different
aens' "Le Rouet
were beautiful-
, but it was in atures—the "Pa-
My Thumb,"
Beast,' etc. —
ed tones and tim-

his special artis-
f purely personal can never become chard Burgins vi
nded us again that no better than his
a treatment of the hat was all deftness

egan with the Beeymphony, if identissary) assembled
se of integration, it
gly personal, at d with Stravinsky's which Ansermet old master. Only o means even mor
at, older one, Bee

—IRVING KOLODIN

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

MUSICAL SCORE

...pilgrims gathered ... Concerto with Alfred Wallenstein ... Los Angeles Orchestra.

Other listings include Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, the ... movement from Schubert's ... Symphony in C Major and the "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes by Richard Strauss.

* * *

Edward Rebner's Sextet for Woodwinds and piano (1951) will have its first performance anywhere Monday night under auspices of Evenings on the Roof in West Hollywood Auditorium.

Performing artists will be Bert Gassman, William Kosinski, Fred Fox, Jack Marsh, Lloyd Hildebrand and Charlotte Zelka.

Rebner will also play Schubert's Sonata in D Major, Op. 53 for piano and accompany Soprano ... Mock in Schumann's song cycle, "Dichterliebe."

MUSIC AND DANCE THIS WEEK

Tonight

... and Asoka, Hindu dancers; Las ... Theater, 8:30 p.m.

... Faculty series, second concert; ... Hall, UCLA; 8:30 p.m.

... "La Boheme"; San Gabriel ... Playhouse; 8:30 p.m.

... "The Student Prince" con... by Jose Rubinoff with Paul Keast, Donna Phillips and others; Barnum Hall, Santa Monica High School; 8:15 p.m.

Tomorrow

Chamber music of Beethoven, Mozart ... Brant played by George Drexler ... Jules Conpin, violin and Albert Pal... ...; Los Angeles County Museum, Exposition Park; 3 p.m.

... String Quartet plays chamber music of Beethoven, Schubert, Hindemith and Schoenberg; Pasadena Playhouse, 3:30 p.m.

Baroque Festival, directed by Alice Ehlers with the University Symphony Orchestra conducted by Ingolf Dahl, Irene Robertson, organist and Charles C. Hirt conducting the A Cappella Choir and soloists; Board Auditorium, SC; 4 p.m.

Music by Buxtehude and J. S. Bach with ... Elsasser, organ, Dorothy Coulter and Ann Shaw Price, soprano, June ... contralto, Scotte Sloan, baritone, and the Cathedral Choir; Wilshire Methodist Church; 7:30 p.m.

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, ... Wallenstein, conductor, David Frisina, violin, and Julius Klatchen, piano, soloists; Beverly Hills High School Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

... and Asoka, Hindu dancers; Las ... Theater; 8:30 p.m.

... Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Harold Byrns with June Kovich, piano, ... Pope, oboe, soloists; Wilshire ... Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Monday

... Olevsky, violinist, in recital; Wilshire ... Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Evenings on the Roof presents Alice ..., soprano with Edward Rebner at the piano in Schumann's song cycle, "Dichterliebe" and other works; West Hollywood Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

... and Asoka, Hindu dancers; ... through Saturday; Las Palmas ... 8:30 p.m.

Tuesday

... pianist, in recital; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Thursday

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, ... Wallenstein, conductor, with soloists Jan Merriman, mezzo soprano, David ... tenor, and Desire Ligeti, bass, performing Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

ROCHESTER, MINN.
POST-BULLETIN

FEB 1 1952

Lukas Foss Takes Horblit Award For Piano Composition

It is announced that the Mark M Horblit award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra last November.

The Mark M. Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 1 - 1952

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY GOES ABROAD IN APRIL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will sail from New York on April 28 on the Ile de France for its three-week tour of Europe. George E. Judd, the manager, who has returned from a trip abroad to arrange itinerary and programming, announced the plans, which are now in their semi-final stages.

The orchestra will play approximately two concerts every three days; concerts are planned for thirteen cities in six countries, including Paris, the Hague, Strasbourg and London. Charles Munch, who has been suffering from illness, is expected to share the conducting assignments with Pierre Monteux.

Funds to finance the trip are provided from private philanthropy by the Exposition Committee of the American Committee for Cultural Freedom. The orchestra's European debut will be made at the Paris Opera House on May 6. The concerts are part of the Exposition of the Arts, which also will see performances by the New York City Ballet Company.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE

All the elements combined yesterday afternoon to give us the best all-around concert we've had all season long.

There was, in the first place, a program crammed with musical interest from beginning to end and one, moreover, that had cumulative impact providing a pleasant sense of fulfillment. There was, in the second place, a remarkable new violinist in Arthur Grumiaux, a 30-year-old Belgian who plays with impeccable taste to convey a degree of musical refinement not often encountered in these days of virtuosity for its own sake. Finally, there was Mr. Ansermet presiding over the orchestra (itself in top form) with infinite clarity of style.

Incredible though it may seem, Mozart's G major Violin Concerto was given its first performance at these concerts yesterday. It is true, of course, that both the piano and violin concertos of Mozart are regrettably neglected. There is a practical reason for this in the fact that instrumental soloists have learned that they can not bring down the house with them. Inasmuch as a soloist's reclame derives solely from his capacity to bring down a house, even the greatest of them can not afford to risk Mozart, unless he can follow up later with a more spectacular demonstration of his abilities.

* * *

THIS WAS THE situation yesterday, and worked out, to the greatest advantage of Mr. Grumiaux, who established himself beyond question in the Mozart as a mature and finished musical artist, a man of immense technique, to be sure, but more particularly a communicating musician. He did not strive for big sounds or grandiose effects; his playing was simple, straightforward, refined but not over-elegant, warm but not over-rhapsodic. And, using a mute for the cadenza of the slow movement, he produced one of those magical moments that soared into the blue.

Later, with Ravel's Tzigane, Mr. Grumiaux had the opportunity to display his technical attainments complete with gypsy bravura, the hot-house tones of the G string in the highest register, harmonics, quadruple stops and various other brilliant effects. The piece itself, begining with a long solo cadenza of a dark-hued nature, is generally lesser Ravel, but it is certainly effective and has lain to long neglected hereabouts. The violinist, incidentally, won a very gratifying response from the audience on both occasions.

* * *

A NEW WORK by Honegger is always an interesting event, and if the Monopartita, the unusual title evidently signifying a set of pieces held together by a common theme, is not a work of large proportion, it is nonetheless a moving work. Its character is serious, its thematic substance strong and virile, its textures contemporary but not aggressively so. It holds the attention and it makes its point; I would say it is one of the better new works we have had in some time, and all the more so for its lack of pretentiousness.

Pacific 231, a work not heard here since the composer himself conducted it in 1929, remains one of the more striking orchestral scherzos of recent times. This musical portrait of a locomotive starting, gathering speed, thundering along and finally grinding to a stop, is wonderfully effective. Though there are none of the obvious sounds effects of the whistle, etc., the pictorial illusion is complete; even without the title it would, I am sure, convey its mechanistic inspiration. But whether it would or not, it would certainly stun the listener with its ingenuity, its orchestral virtuosity, its overall sound and fury.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet brought the concert to a close with an extremely clear-cut performance of Ravel's "La Valse." In place of the frantic emotion this work is sometimes subjected to, all ending in the catastrophic disintegration of the romantic waltz, there was a certain reserve, a certain feeling of restraint and delicacy. The difficult closing moments were flawed by minor technical accidents, but nothing of consequence, and it all brought the end to a perfect afternoon of music and music making.

Next week Mr. Ansermet will conduct Beethoven's Second, a suite by Debussy, and Bartok's masterpiece, the Concerto for Orchestra.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 14th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Arthur Grumiaux, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture No. 3 in D	Bach
Concerto in G major, K. 216	Mozart
Monopartita; "Pacific 231"	Honegger
Tzigane; "La Valse"	Ravel

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

FEB 2 - 1952

MUSIC

Arthur Grumiaux Plays Mozart and Ravel Works With Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight bring as soloist another highly gifted string player. He is Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist now 30 years old and on his first visit to this country. For his Boston debut he plays the Mozart Violin Concerto in G major (K. 216), and Ravel's "Tzigane." This program, conducted by Ernest Ansermet, further includes the D major Suite of Bach; Honegger's Monopartita (first performance in the United States) and "Pacific 231," and Ravel's "La Valse."

It is not often you hear such completely relaxed and easeful violin playing as Mr. Grumiaux exhibited yesterday in the Mozart Concerto. It was sheer beauty in rhythm and phrasing, sweet and rich of tone and absolutely perfect in style. As it so happens, and for what reasons no one can tell, this Concerto had never been performed before by the Boston Symphony, although it is a familiar staple of violin recitals, with the orchestral part reduced for piano.

Mr. Grumiaux obviously is a born musician, and one of the first rank. Otherwise the Mozart Concerto would not have been done with such profoundly correct style and such lyrical beauty. Even the cadenzas were treated not as interludes for virtuoso display, but as integral parts of the work.

The technical fireworks came later, and abundantly, in the spectacular Gypsy piece of Ravel. Nearly the whole bag of fiddler's tricks is required for the "Tzigane," and Mr. Grumiaux proved he commands them all. But in every measure, whether Mozart or Ravel, he showed an over-all sense of extraordinary musical intelligence, together with a masterful bow arm and uncanny technical accuracy. This young man should be heard here again. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

The two Honegger pieces came as a sort of pre-birthday celebration for the French composer, who will be 60 on March 10. His Monopartita, composed last year, is a sort of small suite of short movements played continuously, with the main theme of the beginning repeated at the end. There is no resemblance, nonetheless, to the conventional partita form. What the Monopartita will add to Honegger's reputation or the sum total of music, I cannot see. The work is sullen and mostly sluggish, conveying at first acquaintance nothing but a preoccupation with occasional fierce dissonance and mechanical patterns.

"Pacific 231," which might have been expected to sound dated, holds up remarkably well. It is a masterpiece compared to the Monopartita. Descriptive music, especially that intended to depict a giant locomotive getting under way, may not be the highest form of tonal expression. But here, at least, you have technical cleverness, and the piece moves with a certain masterful if crude vigor that is irresistible.

The orchestra played well for Mr. Ansermet throughout the afternoon. The Bach Suite was most satisfactorily done, and "La Valse," while it did not become exciting until toward the end, received a superbly clear reading.

Boston Post 2/2

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony Concerts are on the eventful side. They are bringing to us a new and able violinist, Arthur Grumiaux, who is playing the G major Violin Concerto of Mozart, heretofore absent from the programs of our orchestra. Honegger's "Monopartita" is receiving its first performances in the United States, and his locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1929, is being conducted by Ernest Ansermet, to whom the score is dedicated. Mr. Grumiaux's other number is the tricky "Tzigane" of Ravel, whose "La Valse" ends this interesting list, the initial item on which is Bach's D major Suite.

It will be recalled that Koussevitzky included "Pacific" on his first Boston program (he had recently premiered the work in Paris), but when he came to repeat that program at the beginning of his final Boston season, he found the piece no longer interested him and he replaced it with Honegger's Symphony for Strings. Hearing it in Mr. Ansermet's shrewdly paced performance yesterday, one was glad that the Swiss conductor had not lost his taste for it. "Pacific" is an extremely effective piece, one of the most original, most completely typical compositions of the 20th century.

They will be playing "Pacific," I fancy, long after they have forgotten all about the "Monopartita" that Mr. Honegger completed less than a year ago. This work of novel title and design has some interesting, even eloquent moments, and some needlessly ugly ones.

We can be grateful to Mr. Grumiaux for reminding us of the musical charm of Mozart's Third Concerto, which has been overshadowed by its two successors. The Adagio, which the young Belgian violinist played in beautiful fashion, is especially appealing. In the rondo soloist and conductor were occasionally at odds over the tempo. This concerto is not particularly exacting technically, and it was in the showpiece of Ravel that Mr. Grumiaux had a chance to display his virtuosity, which is truly remarkable. Here, it would seem, is a violinist who will bear watching.

The extremes of the program, inhabiting wholly different esthetic worlds, were admirably set forth. Mr. Ansermet's Bach sounded like Bach, not like premature Wagner. And in "La Valse" the guest conductor accomplished the most brilliant single bit of directing that we have heard from him. Under his baton this much-abused choreographic poem came fully into its own. Mr. Ansermet's extraordinary rhythmic sense enabled him to extract the last ounce of intoxication, of tension and of mounting excitement that this transcendent study in three-four time has to offer. Complete justice was also done to Ravel's rich and varied orchestral palette. An amazing performance.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

FEB 1 - 1952

Cultural War

A great task force is moving out from the United States in May. It is bound for Paris—Paris-in-the-spring. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will lay a barrage of 20th-century European and American music. The New York City Ballet, having established a toe hold on the alien shores, will let loose a fantastic array of flying misses. Men of letters like William Faulkner and John Dos Passos will infiltrate the surrounding terrain to lecture and preside over forums of discussion.

All of this is by way of meeting the great cultural offensive which the Soviet Union has been conducting in Europe in recent years. It will be part of an unusual exposition of the arts to be held under the international Congress For Cultural Freedom, with comparable artistic enterprises and personalities from England, France, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria.

The free world is at last on its toes, blowing its own horn, acting its part, painting itself in its true colors, speaking out in the multiple accents of creative independence. The galaxy of plays, operas, concerts, art shows, and forums which will go to make up the exposition should do something to show the resources of "bourgeois cosmopolitanism" in a divided world. Since the American contribution will depend on private philanthropy rather than government subsidy, we trust that alert citizens will be prompt to recognize the potentialities in this constructive sort of war.

[78]

Concert

than the more serious cl Fiedler avers. In fact, he
it may be more difficult, is, nothing harder to co
than a Strauss waltz," he s
Orchestral music has not very successful on tele
Fiedler hoted in passing cause there is not enou
tion to entertain the eye.
things that are going to radio alive are good music
news," he declares.
Alessandro took a hand i interview to point out
"Fiedler has probably giv
hand to more young concer
tists than any dozen othe
chestra leaders," by giving an opportunity to be hear soloists with his orchestra.
ler has also been a frien
new composers and conduc
Alessandro pointed out.
Fiedler himself, when pr
ed by Alessandro, admitted
he "discovered" Leroy A
son, who has since leape
top-level popularity as a poser of "semi-popular" t
many of which were writte specially for the Boston Pop

d to give the inge of novelty
ctions from the not included ncert suite: A
, appropriateeginning) and t," which fol-
The prelude is hough it deals
in the familiar eping Beauty," Rouet" is rath-
d of spinning-
much different
ens' "Le Rouet
were beautiful-
e, but it was in tures—the "Pa-
My Thumb,"
Beast,' etc.
ed tones and tim-

his special artispurely personal an never become hard Burgins vi
ded us again that
no better than his
a treatment of the
at was all deftness

gan with the Bee
mphony, if identi
ssary) assembled
e of integration,
gly personal at
with Stravinsky's
which Ansermet
d master. Only means even mo
at, older one, Bee

IRVING KOLODIN

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

MUSICAL SCORE

Many young pilgrims gathered in White Springs, Fla., on the banks of the Suwanee River to pay homage to the memory of the composer Stephen Collins Foster, who died 88 years from the day that America's most beloved folk song composer died in a charity ward in New York City's Bellevue Hospital.

He had 25 cents in his purse—a symbol for each year of his tempestuous but rewarding life.

A Foster Memorial Museum has been erected by the State of Florida and opened to the public little more than a year ago. America's most popular composer is situated on the banks of the river made immortal by his "Way Down Upon the Suwanee River," and consists, by 243 acres of woodland, flanking both sides of the great stream.

The State of Florida has honored Foster's memory by choosing as its official state song, "Old Folks at Home," perhaps his best-loved song.

* * *

Graciela Rivera, young Puerto Rican coloratura who used to sing with the San Carlo Opera Co., has been added to the Metropolitan Opera's roster of artists for the current season. Miss Rivera appeared last Fall with the New York City Opera and early in December in solo recital at Carnegie Hall. She was heard in Los Angeles with the San Carlo company as Gilda in "Rigoletto."

Betty Pearson, Hollywood soprano and former Atwater Kent Auditions winner, has just won the Young Artists Auditions sponsored by the Federation of Women's Clubs in Portland, Ore.

Her prize will be an appearance with the Portland Symphony Orchestra on March 17. Miss Pearson was soloist here with the Lyric Club and was a member of the Hollywood Oratorio Singers.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring.

The aggregation of 104 players under the direction of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, will give [illegible] in Paris in May, as a part of U.S. contribution to a [illegible] exposition of the arts. The exposition is aimed at [illegible] attention of the world [illegible] cultural achievements [illegible] during the first half of the 20th Century.

In other words, the U.S. will be represented by the New York City Ballet, of which George Balanchine is artistic director. An all-Stravinsky program, one program of ballets to music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer. Plans are afoot for an all-Negro company to perform Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," which has a text by Gertrude Stein.

* * *

SC is organizing an 80-piece concert orchestra next month with membership open free to qualified instrumentalists in this community.

Stephen Deak, head of the string instruments department in the SC School of Music, will be the orchestra's conductor, assisted by Edwin F. Jones, staff assistant.

The Vine St. Chamber Group is the name of a new instrumental ensemble which will perform classical and contemporary works. Personnel includes Adrian Holland, Lou Morrie Brenner, violas; Jerome Toback, cello and Carlo Coppola, flute, and will be enlarged as the organization grows.

* * *

[illegible], pianist, will be [illegible] night on the [illegible] of the Beverly Hills [illegible] Assn.'s cur-

[illegible] concertmaster of [illegible] Philharmonic Or-[illegible] Angeles, solo spot [illegible] two movements [illegible] Respighi's "Gregoriano" [illegible] Young Klatchen will [illegible] Beethoven "Emperor"

Concerto with Alfred Wallenstein and the Los Angeles Orchestra. Other listings include Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, the first movement from Schubert's Seventh Symphony in C Major and the "Rosenkavalier" Waltzes by Richard Strauss.

* * *

Edward Rebner's Sextet for Woodwinds and piano (1951) will have its first performance anywhere Monday night under auspices of Evenings on the Roof in West Hollywood Auditorium.

Performing artists will be Bert Gassman, William Kosinski, Fred Fox, Jack Marsh, Lloyd Hildebrand and Charlotte Zelka.

Rebner will also play Schubert's Sonata in D Major, Op. 53 for piano and accompany Soprano Alice Mock in Schumann's song cycle, "Dichterliebe."

MUSIC AND DANCE THIS WEEK

Tonight

Sujata and Asoka, Hindu dancers; Las Palmas Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Music Faculty series, second concert; Royce Hall, UCLA; 8:30 p.m.

Puccini's "La Boheme"; San Gabriel Mission Playhouse; 8:30 p.m.

Romberg's "The Student Prince" conducted by Jaye Rubinoff with Paul Keast, Donna Phillips and others; Barnum Hall, Santa Monica High School; 8:15 p.m.

Tomorrow

Chamber music of Beethoven, Mozart and Reger played by George Drexler, flute, John Coppin, violin and Albert Falkove, viola; Los Angeles County Museum, Exposition Park; 3 p.m.

Hollywood String Quartet plays chamber music of Beethoven, Schubert, Hindemith and Schoenberg; Pasadena Playhouse, 3:30 p.m.

Baroque Festival, directed by Alice Ehlers with the University Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Ingolf Dahl, Irene Robertson, organist and Charles C. Hirt conducting the A Cappella Choir and soloists; Bovard Auditorium, SC; 4 p.m.

Music by Buxtehude and J. S. Bach with Richard Ellsasser, organ, Dorothy Coulter and Ann Shaw Price, soprano, June Stevens, contralto, Scotte Sloan, baritone and the Cathedral Choir; Wilshire Methodist Church; 7:30 p.m.

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Alfred Wallenstein, conductor, David Frisina, violin, and Julius Klatchen, piano, soloists; Beverly Hills High School Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Sujata and Asoka, Hindu dancers; Las Palmas Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Byrns Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Harold Byrns with June Kovich, piano, and Gordon Pope, oboe, soloists; Wilshire Ebell Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Monday

Julian Olevsky, violinist, in recital; Wilshire Ebell Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Evenings on the Roof presents Alice Mock, soprano with Edward Rebner at the piano in Schumann's song cycle, "Dichterliebe" and other works; West Hollywood Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Sujata and Asoka, Hindu dancers; nightly through Saturday; Las Palmas Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Tuesday

Solomon, pianist, in recital; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Thursday

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Alfred Wallenstein, conductor, with soloists, Nan Merriman, mezzo soprano, David Lloyd, tenor, and Desire Ligeti, bass, performing Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Friday

Repeat of Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra program; Philharmonic Auditorium; 2:15 p.m.

Saturday

Richard Dyer-Bennet, balladeer, in a program of folk music; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

[illegible]position

[illegible] is announced that the Mark M. Horblit award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra last November.

The Mark M. Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 1 - 1952

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY GOES ABROAD IN APRIL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will sail from New York on April 28 on the Ile de France for its three-week tour of Europe. George E. Judd, the manager, who has returned from a trip abroad to arrange itinerary and programming, announced the plans, which are now in their semi-final stages.

The orchestra will play approximately two concerts every three days; concerts are planned for thirteen cities in six countries, including Paris, the Hague, Strasbourg and London. Charles Munch, who has been suffering from illness, is expected to share the conducting assignments with Pierre Monteux.

Funds to finance the trip are provided from private philanthropy by the Exposition Committee of the American Committee for Cultural Freedom. The orchestra's European debut will be made at the Paris Opera House on May 6. The concerts are part of the Exposition of the Arts, which also will see performances by the New York City Ballet Company.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE

All the elements combined yesterday afternoon to give us the best all-around concert we've had all season long.

There was, in the first place, a program crammed with musical interest from beginning to end and one, moreover, that had cumulative impact providing a pleasant sense of fulfillment. There was, in the second place, a remarkable new violinist in Arthur Grumiaux, a 30-year-old Belgian who plays with impeccable taste to convey a degree of musical refinement not often encountered in these days of virtuosity for its own sake. Finally, there was Mr. Ansermet presiding over the orchestra (itself in top form) with infinite clarity of style.

Incredible though it may seem, Mozart's G major Violin Concerto was given its first performance at these concerts yesterday. It is true, of course, that both the piano and violin concertos of Mozart are regrettably neglected. There is a practical reason for this in the fact that instrumental soloists have learned that they can not bring down the house with them. Inasmuch as a soloist's reclame derives solely from his capacity to bring down a house, even the greatest of them can not afford to risk Mozart, unless he can follow up later with a more spectacular demonstration of his abilities.

* * *

THIS WAS THE situation yesterday, and worked out to the greatest advantage of Mr. Grumiaux, who established himself beyond question in the Mozart as a mature and finished musical artist, a man of immense technique, to be sure, but more particularly a communicating musician. He did not strive for big sounds or grandiose effects; his playing was simple, straightforward, refined but not over-elegant, warm but not over-rhapsodic. And, using a mute for the cadenza of the slow movement, he produced one of those magical moments that soared into the blue.

Later, with Ravel's Tzigane, Mr. Grumiaux had the opportunity to display his technical attainments complete with gypsy bravura, the hot-house tones of the G string in the highest register, harmonics, quadruple stops and various other brilliant effects. The piece itself, begining with a long solo cadenza of a dark-hued nature, is generally lesser Ravel, but it is certainly effective and has lain to long neglected hereabouts. The violinist, incidentally, won a very gratifying response from the audience on both occasions.

* * *

A NEW WORK by Honegger is always an interesting event, and if the Monopartita, the unusual title evidently signifying a set of pieces held together by a common theme, is not a work of large proportion, it is nonetheless a moving work. Its character is serious, its thematic substance strong and virile, its textures contemporary but not aggressively so. It holds the attention and it makes its point; I would say it is one of the better new works we have had in some time, and all the more so for its lack of pretentiousness.

Pacific 231, a work not heard here since the composer himself conducted it in 1929, remains one of the more striking orchestral scherzos of recent times. This musical portrait of a locomotive starting, gathering speed, thundering along and finally grinding to a stop, is wonderfully effective. Though there are none of the obvious sounds effects of the whistle, etc., the pictorial illusion is complete; even without the title it would, I am sure, convey its mechanistic inspiration. But whether it would or not, it would certainly stun the listener with its ingenuity, its orchestral virtuosity, its overall sound and fury.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet brought the concert to a close with an extremely clear-cut performance of Ravel's "La Valse." In place of the frantic emotion this work is sometimes subjected to, all ending in the catastrophic disintegration of the romantic waltz, there was a certain reserve, a certain feeling of restraint and delicacy. The difficult closing moments were flawed by minor technical accidents, but nothing of consequence, and it all brought the end to a perfect afternoon of music and music making.

Next week Mr. Ansermet will conduct Beethoven's Second, a suite by Debussy, and Bartok's masterpiece, the Concerto for Orchestra.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 14th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Arthur Grumiaux, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture No. 3 in D	Bach
Concerto in G major, K. 216	Mozart
Monopartita; "Pacific 231"	Honegger
Tzigane; "La Valse"	Ravel

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

FEB 2 - 1952

MUSIC

Arthur Grumiaux Plays Mozart and Ravel Works With Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight bring as soloist another highly gifted string player. He is Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist now 30 years old and on his first visit to this country. For his Boston debut he plays the Mozart Violin Concerto in G major (K. 216), and Ravel's "Tzigane." This program, conducted by Ernest Ansermet, further includes the D major Suite of Bach; Honegger's Monopartita (first performance in the United States) and "Pacific 231," and Ravel's "La Valse."

It is not often you hear such completely relaxed and easeful violin playing as Mr. Grumiaux exhibited yesterday in the Mozart Concerto. It was sheer beauty in rhythm and phrasing, sweet and rich of tone and absolutely perfect in style. As it so happens, and for what reasons no one can tell, this Concerto had never been performed before by the Boston Symphony, although it is a familiar staple of violin recitals, with the orchestral part reduced for piano.

Mr. Grumiaux obviously is a born musician, and one of the first rank. Otherwise the Mozart Concerto would not have been done with such profoundly correct style and such lyrical beauty. Even the cadenzas were treated not as interludes for virtuoso display, but as integral parts of the work.

The technical fireworks came later, and abundantly, in the spectacular Gypsy piece of Ravel. Nearly the whole bag of fiddler's tricks is required for the "Tzigane," and Mr. Grumiaux proved he commands them all. But in every measure, whether Mozart or Ravel, he showed an over-all sense of extraordinary musical intelligence, together with a masterful bow arm and uncanny technical accuracy. This young man should be heard here again. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

The two Honegger pieces came as a sort of pre-birthday celebration for the French composer, who will be 60 on March 10. His Monopartita, composed last year, is a sort of small suite of short movements played continuously, with the main theme of the beginning repeated at the end. There is no resemblance, nonetheless, to the conventional partita form. What the Monopartita will add to Honegger's reputation or the sum total of music, I cannot see. The work is sullen and mostly sluggish, conveying at first acquaintance nothing but a preoccupation with occasional fierce dissonance and mechanical patterns.

"Pacific 231," which might have been expected to sound dated, holds up remarkably well. It is a masterpiece compared to the Monopartita. Descriptive music, especially that intended to depict a giant locomotive getting under way, may not be the highest form of tonal expression. But here, at least, you have technical cleverness, and the piece moves with a certain masterful if crude vigor that is irresistible.

The orchestra played well for Mr. Ansermet throughout the afternoon. The Bach Suite was most satisfactorily done, and "La Valse," while it did not become exciting until toward the end, received a superbly clear reading.

Boston Post 2/4/52

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony Concerts are on the eventful side. They are bringing to us a new and able violinist, Arthur Grumiaux, who is playing the G major Violin Concerto of Mozart, heretofore absent from the programs of our orchestra. Honegger's "Monopartita" is receiving its first performances in the United States, and his locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1929, is being conducted by Ernest Ansermet, to whom the score is dedicated. Mr. Grumiaux's other number is the tricky "Tzigane" of Ravel, whose "La Valse" ends this interesting list, the initial item on which is Bach's D major Suite.

It will be recalled that Koussevitzky included "Pacific" on his first Boston program (he had recently premiered the work in Paris), but when he came to repeat that program at the beginning of his final Boston season, he found the piece no longer interested him and he replaced it with Honegger's Symphony for Strings. Hearing it in Mr. Ansermet's shrewdly paced performance yesterday, one was glad that the Swiss conductor had not lost his taste for it. "Pacific" is an extremely effective piece, one of the most original, most completely typical compositions of the 20th century.

They will be playing "Pacific," I fancy, long after they have forgotten all about the "Monopartita" that Mr. Honegger completed less than a year ago. This work of novel title and design has some interesting, even eloquent moments, and some needlessly ugly ones.

We can be grateful to Mr. Grumiaux for reminding us of the musical charm of Mozart's Third Concerto, which has been overshadowed by its two successors. The Adagio, which the young Belgian violinist played in beautiful fashion, is especially appealing. In the rondo soloist and conductor were occasionally at odds over the tempo. This concerto is not particularly exacting technically, and it was in the showpiece of Ravel that Mr. Grumiaux had a chance to display his virtuosity, which is truly remarkable. Here, it would seem, is a violinist who will bear watching.

The extremes of the program, inhabiting wholly different esthetic worlds, were admirably set forth. Mr. Ansermet's Bach sounded like Bach, not like premature Wagner. And in "La Valse" the guest conductor accomplished the most brilliant single bit of directing that we have heard from him. Under his baton this much-abused choreographic poem came fully into its own. Mr. Ansermet's extraordinary rhythmic sense enabled him to extract the last ounce of intoxication, of tension and of mounting excitement that this transcendent study in three-four time has to offer. Complete justice was also done to Ravel's rich and varied orchestral palette. An amazing performance.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

FEB 1 - 1952

Cultural War

A great task force is moving out from the United States in May. It is bound for Paris—Paris-in-the-spring. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will lay a barrage of 20th-century European and American music. The New York City Ballet, having established a toe hold on the alien shores, will let loose a fantastic array of flying misses. Men of letters like William Faulkner and John Dos Passos will infiltrate the surrounding terrain to lecture and preside over forums of discussion.

All of this is by way of meeting the great cultural offensive which the Soviet Union has been conducting in Europe in recent years. It will be part of an unusual exposition of the arts to be held under the international Congress For Cultural Freedom, with comparable artistic enterprises and personalities from England, France, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria.

The free world is at last on its toes, blowing its own horn, acting its part, painting itself in its true colors, speaking out in the multiple accents of creative independence. The galaxy of plays, operas, concerts, art shows, and forums which will go to make up the exposition should do something to show the resources of "bourgeois cosmopolitanism" in a divided world. Since the American contribution will depend on private philanthropy rather than government subsidy, we trust that alert citizens will be prompt to recognize the potentialities in this constructive sort of war.

Unfortunately, no funds are available for living expenses. But, with the burden of present tuition fees removed and the basis of admission entirely that of aptitude and talent, the center expects to have an even more brilliant group of students than in the past.

One point I should like to emphasize most strongly. Tanglewood has become so identified in the public mind with advanced work on a pre-professional level that we have not succeeded in making clear to the public at large that a quite different kind of music lover is equally welcome. This year a significant development is planned in this direction. For the first time a section of the school will be called the Tanglewood Study Group, and will work under its own supervisor.

We have secured the services of a remarkable musician from California, Ingolf Dahl — composer, conductor, pianist and musical historian—who will head this division. It will be his job to see to it that the intelligent amateur and music enthusiast, also the general music student and music educator, will combine forces for the exploration, discovery and performance - for - the - joy-of-performing such music as seems appropriate for their needs.

Innovation

Another innovation for this group: Tanglewood has never before accepted students for less than the full six-week summer session. This year, however, in order to make the study group available to those who cannot attend the full school term, students in that division will be accepted for shorter enrollments of two and four weeks as well as six. It goes without saying that members of the study group are encouraged to take part in the varied activities of the school.

A final new development is the opening of the chamber music and song repertoire divisions to students who wish to concentrate in these alone, without the requirement to take part in the orchestra or opera department as has formerly been the case. There has been an increasing demand for just such training from students who wish to concentrate in these special fields. These students, however, are not to be included in the all-scholarship policy mentioned above.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

FEB 5 - 1952

Editorial Comment

MUSICAL PEARLS

The young ladies who regularly bring their knitting to the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra probably have rare abilities for keeping their hands from knowing what the musicians are doing. Otherwise we would rather not wear what the girls are making.

Can you imagine a pair of socks in the manner of Wagner? Or a muffler under the influence of Stravinsky? Something surely would become frayed if a discordant note should slip into, say a set of twin sweaters. Have an ear to the music if you will, ladies, but keep a firm hand on the needle.—Christian Science Monitor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1952

Music: Roundu

By ARTHUR F

Tanglewood: The Berkshire Music Center is revising what has been known as its Department V, and Ingolf Dahl will come here next summer from the University of Southern California to head it. It will take the form of a study group for amateurs who play or sing a bit. Also, in order to open it to a still broader public, the school will accept enrollments for two-week periods. This will enable people with vacations of this duration to enjoy the benefits of planned group musical activity. For the first time, too, during the coming summer, the school orchestra will be made up entirely of scholarship students, who will be selected on the basis of their qualification to become part of this group and how much they are needed to fill it out.

Has Serious Music Fizzled Out? Statistics Indicate as Much!

By RUDOLPH ELIE

"Music," said Sir Thomas Beecham during the course of an hilarious press conference last week, "has fizzled out." Pressed for further thoughts on the matter, Sir Thomas, easily one of the ranking raconteurs of the day, with that marvelous memory for details and dates necessary to the art, replied as follows: "The last symphonic premiere of consequence took place in 1924 when I gave the first performance of Sibelius' Seventh Symphony in England. The last operatic premiere of consequence took place in Milan in 1926 when Puccini's 'Turandot' was first given."

"Music," said Sir Thomas Beecham during the course of an hilarious press conference last week, "has fizzled out." Pressed for further thoughts on the matter, Sir Thomas, easily one of the ranking racconteurs of the day, with that marvelous memory for details and dates necessary to the art, replied as follows: "The last symphonic premiere of consequence took place in 1924 when I gave the first performance of Sibelius' Seventh symphony in England. The last operatic premiere of consequence took place in Milan in 1926 when Puccini's 'Turandot' was first given."

Continuing in this vein, Sir Thomas went on to say that early in his career, which is to say during the years between 1890 and 1920, hardly a week passed but there was a premiere of a masterwork. To him for study and performance came the latest works of everyone from Sibelius to Ravel, from Elgar to Puccini. There was, he said, an avalanche of exciting new music. But it all fizzled out in the mid-'20's, and nothing of consequence has happened in music since. We are, he said, at the bottom of the creative cycle in music and can only await a happier day in the future.

ALL BEFORE 1925

At the time I felt Sir Thomas was being a little too pessimistic; older men customarily look back upon their earlier days as being the only great epoch in a nostalgic view of "the good old days." But much the same thought was recently expressed by Ernest Ansermet, who also lived through the "good old days" and knew all the excitement of the great premieres, many of which he gave himself. And, to check their views against the record, I have been glancing back to learn the dates of some of these first performances.

Consider the premiere dates of the following pieces now in the standard repertoire: Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2 was first given in 1902, his Third Concerto in 1909 and his E minor Symphony in 1901; Prokofieff's Scythian Sute, 1914, and the Classical Symphony 1916, while the piano concertos mostly date from the 'teens.

Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," 1909; "La Valse," 1920; Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," 1917; "Pines of Rome," 1924; Falla's "El Amor Brujo," 1915; "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," 1919; Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue and the Concerto in F, 1924 and '25 respectively; Honegger's "King David," 1921; D'Indy's "Istar" 1896; the B flat Symphony, 1902; Elgar's "Enigma Variations, 1899. ("Pomp and Circumstance," 1901).

Holst's "Planets," 1915; Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsodies, 1910; Griffes' "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," 1919; Arthur Foote's E major Suite, 1910; MacDowell's D minor Concerto, 1890; Mahler's "Das Lied Von Der Erde," 1908; his Ninth Symphony 1909.

Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" 1899; Sibelius' First 1899, his Fifth 1914 ("Finlandia" 1908); Strauss' "Don Juan" 1888, "Till," 1895, the Alpine Symphony 1915; Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, 1910, London Symphony, 1914; Walton's "Facade" 1922; Shostakovitch's First Symphony, 1926; Stravinsky's "Firebird," 1910; "Petrouchka," 1911, "Sacre du Printemps," 1913; Debussy's Nocturnes, 1899, "La Mer," 1905, Images, 1912; Delius' "A Walk to Paradise Garden," 1912; Bloch's "Schelomo," 1915; Berg's "Wozzeck," 1924; Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," 1897, and Chausson's "Poeme," 1896.

It may be pointed out that some of the composers above did continue working after the mid-'20's. Stravinsky, of course, is still active and his new "Rake's Progress" may well prove to be one of his masterpieces. Shostakovitch's Fifth dates from 1937, and is established as one of the great repertoire pieces. Strauss' last opera was given only a few years ago, but it is generally felt that he never again touched the heights of "Der Rosenkavalier" of 1911. Prokofieff's second Violin Concerto and also "Peter and the Wolf" were first given in the mid-30's while his Sixth Symphony is of recent composition.. Rachmaninoff's "Paganini" Variations date from 1934.

INTERESTING TO KNOW

So what have been other notable premieres since Sir Thomas' arbitrary date of 1926? Well, I would say that Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, dating from 1945, is clearly a masterpiece. Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake" of the mid-'40's is, too, as are Hindemith's "Marthis der Maler" and "Nobilissima Visione," one dating from 1934, the other from 1938. Harris' Third Symphony, 1939, appears to be a classic, as perhaps does Randall Thompson's Second Symphony of 1931. Copland's "Appalachian Spring" of 1945 will long remain in the repertoire, as will Messaien's "L'Ascension" of about 1930.

But these works about exhaust the notable premieres of the last 25 years in the matter of established repertoire pieces. It may be argued that operas of Monotti and Britten are safely in the repertoire, and perhaps they are. But such post - "Turnadot" operas as "Peter Ibetson," "Schwanda," and "Emperor Jones" do not exactly glitter with immortality.

Thus there seems to be no doubt that Sir Thomas was right. Music does seem to have fizzled out. It may be some consolation to reflect on the fact that writers on music in all ages have made more or less the same melancholy statement, but something tells me they didn't keep statistics, and didn't have access to the world-wide information we have today. It will, at any rate, be interesting to know, 25 years from today, what has been overlooked.

Tanglewood: The Berkshire Music Center is revising what has been known as its Department V, and Ingolf Dahl will come here next summer from the University of Southern California to head it. It will take the form of a study group for amateurs who play or sing a bit. Also, in order to open it to a still broader public, the school will accept enrollments for two-week periods. This will enable people with vacations of this duration to enjoy the benefits of planned group musical activity. For the first time, too, during the coming summer, the school orchestra will be made up entirely of scholarship students, who will be selected on the basis of their qualification to become part of this group and how much they are needed to fill it out.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1952

THE WORLD

BY ROSS PARMENTER

THE podium of the Boston Symphony is a powerful lure. When Charles Munch became ill Ernest Ansermet was willing to drop the book he was writing in Switzerland, while on sabbatical leave from his own orchestra, in order to come to Boston to conduct. Now Leonard Bernstein, after first refusing, has decided to leave his composing in Mexico in order to conduct the Boston Symphony for three weeks. Mr. Bernstein will take over after Richard Burgin fills in the week following the end of Mr. Ansermet's engagement.

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN

FEB 3 - 1952

Ernest Ansermet, the eminent Swiss conductor, has taken over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Pierre Monteux as guest conductor.

Ansermet is filling in for Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, who has been forced to take an extended rest. Munch is under medical advice to curtail his activities because of complications which developed after a recent virus infection.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

FEB 5 - 1951

Americans To Appear In Paris

BOSTON: The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut May 6 at the Paris Opera House where it will play for the month-long Exposition of the Arts. The Exposition is sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Julius Fleischmann, Cincinnati financier, is chairman of the Exposition committee. The theme of the Congress is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other arts.

Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston orchestra, will share the conducting assignments with Pierre Monteux, formerly conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," almost 39 years after he introduced the work in the same theater.

The orchestra's tour in Europe will include The Hague, Amsterdam, Strasbourg, Brussels, Turin, Milan and London. Other American participants in the Exposition will be the New York City Center Ballet and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter. The Hall Johnson Choir, distinguished U. S. Negro ensemble, will sing.

Among the operas to be given are "Billy Budd" by Benjamin Britten, as presented by the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden; "Wozzeck" by Alban Berg, as given at Salzburg by the Vienna State Opera; "Oedipus Rex," new opera-oratorio by Stravinsky with libretto by Jean Cocteau. The Paris Opera will sing performances of "Pelleas and Melisande," "Ariadne auf Naxos," "Bluebeard" and "The Medium."

* * *

Two big league conductors received permanent posts recently. Paul Paray, eminent French conductor who was enthusiastically received in Cincinnati several seasons ago, has signed a three-year contract to lead the re-activated Detroit Symphony Orchestra. William Steinberg, director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, has been appointed permanent conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.

1952

Music to

NEW WORKS OF MARTIN AND BARTO

Bartók's Concerto for Viola—a work which he left uncompleted at his death—was heard publicly for the first time in New York from the Boston Symphony and William Primrose, after previous experience via radio and records. In addition to some feeling of dissatisfaction with the first movement—which, it seems likely, Bartók would have revised in more than details—the concert performance left the impression that the work has more of a future in the electronic mediums than "live." Surely such beautiful music as the slow movement and so lively an experience as the finale are better fare than nine-tenths of the violist's repertory.

However, the limitations of the instrument for a large hall—even when so powerful a player as Primrose pulls the uttermost in tone from it—put everyone concerned at a disadvantage. What registers as delicate nuance on the microphone's all-hearing ear seemed merely uninflected in the hall, and the lightness of Tibor Serly's scoring verged on lack of detail. In both respects, the recording makes more of an aural impression than was heard in the concert hall.

Ernest Ansermet's conducting was all one could ask in this work, and Primrose, of course, is its predestined interpreter. Ansermet was also fantastically adroit and all-knowing in Ravel's "Ma Mère L'Oye" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" earlier in the week, but his G minor symphony of Mozart revived a style one had thought by now outmoded. Full of graces and attitudes, it moved along on the lightest of feet, in the old manner.

TANGLEWOOD'S FUTURE

Measures to Insure Continuity Include Extensive New Scholarship Program

By AARON COPLAND,

Composer and Assistant Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE summer of 1952 will mark the tenth anniversary session of the Berkshire Music Center. No one will find it strange, I suppose, if those of us who have been with the school from the start feel that this is a moment for rejoicing! This by now well-known school of music was established in 1940 because Serge Koussevitzky persuaded the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to undertake an unprecedented step: the formation of a summer school under the aegis of a symphony orchestra.

Before long the plan was enlarged to include the departments of opera production, composition and the study of the art of conducting. Beyond this—and here was a special love of Dr. Koussevitzky — a division of the school was to be set up for the musical enthusiast who wanted to spend a summer of "living and working in music."

Dr. Koussevitzky had the profound satisfaction of seeing his dream brought to reality. Everyone knows what Tanglewood came to mean in the mind of this great leader. Upon his death last spring there arose considerable speculation as to the course the school would take. It is indeed a pleasure to be able to announce in no uncertain terms that Tanglewood will go on! The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who have maintained the school at considerable sacrifice, have shown a sympathetic understanding of what is being accomplished in the Berkshire hills.

Last summer, to fill the gap caused by the death of Dr. Koussevitzky, the group of musicians who head the school's departments formed an administrative committee to carry out the projects he had planned. This board consisted of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, Leonard Bernstein, Hugh Ross, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Boris Goldovsky and myself.

Scholarships

It has always been the hope of the sponsors of the school that no talented student would be prevented from attending the center for lack of money to pay tuition fees. This year for the first time certain sections of the school are being placed frankly on an all-scholarship basis. This means that any student accepted for active work in the advanced departments will receive tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Fund.

[79]

...ring From
...w of Literature
YORK, N. Y.
...EB 2 - 1952

Music to

...OF MARTIN AND BARTO

...certo for Viola—a work
...t uncompleted at his
...rd publicly for the first
York from the Boston
...d William Primrose, experience via radio
In addition to some
...tisfaction with the first
...hich, it seems likely,
have revised in more
...he concert performance
...sion that the work has
...ture in the electronic
"live." Surely such
...e as the slow movement
an experience as the
...r fare than nine-tenths
...repertory.
...e limitations of the in-large hall—even when
...o powerful a player as
...Primrose pulls the utter-
...most in tone from it—
...ut everyone concerned
...t a disadvantage. What
...egisters as delicate nu-
...nce on the micro-
...hone's all-hearing ear
...eemed merely uninflec-
...ed in the hall, and the ...ghtness of Tibor Serly's
...coring verged on lack
...f detail. In both re-
...pects, the recording
...akes more of an aural
...mpression than was
...eard in the concert hall.
Ernest Ansermet's con-
...ucting was all one
this work, and Prim-
...e, is its predestined
...nsermet was also fan-
...it and all-knowing in
...ère L'Oye" and Stra-
...ouchka" earlier in the G minor symphony of
...d a style one had
...w outmoded. Full of
...itudes, it moved along
...of feet, in the old canc-

...TURE

...y Include

...Program

...Music Center.
...that Tanglewood
...e trustees of the
...y Orchestra, who
the school at con-
...e, have shown a
...rstanding of what
...lished in the Berk-

...to fill the gap
...eath of Dr. Kous-
...roup of musicians
...hool's departments
...nistrative commit-
...t the projects he
...is board consisted
...in, the concert-
...Boston Symphony,
...on, Hugh Ross,
...ky, William Kroll,
and myself.

...been the hope of
...the school that no
...t would be pre-
...ending the center
...ay to pay tuition for the first time
...of the school are
...kely on an all-
...This means that
...epted for active
...ced departments
...grants from the
...Fund.

...ted in Chron. I

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 3

MUSIC

...st Auserment Concerts;
...st Ansermet Concerts;

...N STORY SMITH

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1952

Bernstein, Munch to Lead Symphony in Final Weeks

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba., in greatly improved health after his recent illness. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28 he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress For Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicholas Nabokov, its secretary-general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for six weeks, Beginning July 5.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1952

Judd Meeting With Tanglewood Advisory Group

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Boston today for a meeting with the Tanglewood Advisory Committee this noon at the Pittsfield Country Club. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss plans for the coming Tanglewood season and hear details of the European trip that the orchestra is planning for May.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
FEB 6 1952

WNYC Gets Music Award

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation, in commemoration of its 10th anniversary, will present its first award for "public service in music" to WNYC, on the opening day of the city station's 13th annual American Music Festival which runs from February 12 to 22, inclusive.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the late renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a scroll to Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri at the opening festival concert in Town Hall to be broadcast by WNYC on Tuesday, from 3 to 5 p. m. The scroll will recognize WNYC's "distinguished service to American composers and its outstanding contribution to the cause of contemporary music."

The award was authorized in a resolution passed by the board of directors of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation at its January 19 meeting and forwarded to Seymour N. Siegel, director of radio communications for the City of New York.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 6 - 1952

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Fourth in Series of Providence Concerts

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ernest Ansermet conducting, played the fourth concert of its series here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. This marked Mr. Ansermet's second consecutive appearance here with the orchestra during Dr. Munch's absence. He was greeted warmly and conducted a program which was notable for perfection of detail and beauty of tone.

The program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a ..... Brahms
Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian," Op. 90 ..... Mendelssohn
I. Allegro vivace
II. Andante con moto
III. Con moto moderato
IV. Saltarello: Presto
"Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from the Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80 ..... Faure
I. Prelude: Quasi adagio
II. "Fileuse": Andantino quasi allegretto
III. Adagio
"La Mer," Three Orchestra Sketches ... Debussy
I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer
II. Jeux de vagues
III. Dialogue du vent et de la mer

It was good to hear the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." The theme was announced with great dignity and as the variations were played, one after the other, the outstanding quality seemed to be the graceful flow of the rhythm. In the variation in a minor key, the dark colors of the low-toned instruments were most expressive. The section in the inimitable waltz rhythm was delightful.

Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony was meticulously phrased. The freshness and life of the Allegro suggested a pleasant canter over the moors. The Andante was wistful and plaintive. The third movement displayed the perfection of the horn section. It was in the final movement, the Saltarello, that the full brilliance of the orchestra was realized. The pace was extremely rapid and the delicacy and precision of the strings and reeds would be hard to match.

A change in the program gave us "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure in place of the two Debussy Nocturnes which had been announced. It was an acceptable substitute, since we also had Debussy's "La Mer." The Faure Prelude was ethereal in its orchestration and extremely delicate tonal effects were made here. The little spinning song was graceful and gay and it afforded the English horn a nice solo bit. The Adagio, perhaps the most beautiful of the three sections, was sad and the intensity of its mood was typical of Faure's tragic style.

The orchestra gave a superb interpretation of Debussy's La Mer. Here again, the effects were finely delineated and the tone colors were extreme in either direction. The brilliance of the third section was perhaps the most effective. Mr. Ansermet conducted in such a manner that, in addition to the enjoyment of hearing the Debussy score, we were deeply impressed by the composer's imagination.

[80]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 6 - 1952

Munch's Health Improves, Return Expected in March

The health of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony who was taken ill last Fall, is much improved. He is now in Havana, will return to Boston shortly, and is expected to be able to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season, possibly beginning with the Symphony Hall program of March 28-29.

After a week's tour ending in New York on Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood for six weeks beginning July 5.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
FEB 6 - 1952

The Berkshire Music Festival in 1950 drew 170 thousand music lovers to Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1952

Charles Munch Recuperating In Havana

Bernstein To Conduct BSO At Boston Concerts

BOSTON—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba, in greatly improved health after his recent illness, orchestra officials reported today. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of the orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate director, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the orchestra on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicolas Nabokov, its secretary-general.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1952

Lukas Foss Wins BSO 'Merit Award'

The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEXAS
JOURNAL

Intellectual Battle

TIME WAS when the way to get ahead in the arts was garble good English names.

The prime example is Alicia Markova. She was born Alice Marks and British, but ballerinas simply did not have such names and make the Ballet Russe.

Today Mary Ann Vickers of Beaumont is proudly dancing in the Ballet Russe under the respectable name she has always worn.

The Slavic adoptions have in fact worked against the free world. Musicians, painters, dramatists, dancers succeeded beyond their wildest expectations in convincing much of the world that Russia is the intellectual capital of the world.

There will be a Congress for Cultural Freedom from April 29 to June 1 in Paris to undo this view or broaden it.

The Boston symphony orchestra will make its first European appearance in three concerts at the festival. The New York City ballet company will present six programs —Igor Stravinsky to conduct two of them which are set to his music. This quite civilized gesture might be misinterpreted as a compromise with the Russians.

Actually culture knows no bounds or boundaries, and though Russian artists such as Stravinsky might be accused by their state of violating the party lines on occasions, it is difficult even for ... to ... the ... era- ... to, ... or

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 7 - 1952

Arthur Fiedler Announces 2 Pops Series for Spring

By CYRUS DURGIN

There will be two series of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall this Spring, the "May series" and the "June series".

The May series will be played by an orchestra of 80 leading musicians from symphonic organizations through the country, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away in Europe. The June series will be performed by the usual Pops Orchestra of Boston Symphony men, who, by that time, will have returned to this city.

This news came yesterday from Arthur Fiedler, the famed Pops conductor, as he spoke at the luncheon of the Publicity Club at the Hotel Vendome.

"We have chosen for the May Pops," said Mr. Fiedler, "an orchestra of 80 composed mainly of Boston musicians who play in symphony orchestras over the country. In those cities they have shorter seasons than we have and consequently those men will be back in Boston and free to play with us at that time. There will be a very few others who are not Bostonians. We are going to have several women players, too.

The Mark M. Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

ing the month of May, and we shall play it at Symphony Hall Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The opening night likely will be May 1.

"Early in June we shall return to our usual basis, when the Boston Symphony is back from Europe, and then we shall play each weekday night, and a different program each night."

"Since it is no ... orchestra which ... gether for some ... ferent program ... shall have one pro...

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
[illegible] of Literature
[illegible] YORK, N. Y.
FEB 2 - 1952

Music to

[illegible] OF MARTIN AND BARTO

[illegible]ncerto for Viola—a work
[illegible]ft uncompleted at his [illegible]eard publicly for the first [illegible] York from the Boston
[illegible]nd William Primrose,
[illegible]s experience via radio
In addition to some
[illegible]atisfaction with the first [illegible]which, it seems likely,
[illegible] have revised in more
[illegible] the concert performance.
[illegible]ession that the work has [illegible]uture in the electronic [illegible]n "live." Surely such [illegible]ic as the slow movement
[illegible], an experience as the [illegible]er fare than nine-tenths repertory.
[illegible]e limitations of the in-
[illegible] large hall—even when [illegible]so powerful a player as Primrose pulls the utter-
most in tone from it—
[illegible]out everyone concerned
[illegible]t a disadvantage. What [illegible]registers as delicate nu-
[illegible]ance on the micro-
[illegible]phone's all-hearing ear
[illegible]eemed merely uninflec[illegible]ed in the hall, and the [illegible]ightness of Tibor Serly's [illegible]coring verged on lack [illegible]f detail. In both re-
[illegible]pects, the recording
[illegible]makes more of an aural
[illegible]mpression than was [illegible]eard in the concert hall.
Ernest Ansermet's con-
[illegible]ucting was all one
this work, and Prim-
[illegible]se, is its predestined
[illegible]nsermet was also fan[illegible]it and all-knowing in [illegible]ère L'Oye" and Stra-[illegible]ouchka" earlier in the [illegible]G minor symphony of [illegible]d a style one had [illegible]w outmoded. Full of [illegible]tudes, it moved along [illegible]f feet, in the old dance-

TURE

Include Program

[illegible] Music Center.

[illegible] that Tanglewood
[illegible] trustees of the [illegible] Orchestra, who [illegible]he school at con-
[illegible], have shown a [illegible]rstanding of what
[illegible]shed in the Berk-

[illegible] to fill the gap
[illegible]th of Dr. Kous-
[illegible]up of musicians
[illegible]ool's departments
[illegible]istrative commit-
[illegible] the projects he [illegible] board consisted [illegible]in, the concert-
[illegible]oston Symphony,
[illegible]in, Hugh Ross,
[illegible]y, William Kroll,
[illegible]and myself.

[illegible]been the hope of [illegible]he school that no
[illegible] would be pre-
[illegible]nding the center
[illegible]y to pay tuition
[illegible]or the first time
[illegible]f the school are [illegible]kly on an all-
This means that
[illegible]pted for active
[illegible]ed departments
[illegible]rants from the [illegible] Fund.

[illegible]l in Class I

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 3

MUSIC

[illegible]ast Auserment Concerts;
[illegible]ast Ansermet Concerts;

BY [illegible]N STOREY SMITH

[illegible]

[illegible] George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Boston today for a meeting with the Tanglewood Advisory Committee this noon at the Pittsfield Country Club. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss plans for the coming Tanglewood season and hear details of the European trip that the orchestra is planning for May.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
FEB 6 - 1952

WNYC Gets Music Award

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation, in commemoration of its 10th anniversary, will present its first award for "public service in music" to WNYC, on the opening day of the city station's 13th annual American Music Festival which runs from February 12 to 22, inclusive.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the late renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a scroll to Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri at the opening festival concert in Town Hall to be broadcast by WNYC on Tuesday, from 3 to 5 p. m. The scroll will recognize WNYC's "distinguished service to American composers and its outstanding contribution to the cause of contemporary music."

The award was authorized in a resolution passed by the board of directors of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation at its January 19 meeting and forwarded to Seymour N. Siegel, director of radio communications for the City of New York.

When I arrived at the interview of the other afternoon, Sir Thomas was dilating on the grandeur of Handel, whose music, in his opinion, surpasses in that respect that of any other composer, though Bach has equalled it in a few passages. He managed to dispose of opera in English, except when that is the language of the original book, on the grounds that many operas, such as "Manon," "sound silly" in English translation and that the language itself, so effective when spoken, is ineffective when sung, by reason of the number of monosyllables ending in consonants. (Not all of his arguments on this point would bear scrutiny.)

Along the way he managed to dispose of the French as "essentially unmusical"; to claim for the Londoners an interest in orchestral music exceeding that of the inhabitants of any other city, and to forecast the discontent they were bound to exhibit at being vouchsafed only one concert by the Boston Symphony next spring. In the minds of most English people, he said, the Boston Symphony is firmly established as the premier orchestra of America.

I see that I have very little space left for the most challenging observation of all: that the art of music is "petering out." Sir Thomas noted the fact that the last orchestral piece to become fixed in the repertory, the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, was written 25 years ago and that the last opera to become so established, Puccini's "Turandot," is six years older than that. "When I was a boy," said Sir Thomas (he was born in 1879), "it was a predictable certainty that a new piece of importance would appear every month." There really is a difference there that will bear investigating, whatever may be the cause of it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1952

Bernstein, Munch to Lead Symphony in Final Weeks

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba., in greatly improved health after his recent illness. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28 he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress For Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicholas Nabokov, its secretary-general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for six weeks, Beginning July 5.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 6 - 1952

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Fourth in Series of Providence Concerts

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ernest Ansermet conducting, played the fourth concert of its series here last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. This marked Mr. Ansermet's second consecutive appearance here with the orchestra during Dr. Munch's absence. He was greeted warmly and conducted a program which was notable for perfection of detail and beauty of tone.

The program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a ..... Brahms
Symphony in A major, No. 4, "Italian," Op. 90 ..... Mendelssohn
I. Allegro vivace
II. Andante con moto
III. Con moto moderato
IV. Saltarello: Presto
"Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from the Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80 ..... Faure
I. Prelude: Quasi adagio
II. "Fileuse": Andantino quasi allegretto
III. Adagio
"La Mer," Three Orchestra Sketches . . . Debussy
I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer
II. Jeux de vagues
III. Dialogue du vent et de la mer

It was good to hear the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." The theme was announced with great dignity and as the variations were played, one after the other, the outstanding quality seemed to be the graceful flow of the rhythm. In the variation in a minor key, the dark colors of the low-toned instruments were most expressive. The section in the inimitable waltz rhythm was delightful.

Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony was meticulously phrased. The freshness and life of the Allegro suggested a pleasant canter over the moors. The Andante was wistful and plaintive. The third movement displayed the perfection of the horn section. It was in the final movement, the Saltarello, that the full brilliance of the orchestra was realized. The pace was extremely rapid and the delicacy and precision of the strings and reeds would be hard to match.

A change in the program gave us "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure in place of the two Debussy Nocturnes which had been announced. It was an acceptable substitute, since we also had Debussy's "La Mer." The Faure Prelude was ethereal in its orchestration and extremely delicate tonal effects were made here. The little spinning song was graceful and gay and it afforded the English horn a nice solo bit. The Adagio, perhaps the most beautiful of the three sections, was sad and the intensity of its mood was typical of Faure's tragic style.

The orchestra gave a superb interpretation of Debussy's La Mer. Here again, the effects were finely delineated and the tone colors were extreme in either direction. The brilliance of the third section was perhaps the most effective. Mr. Ansermet conducted in such a manner that, in addition to the enjoyment of hearing the Debussy score, we were deeply impressed by the composer's imagination.

[80]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 6 - 1952

Munch's Health Improves, Return Expected in March

The health of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony who was taken ill last Fall, is much improved. He is now in Havana, will return to Boston shortly, and is expected to be able to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season, possibly beginning with the Symphony Hall program of March 28-29.

After a week's tour ending in New York on Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood for six weeks beginning July 5.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1952

Charles Munch Recuperating In Havana

Bernstein To Conduct BSO At Boston Concerts

BOSTON—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba, in greatly improved health after his recent illness, orchestra officials reported today. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York Feb. 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of the orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate director, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the orchestra on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicolas Nabokov, its secretary general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for six weeks beginning July 5, when the Berkshire Music Center opens.

[illegible] Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
FEB 6 - 1952

The Berkshire Music Festival in 1950 drew 17[illegible] thousand music lovers to Tanglewood

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEXAS
JOURNAL

Intellectual Battle

TIME WAS when the way to get ahead in the arts was garble good English names.

The prime example is Alicia Markova. She was born Alice Marks and British, but ballerinas simply did not have such names and make the Ballet Russe.

Today Mary Ann Vickers of Beaumont is proudly dancing in the Ballet Russe under the respectable name she has always worn.

The Slavic adoptions have in fact worked against the free world. Musicians, painters, dramatists, dancers succeeded beyond their wildest expectations in convincing much of the world that Russia is the intellectual capital of the world.

There will be a Congress for Cultural Freedom from April 29 to June 1 in Paris to undo this view or broaden it.

The Boston symphony orchestra will make its first European appearance in three concerts at the festival. The New York City ballet company will pr[illegible]t six programs —Igor Stravinsky to conduct two of them which are set to his music. This quite civilized gesture might be misinterpreted as a compromise with the Russians.

Actually culture knows no bounds or boundaries, and though Russian artists such as Stravinsky might be accused by their state of violating the party lines on occasions, it is difficult even for a police state to police the fine arts, except in the field of the theater and in literature. It is next to impossi[illegible] to identify music as c[illegible] or communistic.

[illegible]Announces [illegible]or Spring

By CYRUS DURGIN

Th[illegible]e will be two series of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall this Spring, the "May series" and the "June series".

The May series will be played by an orch[illegible]stra of 80 leading musicians from symphonic organizations through the country, since the Boston Symphony Or[illegible]st[illegible] will be away in Europe. The June series will be performed by the usual Pops Orchestra of Boston Symphony men, who, by that time, will have returned to this city.

This news came yesterday from Arthur Fiedler, the famed Pops conductor, as he spoke at the luncheon of the Publicity Club at the Hotel Vendome.

"We have chosen for the May Pops," said Mr. Fiedler, "an orchestra of 80 composed mainly of Boston musicians who play in symphony orchestras over the country. In those cities they have shorter seasons than we have and consequently those men will be back in Boston and free to play with us at that time. There will be a very few others who are not Bostonians. We are going to have several women players, too.

The Mark M. Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Aw[illegible] was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

ing the month of May, and we shall play it at Symphony Hall Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The opening night likely will be May 1.

"Early in June we shall return to our usual basis, when the Boston Symphony is back from Europe, and then we shall play each weekday night, and a different program each night."

"Since it is not feasible for an orchestra which has not played together for some time to give a different program every night, we shall have one program a week dur[illegible]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 7 - 1952

Arthur Fiedler Announces 2 Pops Series for Spring

By CYRUS DURGIN

There will be two series of Pops concerts at Symphony Hall this Spring, the "May series" and the "June series."

The May series will be played by an orchestra of 80 leading musicians from symphonic organizations through the country, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away on Europe. The June series will be performed by the usual Pops Orchestra of Boston Symphony men, who, by that time, will have returned to this city.

This news came yesterday from Arthur Fiedler, the famed Pops conductor, as he spoke at the luncheon of the Publicity Club at the Hotel Vendome.

"We have chosen for the May Pops," said Mr. Fiedler, "an orchestra of 80 composed mainly of Boston musicians who play in symphony orchestras over the country. In those cities they have shorter seasons than we have and consequently those men will be back in Boston and free to play with us at that time. There will be a very few others who are not Bostonians. We are going to have several women players, too.

"Since it is not feasible for an orchestra which has not played together for some time to give a different program every night, we shall have one program a week during the month of May, and we shall play it at Symphony Hall Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The opening night likely will be May 1.

"Early in June we shall return to our usual basis, when the Boston Symphony is back from Europe, and then we shall play each weekday night, and a different program each night."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 7 - 1952

Pops Start in May As in Past Years

Arthur Fiedler announced yesterday that the Pops season will begin in May under his direction although the Boston Symphony Orchestra departs for Europe on April 28. The orchestra of 80 will be drawn from Symphony players, many of whom spend their winters playing in the orchestras of other cities.

The May Pops wil be given on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights of each week, starting May 1, with additional nights to be scheduled. The Pops during the month of June will continue under the regular schedule with concerts every night except Sunday and the usual personnel back at their desks.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 7 - 1952

Outside Musicians to Play in Hub's Pops

The absence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the month of May will not deprive Boston its traditional Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. They will be given under the direction of Arthur Fiedler on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights of each week, beginning May 1, and there will be some additional nights. The orchestra of 80 will be recruited from local musicians, most of whom are members of orchestras in other cities, whose seasons will have ended by the time the Pops begin.

In making this announcement yesterday at a luncheon of the Publicity Club of Boston at the Hotel Vendome, Mr. Fiedler stated that there would be a few women musicians, perhaps a half a dozen. He remarked that in selecting his material he found "an embarrassment of riches," having to pick three flute players out of a dozen, and five horn players out of 17. The regular Pops Orchestra will take over in June, with concerts every night, including Sunday.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 7 - 1952

Munch to Resume Conducting

Charles Munch, now resting in Havana, has recovered sufficiently from his recent illness to be able to conduct some of the final concerts of the Boston Symphony season. Mr. Munch also will accompany the orchestra to Europe on April 28, for the projected tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Guest conductors for the remainder of the season include Ernest Ansermet, Richard Burgin, Leonard Bernstein and G. Wallace Woodworth.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 7 - 1952

Lukas Foss Wins Mark Horblit Award

The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer came on from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 and is given annually for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 7 - 1952

Charles Munch Returns Holy Week

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba, in his recent illness. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York February 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this Orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the Associate Conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the Orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress For Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicolas Nabokov, its secretary general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, weeks beginnning July 5.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 7 - 1952

Award to Lukas Foss

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Mark M. Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

Boston Symphony's Trip to Europe is Described

This Clipping From
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
FEB 6 - 1952

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6, according to an announcement issued by The American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long exposition of the Arts sponsored by The Congress for Cultural Freedom, whose theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past fifty years in the field of music, ballet, painting and other art forms. The Congress' affiliate in this country is The American Committee for Cultural Freedom, of which Sidney Hook is chairman. The Exposition Committee of this group, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing funds for private philanthropy to send the 104- member musical aggregation abroad. Other American participants in the Paris Exposition will be the New York City Ballet Company and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

While final details of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour await clarification from abroad, visits are planned to thirteen cities in six countries, under the aegis of the Congress for Cultural Freedom between the conclusion of the seventy-first Symphony season in Boston, and the opening of the annual "Pops" Concerts there on June 1. Musical Director Charles Munch, now recovering from a lengthy illness and expected back on the podium in March, will share the conducting assignments with his long-time friend and colleague, Pierre Monteux.

The orchestra will entrain for New York, upon conclusion of its final Boston concert on Saturday evening, April 26, to board the "Ile de France" which, through the courtesy of the French Line, is moving up its sailing date to facilitate matters, and will sail Monday, April 28 for Le Havre.

Mr. Munch, Alsatian-born conductor who became director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, will lead the symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera House. This event will be honored by the presence of President Vincent Auriol, state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders, with the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. This and a second Exposition concert which Mr. Monteux will conduct at Paris Theatre des Champs-Elysees on May 8 will be devoted to Ewentieth Century European and American music.

Mr. Monteaux's program will witness an historical re-creation: a performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring) almost 39 years after he introduced this pivotal work in the same theatre.

The next day the orchestra entrains for The Hague, Holland, where Mr. Munch will conduct on May 10. On May 11, under Mr. Monteux, who often has led the celebrated Amsterdam Concertgebouw, it will perform in Amsterdam.

On May 17, the Boston Symphony will visit Strasbourg, Mr. Munch's birthplace. There the conductor erved as violinist in the Strasbourg Orchestra and taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory. The concert in that city will be at the Free Europe University In Exile, and will be broadcast by arrangement with Radio Free Europe and through Voice of American facilities to Russia and its satellite countries.

Several performances are planned in Western Germany, for German civilians and U. S. troops stationed abroad. Brussels, Belgium; Turin and Milan, Italy; and Lilla, France are also included.

The tour will conclude with the orchestra's first appearance in London, at the new and acoustically-perfect Festival Hall, on May 26, following which the orchestra will sail for New York from Southampton aboard the "Ile de France" on May 27.

The Boston Symphony, which from its broadcasts and recording holds a European reputation second to none, will join in Paris such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Halle Orchestra from England, Sir John Barbirolli, conductor; the Orchestra and Chorus dell'Accademia della Santa Cecilia, Rome; the R. I. A. S. (Radio) Orchestra, Berlin, Ferenc Fricsay conductor; l'Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, Geneva, Ernest Ansermet conducthing; the Paris Conservatory and the French National Radio Orchestra.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 8 - 1952

PRIVATE LIVES

ALMOST HIDDEN behind big harp and other Symphony instruments is Mrs. Olivia Luetcke.

Symphony Harpist Lone Woman With 109 Men

By JOAN McPARTLIN

Mrs. Olivia Luetcke is the only woman in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She has another distinction in the B. S. O. She is one of the shortest—if not the shortest—players—five and one quarter inches tall.

"When Mrs. Luetcke stands behind that big harp, surrounded by players and instruments, you can hardly see her," says one symphony-goer.

Mrs. Luetcke claims Boston as her home town, though she was born in New York. She lived here as a child and graduated from Scituate Grammar School; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Irving K. Hall, lived there and still own a house at Scituate.

She studied for four years with the National Orchestral Association, a training orchestra, and worked privately with harpist Bernard Zighera. By the time she started private study of the harp, she was familiar with the big instrument, for she began playing it when she was six.

"Everyone in my family played an instrument," she says. "I have three brothers and a sister, and we played the piano, violin, cello, and viola. So I took up studying the harp."

It's a difficult instrument to learn, she admits.

"Very complicated, playing the harp," she explains, "because it calls for finger work and foot work, too. I started with finger exercises and studies, and worked up to longer parts. I've soloed with the San Antonio Symphony and at a Pops concert.

"Even when you're a symphony harpist, however, there isn't much music for a harp. But I never thought of doing anything else but playing."

★ ★ ★

Mrs. Luetcke was for seven years harpist with the San Antonio Symphony and while in Texas she met her husband, former German consul there and now a lawyer.

Last April, after she had returned to Boston, she tried out for a B. S. O. spot at April auditions. A few weeks later, she received a note telling her she had competed successfully. "I felt pretty good," she says now. "I didn't expect I'd be accepted."

Her favorite conductors are Charles Munch and Jonel Perlea, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera and now guest conductor with the Detroit Symphony.

Rehearsals with the B. S. O., where her formal title is second harpist, keep Mrs. Luetcke busy from Monday morning until Saturday night.

In her spare time, she breeds German shepherds and dog[illegible] know her as the owner of champion Ormelie Greenfair.

[illegible] one [illegible] among [illegible] when doesn't disturb Mrs. Luetcke. She [illegible] at [illegible] the major [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

Christian Science Monitor

nsermet's Final Concerts in Boston

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB

USIC

nsermet Makes Last ymphony Appearances

By CYRUS DURGIN

...the Boston Sym... ...ing the ... ...y Orchestra ... ...ernet's appear... ...of Ernest A... ...Hall as interim ... ...at Symphony ... ...face the Boston ... ...orchestra ... ...has chosen ... ...Beethoven's ... ...played ... ...of De... ...Antiques ... ...music, and ... Bartók's ... ...masterpiece, the ... ...for Orchestra.

... ...sense of ... ...comment ... ...heard in the lobby ... ...to imagine a ... ...at the use of ... ...in connection ... Bartók, the five-movement ... ...its dissonance is still a ... ...for conservative listeners. ... ...room in general is not one ... ...that the musical public quick... ...to appeal at present is mostly ... ...ears and to those with a ... ...contemporary music.

... ...the Concerto for Or... ...a major work of our time, ...ideas, a large ... ...full of interest... ...rhythm, harmony and ... ...rhythm, and ... ...facility that ... ...It is not all astrin... ...intellectual, however, for ... ...pages communicates feel... ...a wide range from sadness to ... ...and tenderness, and more ... ...of those pages are lush ... Mr. Ansermet's reading, ...performance ... ...superlative.

... ...six little movements by De... ...have a certain vague imagery ... ...to date in sketch ... from 1896 ... piano duet from ... and in M. Ansermet's orches... ...from 1930. The conductor's ... ...to clothe them in the subtle, ...and jeweled orchestral ... Debussy's later years. Mr. ... ...succeeded nobly; were ... aware of his orchestral au... ...it would be easy to assume ... Debussy had done it himself. ... a virtuoso orchestra, like the ... Symphony, could do full ... to this orchestral version, ... tricky and very demanding ... way of such technical matters ... rhythm, nuances and exact en... Once again conductor and ... orchestra covered themselves with ... artistic glory that can come only ... a magnificent achievement.

... for Beethoven's immortal lit... ...major Symphony (and perhaps ... little, either) it received a ... classical performance. All ... elegantly set forth, the whole ... clear and expressively balanced; ... were Beethoven if's and not ... and the style in general was ... Ansermet ... does ... him.

... absence of C... ... good ...

Works by Beethoven, Debussy, Bartók Heard at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

... service that Ernest ... rendered the Boston ... Orchestra and its pa... ... will terminate next week ... ...ject is taken the orchestra on ... New York tour. Then the noted ... conductor will return to his ... orchestra in Geneva.

... Ansermet accepted this ex... ...ended engagement as guest con... ...tor at some personal sacrifice. ... had set aside time to complete ... book, "The Meaning of Music," ... is close to his heart. His ... programs have been large... ... interest, entertaining, and ... played with devotion and musi... ...cianly understanding. He is to be ...commended for enriching this ...season by his contribution.

His Symphony Hall program ...esterday afternoon, to be re...peated tonight, includes the Bee...thoven Second Symphony in D ...major, Debussy's "Six epigraphes ...antiques," and Bartók's Concerto ...for Orchestra. He played the Bee...thoven with a keen insight for ...its classical mold and its romantic ...propensities, and with his usual ...regard for stylistic correctness, ...balance, and emotional content.

* * *

The six short "Epigraphes" by Debussy, heard for the first time in Boston, are in Mr. Ansermet's own arrangement. Originally composed for piano duet, they are extremely atmospheric, highly evocative, and descriptive of these ideas: "Invocation to Pan, god of the summer wind." "For a nameless tomb." "For a propitious night." "For the dancer with cymbals." "For the Egyptian," and "In gratitude to the morning rain."

In his orchestration Mr. Ansermet has remained true to the impressionists and to their neo-Grecian moods, but the colors, so economically applied, remind one slightly of Ravel. Not that Debussy was not economical in his use of the orchestra: his own arrangements of Satie's "Gymnopedies" are handled with impeccable restraint.

But the Debussy "Epigraphes" sound as if they had been orchestarted by Ravel. This is no disparagement. Ravel, a masterful hand at scoring, also turned his talents to converting some of Debussy's pieces to the orchestra. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Ansermet gave the "Epigraphes" a graceful touch that called forth their shimmering lights.

* * *

Whereas Tchaikovsky and other composers have been prone to turn out pot-boilers when offered a commission, Bartók apparently could write nothing but masterpieces. His Concerto for Orchestra, completed in 1943 (two years before his passing), was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Founded by Serge Koussevitzky, this organization is now in its tenth year and has given 45 commissions.

Mr. Ansermet gave an intense and volatile reading of this marvelously wrought score. Each of the five movements emerged gemlike, fashioned by a musical jeweler of genius. Bartók's original harmonies, so modern and yet so acceptable; his technical mastery (the linear writing and the

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 9 - 1952

...ny Harpist Lone ...With 109 Men

...OAN McPARTLIN

...ke is the only woman in the Bost... ...stinction in the B. S. O. She is eq... ...the shortest—players—five and one

...ke stands behind that big harp, sur... ...nd instruments, you can hardly s... ...ly-goer.

...s Boston as her home town, though ...York. She lived here as a child an... ...ite Grammar School; her parents ...X. Hall, lived there and still own

...rs with ...associa... ...a, and ...harpist ...me she ...e harp, ...big in... ...playing

...played ...I have ...r, and ...cello, ...idying

...ent to ...ing the ...ruse it ...nd foot ...finger ...worked ...ed with ...ny and

...phony ...t much ...never ...else but

...seven ...Antonio ...xas she ...German ...yer.

...ad re... ...out for ...ditions. ...eived a ...mpeted ...good," ...pect I'd

...rs are ...Perlea, ...politan ...nductor

...S. O., ...second ...e busy ...Satur...

...breeds

German shepherds and dog-lover... know her as the owner of cham... pion Ophelia Greenfair.

Being one woman among ... men doesn't disturb Mrs. Fletch... She has solved the major problem —what to wear while playing wi... formally-dressed men.

"I have a black broadcloth ou... with a short skirt and a whi... blouse, she says. 'That way, ... all look like penguins together."

...behind big harp and other Symphony ...Olivia Luetcke.

...LIVES

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 9 - 1952

BSO Plans For Festival Announced

Munch, Monteux And Bernstein To Conduct

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theatre-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Saturday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral concerts announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch will serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
FEB 10 1952

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ernest Ansermet, who has been acting-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since mid-December, takes his leave of us after tonight's concert. Yesterday afternoon's audience, which might well have stood in greeting when he came on the stage, at least rose to the occasion at the end of the concert, applauding and cheering for several minutes. That a conductor of Mr. Ansermet's stature should have been free to come to us at a moment's notice was our great good fortune, and since he had to upset his own plans in order to do so, our gratitude should be doubled.

This, the Swiss conductor's seventh and final list, embraces Beethoven's Second Symphony, his own orchestration of Debussy's "Six Epigraphes Antiques" and Bartok's Concerta for Orchestra. Least played of Beethoven's nine symphonies, the Second, in such a performance as it received yesterday, is by no means the least enjoyable. Debussy's Epigraphs were composed in 1914 for piano duet. The composer once entertained the idea of orchestrating them, and Mr. Ansermet has done the job so sympathetically that it might just as well have been the handiwork of Debussy himself. The pieces are slight, but they are pleasingly exotic and in their orchestral dress quite ravishing to the ear.

Mr. Ansermet has expressed in conversation his admiration for Bartok and twice he has shown his rare understanding of that composer's music: in the local premiere of the Viola Concerto, when William Primrose was the soloist, and yesterday in the Concerto for Orchestra. Koussevitzky's service to music was boundless, but his commissioning of this Concerto was one of the happiest of his many enterprises in this direction. The tale of how the commission temporarily restored the ailing composer to health has been told many times. In its five movements the piece offers a variety of experiences. The last section is downright exciting, and never more so than yesterday. This was one of the memorable performances of Mr. Ansermet's extended visit. Others were those of Debussy's "La Mer," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande," Mozart's G minor Symphony, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Baiser de la Fee," Mendellohn's "Fingal's Cave," Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Ravel's "La Valse." Someone else might put together a different list. The fact is that Mr. Ansermet seemed to hit it right, no matter what he conducted, while certain performances were truly outstanding, long to be remembered. The individuality of the several composers was preserved. Everything was clear and controlled, the orchestral sound a continual delight to the ear. On the platform Mr. Ansermet is dignified. He is neither actor, dancer, nor acrobat. His years have given him wisdom but they have not dulled his fires. An exemplary leader.

'Pops' Concerts to Go On Despite European Trip

At a luncheon given by the Publicity Club last week, Arthur Fiedler answered a question which has been disturbing Boston music lovers ever since it was announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go to Europe to play in the International Arts Festival this summer . . . that is, what will happen to the Pops Concerts?

The Pops will go on, with conductor announced and with Fiedler again wielding the baton. Musicians who are members of the Boston local but who play in other Symphony orchestras were permitted to take over in the first month of Pops.

Concerts will not be played nightly, however, he said, nor will there be a different program each night. Plans now are to open Pops on the Thursday after the last Symphony concert, and to play Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

Boston Symphony Plans Debut In Paris

BOSTON, Feb. 9—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House May 6, according to an announcement by the American Committee For Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by The Congress For Cultural Freedom. Theme is vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in music, ballet, painting, and other art forms. The congress's affiliate in this country is the American Committee For Cultural Freedom, with Sidney Hook as chairman. The exposition committee of this group, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing private funds to send the 104-member musical aggregation abroad. Other American participants in the Paris Exposition will be the New York City Ballet Company and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

While final details of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour await clarification from abroad, visits are planned to 13 cities in six countries, under the aegis of the Congress For Cultural Freedom. The tour will occur between the conclusion of the 71st symphony season in Boston, and the opening of the annual Pops Concerts June 1. Munch, now recovering from a lengthy illness, is expected back on the podium in March.

THE ORCHESTRA will leave for New York after its final Boston concert April 26, to board the Ile de France, which is moving up its sailing date to facilitate matters. The ship will sail April 28 for Le Havre.

Munch, Alsatian-born conductor who became director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, will lead the symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera House. This event will be honored by the presence of President Vincent Auriol, state, diplomatic, civic, and social leaders, with the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. This and a second Exposition concert which Monteux will conduct at Paris's Theater des Champs-Elysees on May 8 will be devoted to 20th century European and American music.

Monteux's program will witness an historical re-creation, a performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" almost 39 years after he introduced this pivotal work in the same theater.

The next day the orchestra entrains for The Hague, where Munch will conduct on May 10. On May 11, under Monteux, who often has led the celebrated Amsterdam Concertgebouw, the group will perform in Amsterdam.

ON MAY 17, the Boston Symphony will visit Strasbourg, Munch's birthplace. There the conductor was violinist in the Strasbourg Orchestra and taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory.

The tour will end with the orchestra's first appearance in London, at the new and acoustically perfect Festival Hall, on May 26. Then the orchestra will sail May 27 for New York from Southampton aboard the Ile de France.

TURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1952 Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 15th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36 ..... Beethoven
Six epigraphes antiques ..... Debussy-Ansermet
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS NOW established beyond a question of doubt that Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra is not only a contemporary classic of the very highest order, but that it is steadily gaining a firm hold on the hearts and minds of today's audiences. Its success yesterday, in contrast to its failure on the occasion of its first performance in 1944, was absolutely brilliant.

I hope I shall not be found immodest in pointing out that in reviewing the first performance of this great work most enthusiastically eight years ago, I said that while it was not readily accepted by the audience, it would some day "speak powerfully to the musical audience." Yesterday, having been heard once again only two seasons ago, it did speak; few contemporary works of such advanced a character as this have ever spoken so powerfully or been received so clamorously. To be sure, it is not possible to determine how much of the applause was for the music and how much for the occasion of Mr. Ansermet's farewell, but everything indicated that the music went straight to the mark.

* * *

In any case, though much of the work still retains its own secrets (the first movement remains the most difficult of assimilation), it is now possible to discern the extraordinary beauty of the detail, to make contact with the eloquence of its thematic substance, to feel the overwhelmingly personal character of the emotional utterance. For this is, indisputably, one of the most autobiographical compositions in the literature.

It is as if the then ill composer, like Beethoven in the Canzona of Op. 132, who inscribed it the "Sacred Song of Thanksgiving of a convalescent to the Divinity," reviewed his entire life in the Concerto. There are suggestions of his search for a musical style, of his emotional conflicts, of his deepening distress in a foreign land, even of his tragic circumstances—for surely there are few more pathetic pages in all music than the slow movement. And always there is nostalgia: there are the sounds of the birds and fields and streams, of the tzigane and of the Hungarian folk rhythms and melodies. It is, in short, as remarkable for its narrative content as it is for its demonstration of consummate mastery of a special musical language, as remarkable for its emotional significance as for its technical attainment.

* * *

It must be said that Mr. Ansermet's role in projecting all this was superb. He conducted this monstrously complicated score with the clarity of style that has illuminated all his work here, bringing out the details of texture, of rhythm and of architecture in a masterly fashion. Needless to say, it requires the utmost of technical virtuosity on the part of every man in the orchestra, for nearly every instrument is a soloist, and they performed wonderfully.

ANOTHER OUTSTANDING work on an altogether admirable program was Mr. Ansermet's own orchestration of a set of piano duets by Debussy. The pieces themselves are of a most refined and poetic character, but Mr. Ansermet's scoring of them was perfectly exquisite. Had he submitted them as a discovery of a lost manuscript in Debussy's own hand, it is to be doubted if the world's most eminent musicologists could determine that Debussy himself had not set the pieces for orchestra. It seemed to me the most remarkable capture of a composer's orchestral style I ever heard, and I hope the suite remains in our repertoire. The Beethoven, taken a bit more slowly and with a bit more repose than we have lately heard it, was notably done, too, to make Mr. Ansermet's closing program memorable.

* * *

I meant to mention above that the program was in error saying that Bartok wasn't present at the premiere of his Concerto: he was, but neither he nor his work, I am sad to say, got a "tumultuous" reception. What a pity he could not have been there yesterday! I meant also to devote much more to Mr. Ansermet on the occasion of his last concert here, but I have put that off until Sunday. In the meantime I can only say it has been a pleasure and an honor to have had him with us these few months. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Feb. 22 to do a suite from Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
FEB 10 1952

Boston Award Goes To Lukas Foss

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, Feb. 9—The Mark Horblit Award has been given to Lukas Foss, pianist, for his second piano concerto. Mr. Foss introduced his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November, and is now in Rome on a Pix de Rome scholarship. The Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award" was established in 1946 for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

Children' ... Saunders ...

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
FEB

...s Horblit Award ...Piano Concerto

[90]

TIGHT BINDING

ing From
, MASS.
G GLOBE
1952

E LIVES

EN behind big harp and other Symphony
rs. Olivia Luetcke.

hony Harpist Lone
n With 109 Men

By JOAN McPARTLIN

Luetcke is the only woman in the Bost estra.

her distinction in the B. S. O. She h f not the shortest—players—five and o ll.

Luetcke stands behind that big harp, su ers and instruments, you can hardly mphony-goer.

claims Boston as her home town, though
New York. She lived here as a child a Scituate Grammar School; her parents ving K. Hall, lived there and still own e.

our years with German shepherds and dog-lovers know her as the owner of estral Associa- plon Ophelia Greenfair.
rchestra, and with harpist
y the time she
y of the harp,
th the big in-began playing

Being one woman among men doesn't disturb Mrs. Luetcke
She has solved the major problem
—what to wear while playing wi formally-dressed men.

family played says. "I have a sister, and
o, violin, cello,
k, up studying

"I have a black broadcloth with a short skirt and a whi blouse, she says. "That way, all look like penguins together."

instrument
d, playing the s, "because it work and foot ed with finger es, and worked
've soloed with Symphony and re a symphony

here isn't much
But I never ything else but

★

vas for seven he San Antonio
le in Texas she former German ow a lawyer.

r she had re-
he tried out for April auditions.
she received a
had competed lt pretty good," idn't expect I'd onductors are

d Jonel Perlea, Metropolitan
uest conductor mphony.

the B. S. O., title is second Luetcke busy
ing until Satur-

me, she breeds

TON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1952 Art—Music—Theater 19

Christian Science Monitor

sermet's Final Concerts in Boston

Works by Beethoven, Debussy, Bartók Heard at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

The great service that Ernest Ansermet has rendered the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its patrons will terminate next week after he has taken the orchestra on its New York tour. Then the noted Swiss conductor will return to his own orchestra in Geneva.

Mr. Ansermet accepted this extended engagement as guest conductor at some personal sacrifice. He had set aside time to complete a book, "The Meaning of Music," which is close to his heart. His Boston programs have been largely of interest, entertaining, and played with devotion and musicianly understanding. He is to be commended for enriching this season by his contribution.

His Symphony Hall program yesterday afternoon, to be repeated tonight, includes the Beethoven Second Symphony in D major, Debussy's "Six épigraphes antiques," and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. He played the Beethoven with a keen insight for its classical mold and its romantic propensities, and with his usual regard for stylistic correctness, balance, and emotional content.

* * *

The six short "Epigraphes" by Debussy, heard for the first time in Boston, are in Mr. Ansermet's own arrangement. Originally composed for piano duet, they are extremely atmospheric, highly evocative, and descriptive of these ideas: "Invocation to Pan, god of the summer wind," "For a nameless tomb," "For a propitious night," "For the dancer with cymbals," "For the Egyptian," and "In gratitude to the morning rain."

In his orchestration Mr. Ansermet has remained true to the impressionists and to their neo-Grecian moods, but the colors, so economically applied, remind one slightly of Ravel. Not that Debussy was not economical in his use of the orchestra; his own arrangements of Satie's "Gymnopedies" are handled with impeccable restraint.

But the Debussy "Epigraphes" sound as if they had been orchestarted by Ravel. This is no disparagement. Ravel, a masterful hand at scoring, also turned his talents to converting some of Debussy's pieces to the orchestra. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Ansermet gave the "Epigraphes" a graceful touch that called forth their shimmering lights.

* * *

Whereas Tchaikovsky and other composers have been prone to turn out pot-boilers when offered a commission, Bartók apparently could write nothing but masterpieces. His Concerto for Orchestra, completed in 1943 (two years before his passing), was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Founded by Serge Koussevitzky, this organization is now in its tenth year and has given 45 commissions.

Mr. Ansermet gave an intense and volatile reading of this marvelously wrought score. Each of the five movements emerged gemlike, fashioned by a musical jeweler of genius. Bartók's original harmonies, so modern and yet so acceptable; his technical mastery (the linear writing and the fugato sections); his refined sense

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 9 - 1952

USIC

nsermet Makes Last ymphony Appearances

By CYRUS DURGIN

concerts by the Boston Sym- Orchestra this week bring the of Ernest Ansermet's appear- at Symphony Hall as interim ductor. For his farewell Boston ram (he will take the orchestra ur next week) he has chosen y interesting list: Beethoven's d Symphony, not often played his own orchestration of De- 's Six Epigraphes Antiques, to Boston in this guise, and Bartok's true masterpiece, the erto for Orchestra.

aging by some—only some—of mment I heard in the lobby the concert, I can imagine a deal of bristling at the use of ord masterpiece in connection Bartok's large, five-movement . Its dissonance is still a er to conservative listeners, he idiom in general is not one tract the general public quick- he appeal at present is mostly usicians and to those with a for contemporary music.

netheless, the Concerto for Or- ra is a major work of our time, of invention and ideas, a large al conception full of interest- details of melody, harmony and m—especially rhythm, and en with a technical facility that tounding. It is not all astrin- and intellectual, however, for page after page communicates feel- which range from sadness to r and tenderness, and more a few of those pages are lush liken. Mr. Ansermet's reading, the orchestra's performance truly superlative.

e six little movements by De- with a certain vague imagery hed to each, date in sketch from 1899, as piano duet from and in Mr. Ansermet's orches- on, from 1939. The conductor's was to clothe them in the subtle plex and jeweled orchestral of Debussy's later years. Mr. rmet succeeded nobly; were not aware of his orchestral au- hip it would be easy to assume Debussy had done it himself. ly a virtuoso orchestra, like the n Symphony, could do full e to this orchestral version, is tricky and very demanding e way of such technical matters ythm, nuances and exact en- es. Once again conductor and tra covered themselves with rtistic glory that can come only a magnificent achievement.

for Beethoven's immortal lit- major Symphony (and perhaps o little, either!) it received a inely classical performance. All elegantly set forth, the whole lear and expressively balanced; 's were Beethoven ff's and not and the style in general was table. Thus Mr. Ansermet brilliantly a visit which does high credit. Without him, in unfortunate absence of Charles h, the Symphony season would been a good deal le[an]n it been.

Children's Concert Saunders Today

s afternoon at 3 Malcolm es dean of the New England ervatory of Music, will conduct bers of the Boston Symphony estra in the second of the series Children's Concerts in Sanders tre, Cambridge. As part of the ram 65 members of the Winsor ol Glee Club will sing three by Weelkes and Dvorak and h chorale. The orchestra will music by Mozart, Paginini, ieli, Vivaldi and a new concerto rumpet by the modern Danish poser, Riisagen.

ese concerts are open to the ic and are sponsored by 41 pub- and private schools of Greater on. Tickets will be available at door at Sanders Theatre, Har- University, Cambridge.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 9 - 1952

BSO Plans For Festival Announced

Munch, Monteux And Bernstein To Conduct

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theatre-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Saturday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch will serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
FEB 9 - 1952

s Horblit Award Piano Concerto

e Mark M. Horblit award for has been given to Lukas for his Second Piano Con- The young composer jour- d from Rome, where he has iving under a Prix de Rome rship, to introduce his con- rto with the Boston Sym- Orchestra last [illegible]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
FEB 10 1952

'Pops' Concerts to Go On Despite European Trip

At a luncheon given by the Publicity Club last week, Arthur Fiedler answered a question which has been disturbing Boston music lovers ever since it was announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go to Europe to play in the International Arts Festival this summer . . . that is, what will happen to the Pops Concerts?

The Pops will go on, their conductor announced, and with Fiedler again wielding the baton. Musicians who are members of the Boston local but who play in other Symphony orchestras were recruited to take over for the first month of Pops.

Concerts will not be played nightly, however, he said, nor will there be a different program each night. Plans now are to open Pops on the Thursday after the last Symphony concert, and to play Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

FEB 9 - 1952

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ernest Ansermet, who has been acting-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since mid-December, takes his leave of us after tonight's concert. Yesterday afternoon's audience, which might well have stood in greeting when he came on the stage, at least rose to the occasion at the end of the concert, applauding and cheering for several minutes. That a conductor of Mr. Ansermet's stature should have been free to come to us at a moment's notice was our great good fortune, and since he had to upset his own plans in order to do so, our gratitude should be doubled.

This, the Swiss conductor's seventh and final list, embraces Beethoven's Second Symphony, his own orchestration of Debussy's "Six Epigraphes Antiques" and Bartok's Concerta for Orchestra. Least played of Beethoven's nine symphonies, the Second, in such a performance as it received yesterday, is by no means the least enjoyable. Debussy's Epigraphs were composed in 1914 for piano duet. The composer once entertained the idea of orchestrating them, and Mr. Ansermet has done the job so sympathetically that it might just as well have been the handiwork of Debussy himself. The pieces are slight, but they are pleasingly exotic and in their orchestral dress quite ravishing to the ear.

Mr. Ansermet has expressed in conversation his admiration for Bartok and twice he has shown his rare understanding of that composer's music: in the local premiere of the Viola Concerto, when William Primrose was the soloist, and yesterday in the Concerto for Orchestra. Koussevitzky's service to music was boundless, but his commissioning of this Concerto was one of the happiest of his many enterprises in this direction. The tale of how the commission temporarily restored the ailing composer to health has been told many times. In its five movements the piece offers a variety of experiences. The last section is downright exciting, and never more so than yesterday. This was one of the memorable performances of Mr. Ansermet's extended visit. Others were those of Debussy's "La Mer," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande," Mozart's G minor Symphony, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Baiser de la Fee," Mendellohn's "Fingal's Cave," Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Ravel's "La Valse." Someone else might put together a different list. The fact is that Mr. Ansermet seemed to hit it right, no matter what he conducted, while certain performances were truly outstanding, long to be remembered. The individuality of the several composers was preserved. Everything was clear and controlled, the orchestral sound a continual delight to the ear. On the platform Mr. Ansermet is dignified. He is neither actor, dancer, nor acrobat. His years have given him wisdom but they have not dulled his fires. An exemplary leader.

FEB 11 1952

Boston Symphony Plans Debut In Paris

BOSTON, Feb. 9—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House May 6, according to an announcement by the American Committee For Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by The Congress For Cultural Freedom. Theme is vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in music, ballet, painting, and other art forms. The congress's affiliate in this country is the American Committee For Cultural Freedom, with Sidney Hook as chairman. The exposition committee of this group, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing private funds to send the 104-member musical aggregation abroad. Other American participants in the Paris Exposition will be the New York City Ballet Company and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

While final details of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tour await clarification from abroad, visits are planned to 13 cities in six countries, under the aegis of the Congress For Cultural Freedom. The tour will occur between the conclusion of the 71st symphony season in Boston, and the opening of the annual Pops Concerts June 1. Munch, now recovering from a lengthy illness, is expected back on the podium in March.

THE ORCHESTRA will leave for New York after its final Boston concert April 26, to board the Ile de France, which is moving up its sailing date to facilitate matters. The ship will sail April 28 for Le Havre.

Munch, Alsatian-born conductor who became director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, will lead the symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera House. This event will be honored by the presence of President Vincent Auriol, state, diplomatic, civic, and social leaders, with the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. This and a second Exposition concert which Monteux will conduct at Paris's Theater des Champs-Elysees on May 8 will be devoted to 20th century European and American music.

Monteux's program will witness an historical re-creation, a performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" almost 39 years after he introduced this pivotal work in the same theater.

The next day the orchestra entrains for The Hague, where Munch will conduct on May 10. On May 11, under Monteux, who often has led the celebrated Amsterdam Concertgebouw, the group will perform in Amsterdam.

ON MAY 17, the Boston Symphony will visit Strasbourg, Munch's birthplace. There the conductor was violinist in the Strasbourg Orchestra and taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory.

The tour will end with the orchestra's first appearance in London, at the new and acoustically perfect Festival Hall, on May 26. Then the orchestra will sail May 27 for New York from Southampton aboard the Ile de France.

[80]

TURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1952 Herald

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the 15th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36 ..... Beethoven
Six epigraphes antiques ..... Debussy-Ansermet
Concerto for Orchestra ..... Bartok

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS NOW established beyond a question of doubt that Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra is not only a contemporary classic of the very highest order, but that it is steadily gaining a firm hold on the hearts and minds of today's audiences. Its success yesterday, in contrast to its failure on the occasion of its first performance in 1944, was absolutely brilliant.

I hope I shall not be found immodest in pointing out that in reviewing the first performance of this great work most enthusiastically eight years ago, I said that while it was not readily accepted by the audience, it would some day "speak powerfully to the musical audience." Yesterday, having been heard once again only two seasons ago, it did speak; few contemporary works of such advanced a character as this have ever spoken so powerfully or been received so clamorously. To be sure, it is not possible to determine how much of the applause was for the music and how much for the occasion of Mr. Ansermet's farewell, but everything indicated that the music went straight to the mark.

* * *

In any case, though much of the work still retains its own secrets (the first movement remains the most difficult of assimilation), it is now possible to discern the extraordinary beauty of the detail, to make contact with the eloquence of its thematic substance, to feel the overwhelmingly personal character of the emotional utterance. For this is, indisputably, one of the most autobiographical compositions in the literature.

It is as if the then ill composer, like Beethoven in the Canzona of Op. 132, who inscribed it the "Sacred Song of Thanksgiving of a convalescent to the Divinity," reviewed his entire life in the Concerto. There are suggestions of his search for a musical style, of his emotional conflicts, of his deepening distress in a foreign land, even of his tragic circumstances—for surely there are few more pathetic pages in all music than the slow movement. And always there is nostalgia: there are the sounds of the birds and fields and streams, of the tzigane and of the Hungarian folk rhythms and melodies. It is, in short, as remarkable for its narrative content as it is for its demonstration of consummate mastery of a special musical language, as remarkable for its emotional significance as for its technical attainment.

* * *

It must be said that Mr. Ansermet's role in projecting all this was superb. He conducted this monstrously complicated score with the clarity of style that has illuminated all his work here, bringing out the details of texture, of rhythm and of architecture in a masterly fashion. Needless to say, it requires the utmost of technical virtuosity on the part of every man in the orchestra, for nearly every instrument is a soloist, and they performed wonderfully.

ANOTHER OUTSTANDING work on an altogether admirable program was Mr. Ansermet's own orchestration of a set of piano duets by Debussy. The pieces themselves are of a most refined and poetic character, but Mr. Ansermet's scoring of them was perfectly exquisite. Had he submitted them as a discovery of a lost manuscript in Debussy's own hand, it is to be doubted if the world's most eminent musicologists could determine that Debussy himself had not set the pieces for orchestra. It seemed to me the most remarkable capture of a composer's orchestral style I ever heard, and I hope the suite remains in our repertoire. The Beethoven, taken a bit more slowly and with a bit more repose than we have lately heard it, was notably done, too, to make Mr. Ansermet's closing program memorable.

* * *

I meant to mention above that the program was in error saying that Bartok wasn't present at the premiere of his Concerto; he was, but neither he nor his work, I am sad to say, got a "tumultuous" reception. What a pity he could not have been there yesterday! I meant also to devote much more to Mr. Ansermet on the occasion of his last concert here, but I have put that off until Sunday. In the meantime I can only say it has been a pleasure and an honor to have had him with us these few months. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Feb. 22 to do a suite from Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Richard Burgin conducting.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
FEB 10 1952

Boston Award Goes To Lukas Foss

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, Feb. 9 — The Mark Horblit Award has been given to Lukas Foss, pianist, for his second piano concerto. Mr. Foss introduced his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November, and is now in Rome on a Pix de Rome scholarship. The Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award" was established in 1946 for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 10 1952

The Man Who Saved the Day--- An au Revoir to Ernest Ansermet

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The time has come to say good-bye to Ernest Ansermet following his magnificent gesture in sacrificing his own personal commitments in Switzerland to hasten to the aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hard hit in November by the illness of Charles Munch. It is a good-bye said in reluctance and in gratitude: Mr. Ansermet revealed himself in his weeks here with us a man of infinite musical wisdom, of taste, refinement, elegance, sincerity and devotion, and a man of infinite charm and dignity as well. Who could have carried off the difficult task of substituting so graciously and so unobtrusively as Mr. Ansermet is hard to imagine.

The word "unobtrusively" is here used in a special sense to mean that this Swiss conductor did not take the opportunity thrust upon him to be forward, to dominate, to take over. He never at any time displayed anything but the most delicate sensitivity as to his position; he never sought sensation, never sought to impress upon anyone the attitudes of the temperamental virtuoso, never attempted to make the most of the situation. He was utterly correct in every way, both as to his approach to the audience and to the orchestra entrusted to him.

Indeed, he might have been a little more aggressive than he was in this regard, for such is the singular working of the crowd psychology that this reserve, this modesty, was construed by some to be pedantry. Yet nothing is further from the truth; Mr. Ansermet is indisputably one of the ranking thinkers in the world of conductors, a philosopher, mathematician and scholar, but there are few conductors today who remain so faithful to the express wishes of the composers whose music he plays. He is incapable of the distortion of those intentions for the purposes of public display and he is unswayed by the desire to end a given piece with a whoop merely to achieve the tumultuous acclaim such whoops invariably produce.

The resulting readings were notable for purity of esthetic purpose, clarity of orchestral texture, accuracy of balance and cleanness of technical execution, for his intentions and his signals are unmistakably clear to the performers. This, after all, is the only truly correct approach, but it is an approach that is unfortunately a little out of fashion. Times have changed; today an audience demands the orchestral virtuoso, the Svengali-like conductor whose passionate attitudes seem somehow to choreograph the music and deliver it personally to the ear of the listener. Mr. Ansermet can do this, too (as witness his electrifying performance of Ravel's "La Valse"), but in general he is content to see to it that the composer, not he, gets top billing.

It may be said, in general, that Mr. Ansermet's programs have not quite had the bite they might have had. He has, of course, had a soloist on nearly every program, and most of them achieved notable personal successes; Monique de la Bruchollerie, for instance (whose triumph was the biggest of the season), Anshel Brusilow, Arthur Grumiaux and others. And he has done some of the standard repertoire things, Beethoven's Fifth, to name but one, and with them demonstrated his superb regard for tempo, for nuance, and for clarity.

Yet, for some reason, several of his programs did not quite come to the proper climax; on one occasion he concluded with a pretty trivial march by Chabrier, on another with Debussy's "La Mer" which, fine although it is, is a little too familiar to this audience; on still another with dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," which are entertaining but not quite substantial enough.

But this is of small concern, actually, and after all the guest conductor, as in the case of Monteux, who filled up an afternoon with a pot-pourri of pieces by Wagner and Debussy, has no particular responsibility to create programs that have cumulative impact. And, indeed, it may well be that Mr. Munch himself originally planned these programs, though a number of things he announced have been omitted so far.

In any case, whether or not the programs during Mr. Munch's absence have had that particular ingredient that contributes to a sense of complete fulfillment, Mr. Ansermet himself has fulfilled his own mission to the full. He has demonstrated beyond a question that he is one of our most advanced conductors; a man whose intellectual standing and artistic integrity are unchallenged among conductors today. He has been, as an artist and as a man, a godsend to Boston's symphony season. He assumed, at great personal sacrifice, a trying and a difficult but not, I trust, a thankless task. For I am sure that all of us join, as he returns to Switzerland following the current tour of the orchestra, in expressing our sincere thanks to him for coming to our rescue at a crucial moment in the history of the orchestra. We shall certainly long remember him in affection and in gratitude.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

Munch Announces 1952 Plans for Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller Theatre-Concert Hall Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10).

DEBUT SLATED IN PARIS

The Boston Symphony will make its European debut May 6 in the Paris Open House, with Charles Munch directing.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN, world pianist, who gives his only Boston recital of the season at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb.17.

LUKAS FOSS

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto.

Munch Resumes Work in March

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Ernest Ansermet completes his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with this week's New York concerts, and will then return to Switzerland. Both of the soloists, Monique de la Bruchollerie, French pianist, who plays Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall, and Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist, playing Friday night in Brooklyn and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, are making their New York debuts. On Wednesday, Mr. Ansermet will conduct the first New York performance of Arthur Honegger's "Monopartita," which had its American premiere in Boston Feb. 1. This was first played in Zurich last June. According to the orchestra's program annotator, John Burk, it can be called a succession of short movements presented in a continuous musical narrative, and drawn together by the return of the opening theme at the end.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Bostonians' last New York concerts of the season (March 12, 14 and 15). Charles Munch, now recuperating in Havana, is expected to be back on the Boston podium for the last five weeks of the home season, which closes April 26. Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor, will direct the concerts of the week ending Feb. 23; Mr. Bernstein then begins a three weeks' engagement. G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Chorus, will direct these choruses with the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on Friday and Saturday, March 21-22. Mr. Munch will conduct the performances of Bach's St. John Passion in Holy Week (which closes April 12) as originally scheduled, and will sail with the orchestra for its European tour April 28.

Dimitri Mitropoulos has included two novelties in this week's Philharmonic-Symphony programs. Both are by composers in their seventies. Ernst von Dohnanyi's second violin concerto will be introduced to New York by Frances Magnes, to whom it is dedicated, on Thursday night. She was the soloist in its first performance, by the San Antonio Symphony under Victor Alessandro on Jan. 26. Mr. Dohnanyi composed the first two movements in April, 1949, in Argentina, and completed it that December, after he had moved to Tallahassee to join Florida State University's faculty. Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe will give the first local performances of Ralph Vaughan Williams' two-piano concerto next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 10 1951

Munch Will Direct Tanglewood Center

BOSTON (AP)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood next Summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced yesterday.

Munch is recuperating in Cuba from an illness. He will resume his leadership of the orchestra next month.

At Tanglewood Munch will conduct all six concerts in the theater-concert hall, the smaller auditorium, on July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20.

He also will conduct six of the nine concerts in the Music Shed—on July 24, 26, 27 and 31 and August 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10.

Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one of the Music Shed concerts in each of the first two weeks. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the final week's three concerts.

ERIE PA,
DISPATCH
FEB 10 1952

Boston Symphony To Make Debut In Paris, May 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6, according to an announcement issued today by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

* * *

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, whose theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This column aims at accuracy, but errors will occur and a couple of them slipped in last week. It is no excuse that they were put, indirectly, in the mouth of Sir Thomas Beecham, who may possibly have been misquoted. If he was, this department owes him its apologies. But in any event, dates are dates and should be checked before they are printed.

* * *

What I quoted Sir Thomas as saying was that Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, "the last orchestral piece to be securely fixed in the repertory," was 25 years old, and the last opera to become so established, Puccini's "Turandot," 31. As I recall the conversation, one member of the group of interviewers asked at this juncture if Sir Thomas was referring to "Rosenkavalier," and the conductor replied, "No, that was 41," with the accent on the 40.

* * *

In discussing the age of a work, there are two dates to be considered: that of its completion and that of its first public performance. There can sometimes be a considerable spread here, an extreme case being that of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, written in 1822 but not brought out until 1865! However, having suddenly realized, when it was too late to do anything about it, that the dates in question might not be correct, I proceeded to consult my books of reference.

* * *

Philip Hale, who prided himself on his exactness in such matters, once told me that he checked every reference three times. You can read that the Sibelius Seventh was finished in 1925 but the straight of it would seem to be that the last note was set down on March 2, 1924, and that the world premiere occurred at Stockholm on the 24th of that month, with the composer conducting. Perhaps unintentionally, Sir Thomas gave the impression that the first British performance, under his direction was the actual premiere.

* * *

And now for "Turandot." It too was completed in 1924, to the extent that it was completed, since the composer was still working on it when he died, at Brussels, following an unsuccessful operation for throat cancer, on Nov. 29. The rest of the work, or the last part of Act III, was composed by Puccini's friend and colleague Franco Alfano, and the opera was brought out at Milan's La Scala with Toscanni conducting, on April 25, 1926. "Turandot" still holds its place in the repertory, but its fate seems to be considerably less secure than that of the prime Puccini favorites, "Boheme," "Tosca" and "Butterfly," which date from 1896, 1901 and 1904, respectively.

* * *

Whether music may be "petering out," as Sir Thomas suggested, is still highly conjectural, very much a matter of opinion, though works of apparent greatness do not seem to be coming forth as rapidly as they did, as Sir Thomas remarked, in the days of his own youth. Opera, in particular, seems to be having a bad time of it. Nevertheless, there are two that have made considerable stir which arrived on the scene later than "Turandot," "Wozzeck," which seems more modern, was actually written in '21, and first produced in '25; these two operas are Britten's "Peter Grimes," 1945 and Stravinsky's "The Rake's Progress," introduced to the world in Venice last September. "Grimes" has been the rounds, but will it [illegible] for Stravinsky's Hogarthian opera it is now being played in Europe and the Metropolitan has it under serious consideration for next season. Menotti's "The Consul" has also made a considerable stir and not only in this country but some in England hailed Britten's recent "Billy Budd" as his best work to date.

* * *

And how about the symphonic situation? When you come right down to it, the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius may be a repertory piece in England, America and Scandinavia, but hardly in the Latin countries, or even Central Europe. And here in Boston it would seem that Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" (1934), displaying more power than the Sibelius Seventh, Sir Thomas said nothing about, and whom Ernest Ansermet has referred to as "the greatest composer of our day. His Koussevitzky commissioned Concerto for Orchestra, a work of undoubted stature, dates from 1944. With it last season Ansermet brought to a close his present visit to Boston.

* * *

And what of the rest of the symphony season? As matters now stand, Richard Burgin will conduct the concerts of next week, including the Ninth Symphony of Schubert. After that, we get Leonard Bernstein for two weeks and then Charles Munch, who at last reports was completing his period of convalescence in Havana. On March 21 G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct a performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," at which the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe will assist, and Mr. Munch will do the St. John Passion of Bach in Holy Week, as previously arranged.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 1 1952

FALL PLANS LISTED FOR PHILHARMONIC

Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis' and 'Godunoff' Excerpts on Schedule for 1952-53

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff" and the appearance of several instrumentalists for the first time with the orchestra will be among the features of the 1952-1953 subscription season of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. The twenty-eight-week season will open on Oct. 16, 1952, and close on April 26, 1953.

Three pianists will make their New York debuts with the orchestra—Lelia Gousseau, Marcelle Meyer and Paul Badura-Skoda. Mlles. Gousseau and Meyer are French, while Mr. Badura-Skoda is a Viennese.

In addition, several artists will be heard for the first time with the Philharmonic. They are the Belgian violinist, Arthur Grumiaux, who is scheduled to make his first New York appearance on Friday with the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy; the Austrian pianist, Friedrich Gulda; the Greek pianist, Anna Xydis, and Louis Krasner, the American violinist.

Two young Americans who have appeared with the orchestra at summer concerts in Lewisohn Stadium—Vera Franceschi, pianist, and Jeanne Mitchell, violinist—also will be heard during the season.

Dmitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the orchestra, will conduct for eighteen weeks. He will be relieved by Bruno Walter, George Szell, Guido Cantelli and Franco Autori. Mr. Autori will continue as associate conductor. The opening concert, directed by Mr. Mitropoulos, will present excerpts from "Boris Godunoff," with George London, the American bass-baritone of the Metropolitan Opera, in the title role.

Fourteen pianists, ten violinists and three 'cellists have been engaged as soloists for the 1952-53 season.

The pianists are Claudio Arrau, Paul Badura-Skoda, Clifford Curzon, Rudolf Firkusny, Vera Franceschi, Lelia Gousseau, Friedrich Gulda, Myra Hess, William Kapell, Marcelle Meyer, Guiomar Novaes, Artur Rubinstein, Rudolf Serkin and Anna Xydis.

The violinists are John Corigliano, Mischa Elman, Arthur Grumiaux, Zino Francescatti, Louis Krasner, Yehudi Menuhin, Nathan Milstein, Jeanne Mitchell, Erica Morini and Joseph Szigeti. The 'cellists are Pierre Fournier, Edmund Kurtz and Laszlo Varga.

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 1 1952

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

New Work, New Pianist

With Ernest Ansermet substituting for the still-ailing Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Carnegie Hall last evening, introducing a new work by Arthur Honegger and a new pianist, the young French Monique de la Bruchollerie.

Music and Dance Tonight

"La Boheme," Metropolitan Opera, 8:30.

Philharmonic - Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Frances Magnes soloist, Carnegie Hall, 8:45.

NYC Ballet, City Center, 8:30.

It is also a little dated. It reminds you of the days when all composers were trying very hard to be modern, and cocksurely certain that that was the coming thing. That was their story and today they are stuck with it, but it does seem that nobody is consciously endeavoring to be modern any more. It is years since anyone played "Pacific 231," and I expect it will be years before it is heard again.

The evening's music began with a charming, light-fingered reading of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony."

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 11 1952

Munch Announces 1952 Plans for Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller Theatre-Concert Hall Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10).

This Clipping From
PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL
FEB 11 1952

r Music s 'Paris In e Spring'

THEO POWELL SMITH
Musical Music And Drama Editor

MRS. SMITH

PROGRAMME D

HALL-JOHNSON Choir.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 11 1952

From Chew to Chore

It was good to read the In Perspective on old Infantry Hall Feb. 2, for I too have suffered there during Boston Symphony concerts, and have fond recollections of the roller polo games. Jigger Higgins was on the Pawtucket team, while my loyalty always was with Providence.

I too met Senator Harding on the night you speak of. He was the principal speaker at a dinner at which the service clubs in Providence were all represented. I was there as Chief Crier that year, of the Town Criers. For some reason I was early and I wandered around the stage and then went down on the floor. The door to the space under the stage was standing open, and just inside was a magnificent looking man in evening dress, leaning against one of the stage supports and chewing tobacco as though he enjoyed it.

He saw me looking in and called out, "Come in. I'm Senator Harding, killing time and chewing tobacco. It's a bad habit I got into while I was a newspaper man, but I enjoy it."

So I went in and we stood there, talking together as one newspaper man to another, until it came time for him to go. Then he reluctantly threw away his chew and went out to perform his chore. I had already regarded him as presidential timber and left him with a higher regard than ever. Like Grant, he was killed by his friends.

HORACE G. BELCHER.

Providence.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 12 1952

1st U.S. Performance Of Honegger's 'Monopartita'

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Last week in Boston there were many notable and interesting items in the concert field.

Friday and Saturday's Boston Symphony concerts saw the first American performance of Arthur Honegger's latest work "Monapartita." Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist, played a concerto by Mozart and Ravel's "Tzigane," and the orchestra and Mr. Ansermet played Honegger's "Pacific 231."

The "Monopartita" by Honegger is a dark, foreboding piece which carries with it the same loneliness and emptiness of spirit common in this age. Not that Honegger's music is devoid of spirit, but the music itself seems, I think, to be self-centered in theme — a brooding piece which depicts the author's own probable discernment with life's everyday struggle. If this is what Honegger intends, then it is indeed a tragic summation of the past and a rather moody auger for the future.

* * *

THIS PIECE follows a well integrated form of many sections which are closely welded together. Musically, it portrays the excellent technical equipment at Honegger's command. He is eloquent, though sad, in this specific work.

The late Serge Koussevitzky played "Pacific 231" in 1924, its first concert in America. Mr. Ansermet ran through it again this week. It is not supposed to imitate the sounds of a locomotive—it is merely an "impression" of these sounds and the "physical sensations" which one is apt to pick up while standing at the track suitcase in hand.

Well, it is a terribly good imitation of the sounds of a locomotive, the intentions of the composer to the contrary, and the impressions are the same ones which I, for one, have always received as the express lurches ahead at full throttle.

* * *

ARTHUR GRUMIAUX is a young violinist of worth. The performance of Mozart's Concerto in G major, K. 216 is the first by the Boston orchestra. Mr. Grumiaux seemed too concerned with the mechanics of the piece and his interpretation was an impersonal one at best. However, it may well be that he was very nervous—not a wholly improbable circumstance for a young man playing in this country for the first time—and he just did not seem to be able to get going. However, his performance of Ravel's "Tzigane" was something else again.

His tone was a large one and his bow was skillfully handled to produce the emotional intensities demanded by Ravel in his gypsy tale. His technique was sure and his playing was much more aggressive than in the Mozart. He was warmly applauded and will doubtless see and hear him again soon at Symphony Hall.

* * *

SOLOMON gave a successful recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday, delighting the huge audience who turned out to greet him. The British pianist is, without doubt, a very fine one—a musician fully aware of his responsibilities. Solomon was successful as a boy prodigy, retired from active participation on the concert stage in his youth to study further. Now he is one of the rare prodigies who come back into music and make a go of it.

His program included the Bach "Prelude and Fugue in C minor" (from Book II) and "Prelude and Fugue in G major" (Book I), Mozart's "Sonata in D major, K. 576," Schmann's "Sonata No. 1 in F-sharp minor" and Debussy's "La Cathedrale Engloutie." His playing was nearly flawless.

* * *

WILLIS PAGE conducted the Cecilia Society, members of the Boston Symphony, and some fine young soloists, in an oratorio-like performance of Verdi's "Aida," at Symphony Hall. It was a good idea, presenting Aida in concert form. It came off pretty well too.

The soloists were Norman Fontaine as the King of Egypt, Norman Atkins played Amonasro, Susan Griska was Aida, Carl Nelson was Radames, and Paul Tibbetts played the role of Ramphis, the High Priest Carl Nelson and Paul Tibbets were very good in their respective parts and Susan Griska accounted herself well in the title role. Miss Griska has a large voice and the lower register is one of exceptional charm. Her stage presence was a dominating factor in her success. Mary Kreste sang the part of Amneris, effectively.—E. S.

Six Concerts Slated For Berkshire Festival

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will consist this year of six concerts in the Theater Concert Hall devoted to the music of Bach, Mozart and Schubert and three series of concerts in the Music Shed.

The conductor, who has been ill recently and is recuperating in Cuba, has announced that the Theater Concert Hall concerts will be held on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13 and 19-20.

The Shed concerts will be given Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 24, 26 and 27, July 31, Aug. 2 and 3 and Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts each week while Pierre Monteux, recently resigned conductor of the San Francisco Philharmonic making his Tanglewood debut, will conduct two concerts. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

This
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
FEB 12 1952

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PLANS ANNOUNCED

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, he Theatre-Concert Hall, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6 12-13, 1920. Charles Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (series A on July 24, 26 27; series B on July 31, August 2, 3 series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance a Tanglewood, will conduct one concer eac hin series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra, with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tangewood. The 1952 session, June 30 to August 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

1952 Times AMUSEMENTS

ANSERMET LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Monique de la Bruchollerie Is Soloist in Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto at Program Here

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M. Conductor, Ernest Ansermet; Monique de la Bruchollerie, pianist.

Symphony No. 4 ..... Mendelssohn
Monopartit (first New York performance) ..... Honegger
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Rachmaninoff
La Valse ..... Ravel

By OLIN DOWNES

Young Miss Monique de la Bruchollerie, a pupil of Isidore Philipp, now of this city, and a graduate with highest honors of the Paris Conservatoire, made a first appearance as pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto last night in Carnegie Hall, and reaped an immense triumph.

When Miss de la Bruchollerie finished the concert she was applauded and cheered, and repeatedly called back to the stage. The audience could not have enough of her. The orchestra rose when Mr. Ansermet brought her on his arm, to acknowledge her welcome, and all rejoiced in her success.

The youth, gallantry and temperament with which she met the enormous physical and technical demands of the concerto, and the modesty and sincerity of her bearing, would have brought her acclaim with a less exciting performance, a less intrepid conclusion than her peroration of the final movement, which was the high point of the entire interpretation.

But excitement and virtuoso spirit were not the pianist's only claim to attention. She played in the lyrical passages, such as the opening folk-like theme of the first movement, with fine nuance, and also, evidently, with a knowledge of the orchestral score, for her solo passages dove-tailed beautifully with those of the orchestra, in tone quality as well as articulation.

Saying all of which, it is still the fact that Miss de la Bruchollerie is not as yet fully the equal of this concerto, with its immense line, and its demands, on occasion, for lyrical musical structure, a mind's breadth and a giant's paw in execution. All honor to her for accomplishing what she did, and congratulations upon her reception by a wildly enthusiastic audience. But treatment of the earlier movement, spirited, sensitive as it was, was episodic, cut up in pieces.

She sometimes hurried to a climax, in places where she should have done the opposite—broadened. Hence the prevailing absence, until the very last, of the truly grand sweep. Also it was often necessary, to meet the great waves of Rachmaninoff's orchestration, for her to employ the limit of her strength. She would achieve the necessary sonority in such places, but with a degree of hardness. And unless this concerto lies within the pianist's powers, instead of taxing them to the very utmost, it cannot have its full effect. One hopes to hear Miss de la Bruchollerie in other concertos and also in recital. It is clear that she is an exceptional artist.

The concert began with a charming, animated and polite performance of a polite symphony, the "Italian" of Mendelssohn, in which Mr. Ansermet kept properly to Mendelssohn's proverbial preference for a fast tempo. There was a first performance in this city of Arthur Honegger's "Monopartita," composed as recently as last March in Paris. It is a short piece of four movements that develop into each other, with the last page echoing in a distant and poetical way the imposing announcement of the opening—a fine page, hymned by the brass under a persistent "pedal point" of the strings.

The qualities, "moods," if one will, of the following movements, which are in various tempi and forms, give one the impression not only of a "Monopartita," but a monologue, very personal and retrospective, on the part of the composer; an expression of memories and reflections, some tragical, put down without explanation or apology, and in a highly individual vein, on the music paper.

Very appropriately, in connection with the occasion of Honegger's sixtieth birthday, which will be on March 10, Mr. Ansermet played as an addition to the printed program the brilliant and witty invention of his early days, the brief and exhilarating modern tone-poem, "Pacific 231." It is the fantasy on a locomotive, hurling its tons of vibrating steel over the tracks, generating the song of speed and power from the rhythms of its progress. This is a wonderful musical structure, a most artistic idea of a contemporaneous musician, who finds fascination and poetry too in the phenomena of his age.

The learned counterpoint is companioned by the energy and multiplicity of the rhythms, as the locomotive begins to move, the big wheels to grind, the smaller wheels and the pistons coming into play. It is turned into music, not imitative, but imaginative, and absolutely Gallic in its deftness and point. A splendid piece, too long away from the repertory, by the man who wrote that he loved locomotives "as other men love horses and women!" Superb Honegger! We can see and hear him laughing as he roared one night on a street corner in Paris, in a day when he was young and the world was gayer.

The concert ended with Mr. Ansermet's wildly dramatic reading of Ravel's ominous and satirical "La Valse," with the conclusion, as the late Lawrence Gilman once Choral projects to be undertaken, Mr. Munch said, will be Honegger's "Dance of Death" and the Berlioz Requiem.

Boston Honors Honegger

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ernest Ansermet came again for the Boston Symphony's visit to Carnegie Hall last night. He took the opportunity to honor Honegger, anticipating the composer's 60th birthday next month. In doing so he showed more enthusiasm for Honegger's music than the audience showed on hearing it.

The first New York performance for his latest work, "Monopartita," and a revival of "Pacific 231," which placed Honegger in the limelight over a quarter century ago, provided an interesting contrast.

The new work disclosed how musical Honegger has become, how well he can evoke a mood, and perhaps how pessimistic he may have become. "Pacific 231" was and still is a tour de force.

The "locomotive style" set by "Pacific 231" could be detected in "Monopartita." So could a wonderful skill in orchestration. "Monopartita" however is probably less significant even though "Pacific 231" is an outmoded locomotive in an age of streamliners.

* * *

An atmosphere of respectability characterized this concert. For all the technical prodigality of Monique de la Bruchollerie, the piano soloist, she softened the virility of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto too much. Her fastidious attention to detail watered down the music until the very end.

Even then she did not attain the truly brilliant quality of tone needed throughout the work. Hers was an extraordinarily facile account of the piano part. It did not sound much like Rachmaninoff, nor did Ansermet's conducting of the orchestra reveal comprehension of the composer's style.

Mendelsohn's "Italian" Symphony opened the program. After a bright opening, the radiance of the score faded into the light of common day. Ravel's "La Valse" at the close was beautifully played but without all the bite—or the lilt—it can have.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
FEB 13 1951

THE MUSIC BOX—

NEW BRUENNHILDE TRIUMPHS AT MET; NEWCOMER PRAISED

By IRVING KOLODIN

Music Editor, The Saturday Review

NEW YORK, Feb. 13—Opposite

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S winter of discontent — caused in large part by the illness, with virus infection, of Charles Munch — is edging along. Leonard Bernstein has agreed to interrupt his year of rest and composition in Mexico to conduct two weeks during March in Boston and one week on tour, following which G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Harvard Glee Club, will do Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" for a week's audience in Boston.

After that it is hoped that Munch will be well enough to do the "St. John Passion" of Bach during Holy Week and lead the orchestra for its overseas visit in late April. This year's six-week season at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, will begin on July 5.

* * *

WANT A PREVIEW of next season's opening concert by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos? George London will be the vocal soloist in a lengthy series of excerpts from "Boris Godounov," with chorus, in Russian. The whole parcel will be wrapped up for a recording by Columbia shortly thereafter.

TIGHT BINDING

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
FEB 1952

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

New Work, New Pianist

...ew Ernest Ansermet substituting for the still-ailing ... the Boston Symphony Orchestra played ... Hall last evening, introducing a new work by ... and a new pianist, the young French ... de la Bruchollerie.

Music and Dance Tonight

"La Boheme," Metropolitan Opera, 8:30.

Philharmonic - Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting; Frances Magnes soloist, Carnegie Hall, 8:45.

NYC Ballet, City Center, 8:30.

It is also a little dated. It reminds you of the days when all composers were trying very hard to be modern, and cocksurely certain that that was the coming thing. That was their story and today they are stuck with it, but it does seem that nobody is consciously endeavoring to be modern any more. It is years since anyone played "Pacific 231," and I expect it will be years before it is heard again.

The evening's music began with a charming, light-fingered reading of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony."

...Honegger work is ...marita." As its title ...intended to be a ...compressed into ... It is quite unlike ...tas of Bach, with ...cession of clearly-defined ...ments each set off by a full ... The new Honegger piece is ...ly integrated. Its different ...ions flow smoothly one into ...ext. The joints do not show, ...gether it is a craftsmanly ...e of work.

...honor of the composer's ap... 60th birthday, Mr. An... ...and the orchestra ... ...Honeg... ...231." Concertgoers ... ...went what an up... ...or its first per... ...Today it seems not ... ...have heard more out... ...since.

This Clipping From
PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL
FEB 1952

...r Music ...s 'Paris In ...e Spring'

THEO POWELL SMITH
...rial Music And Drama Editor

...plans a ... ...ing, and Chorus Dell'... ...Delia Santa Cecilia of ... The New York City ballet ... direction of George Bal... ...will present 20 ballets ... the first time in Paris. The ...rld premier of "Plein Feu," a ...w ballet by Georges Aurios will ...soon, as well as the world pre... ...e of a new ballet by Henry ...ssigue.

Besides the long and elaborate ...rogram will be an exhibition of ...00 Twentieth Century paintings ...m European and American artists ...om museums and private collec... ...ns here and abroad. These will ... assembled by James Johnson Sweeney, art critic and author, ...rmer director of the Museum of ...Modern Art in New York City.

MRS. SMITH

...Boston ... ...by ... ...Mac... ...A... ...be ... ...state di... ...social leaders ... ...Nation... ...Good ... ...Ha... ...Ma... ...Ho... ...Ba... ...M. F... ...Ba... ...Ba... ...Ba

Stock-Herald
Feb 15

AUS DER M

Von FRED LOW

Ansermet dirigiert Boston Symphonie

Ernest Ansermet dirigierte das Mittwoch-Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters in der Carnegie Hall; Monique de la Bruchollerie wirkte im Rachmaninoff Klavierkonzert Nr. 3 als Solistin mit.

Die junge Künstlerin ist geborene Pariserin; sie kommt aus einer Musikerfamilie, ihre Mutter ist eine Großnichte des Komponisten Boieldieu und selbst eine ausgezeichnete Pianistin, ihr Vater war mit Andre Messager verwandt. Sie studierte mit Isador Philipp und gewann den ersten Preis des "Conservatoire", Paris, sowie bedeutende Wettbewerbe in Brüssel und Wien. Charles Munch dirigierte das "Orchester du Conservatoire" in einem Konzert, in dem Monique de la Bruchollerie debütierte; ihr amerikanisches Erstauftreten war mit der Boston Symphonie 1951 im gleichen Werk. Wie Mittwoch abend in der Carnegie Hall.

Die Pianistin spielt mit hervorragender Technik und tiefem Empfinden; ihr Vortrag erweist sowohl ihre musikalischen als auch ihre pianistischen Qualitäten, die es ihr gestatten ein so schwieriges Werk brillant und gesangvoll wiederzugeben. Monique de la Bruchollerie ist in ihrem Wesen sehr einfach, im wohltuenden Gegensatz zu mancher ihrer Berufskollegen; ihr Spiel ist temperamentvoll, der Anschlag immer wohlklingend und die Phrasierung läßt das Eindringen in die Gefühlswelt des Komponisten erkennen.

Die junge Pianistin erhielt nach dem Konzert begeisterte Beifallsbezeigungen; wir werden Gelegenheit haben sie in ihrem eigenen Klavierabend Samstag, 23. Februar, nachmittags in der Carnegie Hall wieder zu hören und ihr Können in verschiedenen Werken noch genauer zu beurteilen. — Ernest Asermet eröffnete das Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters mit einer beschwingten Aufführung der "Italienischen" Symphonie von Mendelssohn. Die Geigenpassagen der Fuge im ersten Satz, die staccato Figuren und die Läufe im "Con Moto moderato" waren in der Einheitlichkeit und Transparenz bemerkenswert.

Den Beschluß der ersten Abteilung bildete die amerikanische Erstaufführung der "Monopartita" von Honegger; Ernest Ansermet kündigte ferner in ein paar Worten die Wiedergabe von "Pacific 231" des gleichen Komponisten zur Ehrung seines bevorstehenden 60. Geburtstages (10. März) an. — Feierliche, rhythmisch strenge Bläserakkorde leiten den ersten Satz der Monopartita ein; getragene Streicherpassagen begleiten und führen zu der Durchführung der Themen. Originelle Rhythmen treten im weiteren Verlauf des ersten Satzes hervor und einige melodiöse Themen lassen aufhorchen. Das Werk hat vier kurze Sätze, die den Zusammenhang erkennen lassen; sehnsüchtig klagende Themen wechseln mit den straffen Akkorden der Streicher, später von Bläsern übernommen ab. — Dirigent und Orchester gaben ihr Bestes in der Wiedergabe der interessanten Komposition.

Das anschließend vorgetragene "Pacific 231" ist eines der einfallsreichsten symphonischen Werke Honeggers; es ist eine Komposition, die vom Rhythmus, von der Bewegung lebt und in der Symphonie der Geräusche der Lokomotive realistisch wirkt. Pulsierendes Leben und Straffheit, die aber auch den Humor nicht vergißt geben dem Werk den brillanten Effekt. — Mit einer Aufführung von Ravels "La Valse" wurde das Konzert zum Abschluß gebracht.

Wash Times Herald

.D. C.— FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 195

Boston Group Gives Season's Best Concert

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

A virtuoso orchestra under a virtuoso conductor gave the season's finest symphonic performance last night in Constitution Hall.

The orchestra was the Boston Symphony. The conductor was that group's current guest, Ernest Ansermet of Geneva. The qualities which contributed to the superlative excellence of the event all were typically French. The taste that wrought the manifold refinements of tone was entirely Gallic. It was marked by restraint, by freedom from extravagence, by an unfailing sense of beauty, by absolute artistic sincerity.

Not until the end of the concert did the conductor permit himself dramatic breadth and weight of expression; and, to be exact, it was not until the final movement of Debussy's tone-poem, "La Mer," that occasion developed which demanded such a climax.

This Debussy tone-poem, or as he preferred to call the work, "Three Sketches," is an expression such as only could have given voice by the genius that created the impressionistic school These scenes of sunlight on a calm sea, of playful waves, finally, of the dialogue between the wind and the mounting seas, are marvelous in sound, feeling and movement. They have, too, the quality of suggestion that paints the scene.

"La Mer" is now recognized as a masterpiece of the French repertoire. Fifty years ago, when impressionism was new in the art, it earned the composer much abuse and little praise. The world now accepts Debussy as a classicist, meaning an artist of proved excellence; but that does not mean that the general public has developed complete understanding or appreciation. To many this music is still a mystery that attracts because of its illusions and, to coin a word, its elusions.

Most conductors hesitate to program it. They doubt their own powers, or the responsiveness of their players, or the interest of the public. After Ansermet's success last night, perhaps others will be moved to follow his example.

"La Mer" was prefaced by too many long works. It could have been given a more artfully contrived setting. There should have been only the Mendelssohn A major Symphony, in which Ansermet also wrought marvels of lightness, suavity, and grace. The Brahms Academic Festival Overture and the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," tho a novelty, would not have been missed. Not even Ansermet's skill could make the Brahms score luminous. As for Stravinsky, in this ballet music he borrows so lavishly from Tschaikowsky that not even his wizardy with orchestral color could justify the open plagiarism.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

FEB 13 1952

Composer Honored

Special to The Louisville Times

Boston, Feb. 13.—The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been presented to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto.

The young composer journeyed from Rome where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

Postlude

Washington Post Feb 15

Ansermet Conducts Last of Boston Concerts

By Paul Hume

The Boston Symphony and Ernest Ansermet came to Washington last night for the final Constitution Hall concert in the Boston series.

Ansermet, who has been heard here in the last two years as guest conductor of the National Symphony, is serving in that capacity in Boston while Charles Munch recovers from a lingering affliction.

The program was skillfully balanced between familiar Nineteenth Century fare and great pages, by Stravinsky and Debussy, of the present century. It was in the latter half of the program, devoted to these more recent masters, that orchestra and conductor achieved their greatest degree of sympathy and power.

Stravinsky wrote his ballet, The Fairy's Kiss, with a dedication to "The music of Tschaikowsky." The allegiance to his predecessor is clear throughout the music. Among its greatest charms are the constant references to the moods and sounds of Swan Lake, Sleeping Beauty, and the other attractive moments of Tschaikowsky's theater writing.

Along with these comes the gentle bite of Stravinsky's more mellow style, with alluring pieces that cry out for a stage, an adagio, and a pas de deux. It is a tantalizing score, with moments of beauty, such as the string quartet, solo clarinet and harp, and many more. The playing was of unusual delicacy and flavor.

Debussy's La Mer is music that recalls the Boston orchestra's great days under Koussevitsky. But it also is music for which Ansermet has both the affinity and the genius to bring about a powerful reading of his own design. There was a strong sense of motion in much of the music that is sometimes more relaxed. It was a sea in clouded phases, as well as that clear, sunlit expanse Debussy drew so well. The sound and playing of the orchestra was a tribute to the guest leader for whom the audience had a great welcome.

To Brahms' finest variations, those on a theme by Haydn Ansermet gave space and peace. Unrushed, they changed in mood from variation to variation always faithful to the spirit of the music.

The same was true of Mendelssohn's affectionate remembrance of his Italian visit, his fourth symphony. The outer movements had the quick pulse they need, while the inner portions went untroubled on their serene way. The horn passages in the slow movement had a particularly fine effect. We are glad of the chance to hear and observe Ansermet again. He is one of the great orchestral leaders.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

FEB 14 1952

Music

Ansermet's Baton Is No Indian Club

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The podium deportment of Ernest Ansermet is all grace and gentility. It is never anything else, and the absence of the muscular, the acrobatic, in his stick-work causes one to wonder at the writhings and leapings of other conductors which, to tell the truth, gain them far less than he achieves in musical results.

Last night Mr. Ansermet conducted the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, and a special pleasure of the event was to observe his perfectly unruffled demeanor all through the program, while listening to his astute, wholly urbane and communicative renderings.

Honors Honegger.

The musical material for the occasion consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; the "Monopartita" of Arthur Honegger, a first performance here; the D minor Concerto of Rachmaninoff with the young French pianist, Monique de la Bruchollerie, making her local debut in the solo part, and Ravel's "La Valse." Quite unexpectedly, there was an encore—Honegger's "Pacific 231," played in honor of the composer's approaching 60th birthday, as Mr. Ansermet said.

Mme. De la Bruchollerie, garbed in a sort of "Maedchen in Uniform" dress of celestial blue, is a pianist of quality. In the performance of the Rachmaninoff she did not, nor did the conductor, give vent to any but the most cultivated feelings. And for once that score was accorded treatment mannerly, yet everywhere expressive and without a hint of the cloying sentimentality to which it so often falls victim.

One of the rendering's particular merits was the total rapport between the interested parties, and it is not extravagant to say that for ensemble work this may yet turn out to be the shining example of the season. The pianist, who is self-assurance in person, put on display a fleet and accurate technique, as well as a whole rainbow of pianistic colors. She was poetic and thunderously dramatic, by turns, though not quite in the fashion of the keyboard's fabulous giants. Anyway, she got a gigantic ovation for her splendid feat.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 13 1952

Pianist Augments Usual Good Program by Boston Orchestra

By JOAN BROOKWELL

French pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie received a tremendous and well deserved ovation last night at her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Playing the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto in D minor, Mme. Bruchollerie exhibited a flawless technique and an astonishingly powerful, yet deft and crisp, touch. She is obviously equipped with plenty of stamina, for the concerto is an exhausting one to play, and the soloist's performance was anything but half-hearted. Despite the vigor of her playing, she is capable of great delicacy of touch and feeling, as expressed particularly in the second movement of the Rachmaninoff work.

Palatable Melody.

Thanks to Mr. Ansermet's surprise encore, we were favored with a pair of Honegger's works born 23 years apart—the "Pacific 231" in 1928, "Monopartita" in 1951. Their styles, needless to say, are also separated by at least that many years. However, their common bonds are palatable melody, provocative rhythm and, from beginning to end, versatile invention.

The "Monopartita" drawing from the classic partita of Bach, is compressed into a continuous line of brief sections. The orchestra performed it beautifully. "Pacific 231" seems tame in these days of jet-powered flight or, perhaps, Mr. Ansermet, in a stringent mood of economy, shoveled into the boiler barely enough coal to make the run.

Conductor and orchestra collaborated on a highly polished, elegant account of the "Italian" Symphony, which had opened proceedings, then turning in a vivid, justly paced and attractively phrased version of "La Valse" to close them.

The orchestra itself gave the sort of concert one has grown to expect of the Boston Symphony, one of the performances which have made it such a drawing card in the Rutgers concert series.

Conducted by Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor who is appearing during the illness of Charles Munch, the regular director, the group gave a magnificent performance of the gay and melodic Symphony No. 4 in A major by Mendelssohn. The lively first movement, the strongly melodic second movement, where the theme is carried by the various strings, the purely classical third section, and the almost frenzied dance movement of the fourth—make this a favorite choice for any concert, and we've heard no better interpretation of it than that of the Boston Symphony. It is scarcely possible to improve on the perfection which the group has seemingly attained in previous concerts, and yet each year there seems to be something more to applaud.

Play Ravel Work

For its other two works, the orchestra played Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse," a new composition, "Monopartita" by Arthur Honegger, which is described in the program as "a succession of short movements presented in a continuous musical narrative."

The latter piece, first performed last June, added variety to the program, although it was not too well received by the audience. It is, however, an interesting work, atonal and sometimes syncopated, rather an unusual choice for the generally conservative orchestra. Forceful and dramatic, it has a feeling of apprehension, a mood of general unhappiness.

The performance of the Ravel work, which closed the program, was a typical one, though almost overpoweringly dramatic.

The concert, presented in the university gymnasium, was the third in this season's series.

This Clipping From
HELENA, MONT.
INDEPENDENT-RECORD

FEB 11 1952

With Other Editors . .

Cultural War

A great task force is moving out from the United States in May. It is bound for Paris—Paris-in-the-spring. The Boston Symphony orchestra will lay a barrage of 20th-century European and American music. The New York City ballet, having established a toe hold on the alien shores, will let loose a fantastic array of flying misses. Men of letters like William Faulkner and John Dos Passos will infiltrate the surrounding terrain to lecture and preside over forms of discussion.

All this is by way of meeting the great cultural offensive which the Soviet Union has been conducting in Europe in recent years. It will be part of an unusual exposition of the arts to be held under the international Congress for Cultural Freedom, with comparable artistic enterprises and personalities from England, France, Italy, Switzerland and Austria.

The free world is at last on its toes, blowing its own horn, acting its part, painting itself in its true colors, speaking out in the multiple accents of creative independence. The galaxy of plays, operas, concerts, art shows, and forums which will go to make up the exposition should do something to show the resources of "bourgeois cosmopolitanism" in a divided world. Since the American contribution will depend on private philanthropy rather than government subsidy, we trust that alert citizens will be prompt to recognize the potentialities in this constructive sort of war.—Christian Science Monitor.

[85]

Clipping From
ORK, N. Y.
D TRIBUNE
14 1952

MUSIC

The Boston

By VIRGIL THOM

Ernest Ansermet, soloist, Bruchollerie, pianist. The pro-

major No. 4, "Italian," Mendelssohn
New York performance), Honegger
Honegger
D minor No. 3, Rachmaninoff
oreographic Poem, Ravel

nent

ght's concert of the Symphony Orchestra Hall, with Ernest nducting and Monique ollerie as piano soloist, agreeable affair, even one. For the orchestra an ever so fine pre- Ansermet conducted tenment and grace, and French pianist not only h great style but re- eturn a real ovation.

* * *

gram was a tasty one, with Mendelssohn's de- alian" Symphony deli- yed and ending with pely sumptuous "La novelty there was a rthur Honegger called a, new to this city. For he same composer's ap- sixtieth birthday there twenty-eight-year-old 31." For Miss de la le there was Rachmani- rd Piano Concerto, in is accustomed to shine.

* * *

ne she did. Not with a lance, but a crystalline d with the soft light of ry. She has what is a "big technique" but he usual sense, a "big ough in the concerto's she dominated the full without forcing. Perhaps been holding back her that moment. Perhaps ainly even, she is no She is clearly a sophis- chnician and a musical o ordinary kind. To have so great a variety of rs, all of them beautiful, ily scored a composition of musicianship and on all too unusual in s of bang-bang concerto And to have given this ce at no loss to its quality brooding or to its final of will was to clean away red patina of commercial t and reveal the music th. No barnstormer is de la Bruchollerie, though es prodigious effects, but technician of the piano usician of class.

* * *

ger's Monopartita is a rk in five contiguous sec- arkly scored and thickly it is not unlike, as to color, er piece about a Pacific- omotive. But it is the music ture master deeply flowing fect. It sums up Honegger; else could have written it. charming, but it has grandeur, streng The 231," chara still, powe ing. mast one; harm stren dress thele tures seem aday self, near more Perh way neve latel in L it h this M thin righ like inof drea wou as n duc ity lead disc for sou Mus hav me

This Clipping From
ASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FEB 15 1952

emorable Concer

The Boston Symphony Orchest program at Constitution Hall la night was pretty much standard pre ire. But the guest conducti of Ernest Ansermet turned wh been a routine affa inspiring concert.

nothing much to say abo ms variations on a Theme d n, Mendlessohn's "Italia hony, Debussy's "La Mer," the Tschaikowsky-flavored memento of Stravinsky. But works, the great Swiss co brought understanding a Ansermet goes in for no sho ip. His attention is entire bed by the music he is condu With such a fine orchestra nd to his demands, the famili am took on new freshness a The Debussy alone would ha it a memorable evening.

MILTON BERLINER.

Sladko-Herald Feb 15

AUS DER M

Von FRED LOW

Ansermet dirigiert Boston Symphonie

Ernest Ansermet dirigierte das Mittwoch-Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters in der Carnegie Hall; Monique de la Brucholleric wirkte im Rachmaninoff Klavierkonzert Nr. 3 als Solistin mit.

Die junge Künstlerin ist geborene Pariserin; sie kommt aus einer Musikerfamilie, ihre Mutter ist eine Großnichte des Komponisten Boieldieu und selbst eine ausgezeichnete Pianistin, ihr Vater war mit Andre Messager verwandt. Sie studierte mit Isador Philipp und gewann den ersten Preis des "Conservatoire", Paris, sowie bedeutende Wettbewerbe in Brüssel und Wien. Charles Munch dirigierte das "Orchester du Conservatoire" in einem Konzert, in dem Monique de la Brucholleric debütierte; ihr amerikanisches Erstauftreten war mit der Boston Symphonie 1951 im gleichen Werk. Wie Mittwoch abend in der Carnegie Hall.

Die Pianistin spielt mit hervorragender Technik und tiefem Empfinden; ihr Vortrag erweist sowohl ihre musikalischen als auch ihre pianistischen Qualitäten, die es ihr gestatten ein so schwieriges Werk brillant und gesangvoll wiederzugeben. Monique de la Brucholleric ist in ihrem Wesen sehr einfach, im wohltuenden Gegensatz zu mancher ihrer Berufskollegen; ihr Spiel ist temperamentvoll, der Anschlag immer wohlklingend und die Phrasierung läßt das Eindringen in die Gefühlswelt des Komponisten erkennen.

Die junge Pianistin erhielt nach dem Konzert begeisterte Beifallsbezeigungen; wir werden Gelegenheit haben sie in ihrem eigenen Klavierabend Samstag, 23. Februar, nachmittags in der Carnegie Hall wieder zu hören und ihr Können in verschiedenen Werken noch genauer zu beurteilen. — Ernest Asermet eröffnete das Konzert des Boston Symphonie Orchesters mit einer beschwingten Aufführung der "Italienischen" Symphonie von Mendelssohn. Die Geigenpassagen der Fuge im ersten Satz, die staccato Figuren und die Läufe im "Con Moto moderato" waren in der Einheitlichkeit und Transparenz bemerkenswert.

Den Beschluß der ersten Abteilung bildete die amerikanische Erstaufführung der "Monopartita" von Honegger; Ernest Ansermet kündigte ferner in ein paar Worten die Wiedergabe von "Pacific 231" des gleichen Komponisten zur Ehrung seines bevorstehenden 60. Geburtstages (10. März) an. — Feierliche, rhythmisch strenge Bläserakkorde leiten den ersten Satz der Monopartita ein; getragene Streicherpassagen begleiten und führen zu der Durchführung der Themen. Originelle Rhythmen treten im weiteren Verlauf des ersten Satzes hervor und einige melodiöse Themen lassen aufhorchen. Das Werk hat vier kurze Sätze, die den Zusammenhang erkennen lassen; sehnsüchtig klagende Themen wechseln mit den straffen Akkorden der Streicher, später von Bläsern übernommen ab. — Dirigent und Orchester gaben ihr Bestes in der Wiedergabe der interessanten Komposition.

Das anschließend vorgetragene "Pacific 231" ist eines der einfallsreichsten symphonischen Werke Honeggers; es ist eine Komposition, die vom Rhythmus, von der Bewegung lebt und in der Symphonie der Geräusche der Lokomotive realistisch wirkt. Pulsierendes Leben und Straffheit, die aber auch den Humor nicht vergißt geben dem Werk den brillanten Effekt. — Mit einer Aufführung von Ravels "La Valse" wurde das Konzert zum Abschluß gebracht.

Wash. Times-Herald

.D. C.— FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 195

Boston Group Gives Season's Best Concert

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

A virtuoso orchestra under a virtuoso conductor gave the season's finest symphonic performance last night in Constitution Hall.

The orchestra was the Boston Symphony. The conductor was that group's current guest, Ernest Ansermet of Geneva. The qualities which contributed to the superlative excellence of the event all were typically French. The taste that wrought the manifold refinements of tone was entirely Gallic. It was marked by restraint, by freedom from extravagence, by an unfailing sense of beauty, by absolute artistic sincerity.

Not until the end of the concert did the conductor permit himself dramatic breadth and weight of expression; and, to be exact, it was not until the final movement of Debussy's tone-poem, "La Mer," that occasion developed which demanded such a climax.

This Debussy tone-poem, or as he preferred to call the work, "Three Sketches," is an expression such as only could have given voice by the genius that created the impressionistic school. These scenes of sunlight on a calm sea, of playful waves, finally, of the dialogue between the wind and the mounting seas, are marvelous in sound, feeling and movement. They have, too, the quality of suggestion that paints the scene.

"La Mer" is now recognized as a masterpiece of the French repertoire. Fifty years ago, when impressionism was new in the art, it earned the composer much abuse and little praise. The world now accepts Debussy as a classicist, meaning an artist of proved excellence; but that does not mean that the general public has developed complete understanding or appreciation. To many this music is still a mystery that attracts because of its illusions and, to coin a word, its elusions.

Most conductors hesitate to program it. They doubt their own powers, or the responsiveness of their players, or the interest of the public. After Ansermet's success last night, perhaps others will be moved to follow his example.

"La Mer" was prefaced by too many long works. It could have been given a more artfully contrived setting. There should have been only the Mendelssohn A major Symphony, in which Ansermet also wrought marvels of lightness, suavity, and grace. The Brahms Academic Festival Overture and the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," tho a novelty, would not have been missed. Not even Ansermet's skill could make the Brahms score luminous. As for Stravinsky, in this ballet music he borrows so lavishly from Tschaikowsky that not even his wizardy with orchestral color could justify the open plagiarism.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

FEB 13 1952

Composer Honored

Special to The Louisville Times

Boston, Feb. 13.—The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been presented to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto.

The young composer journeyed from Rome where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

Postlude

Washington Post Feb 15 1951

Ansermet Conducts Last of Boston Concerts

By Paul Hume

The Boston Symphony and Ernest Ansermet came to Washington last night for the final Constitution Hall concert in the Boston series.

Ansermet, who has been heard here in the last two years as guest conductor of the National Symphony, is serving in that capacity in Boston while Charles Munch recovers from a lingering affliction.

The program was skillfully balanced between familiar Nineteenth Century fare and great pages, by Stravinsky and Debussy, of the present century. It was in the latter half of the program, devoted to these more recent masters, that orchestra and conductor achieved their greatest degree of sympathy and power.

Stravinsky wrote his ballet, The Fairy's Kiss, with a dedication to "The music of Tschaikowsky." The allegiance to his predecessor is clear throughout the music. Among its greatest charms are the constant references to the moods and sounds of Swan Lake, Sleeping Beauty, and the other attractive moments of Tschaikowsky's theater writing.

Along with these comes the gentle bite of Stravinsky's more mellow style, with alluring pieces that cry out for a stage, an adagio, and a pas de deux. It is a tantalizing score, with moments of beauty, such as the string quartet, solo clarinet and harp, and many more. The playing was of unusual delicacy and flavor.

Debussy's La Mer is music that recalls the Boston orchestra's great days under Koussevitsky. But it also is music for which Ansermet has both the affinity and the genius to bring about a powerful reading of his own design. There was a strong sense of motion in much of the music that is sometimes more relaxed. It was a sea in clouded phases, as well as that clear, sunlit expanse Debussy drew so well. The sound and playing of the orchestra was a tribute to the guest leader for whom the audience had a great welcome.

To Brahms' finest variations, those on a theme by Haydn, Ansermet gave space and beauty. Unrushed, they changed in mood from variation to variation always faithful to the spirit of the music.

The same was true of Mendelssohn's affectionate remembrance of his Italian visit, his fourth symphony. The outer movements had the quick pulse they need, while the inner portions went untroubled on their serene way. The horn passages in the slow movement had a particularly fine effect. We are glad of the chance to hear and observe Ansermet again. He is one of the great orchestral leaders.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

FEB 14 1952

Music

Ansermet's Baton Is No Indian Club

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The podium deportment of Ernest Ansermet is all grace and gentility. It is never anything else, and the absence of the muscular, the acrobatic, in his stick-work causes one to wonder at the writhings and leapings of other conductors which, to tell the truth, gain them far less than he achieves in musical results.

Last night Mr. Ansermet conducted the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall, and a special pleasure of the event was to observe his perfectly unruffled demeanor all through the program, while listening to his astute, wholly urbane and communicative renderings.

Honors Honegger.

The musical material for the occasion consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; the "Monopartita" of Arthur Honegger, a first performance here; the D minor Concerto of Rachmaninoff with the young French pianist, Monique de la Brucholleric, making her local debut in the solo part, and Ravel's "La Valse." Quite unexpectedly, there was an encore—Honegger's "Pacific 231," played in honor of the composer's approaching 60th birthday, as Mr. Ansermet said.

Mme. De la Brucholleric, garbed in a sort of "Maedchen in Uniform" dress of celestial blue, is a pianist of quality. In the performance of the Rachmaninoff she did not, nor did the conductor, give vent to any but the most cultivated feelings. And for once that score was accorded treatment mannerly, yet everywhere expressive and without a hint of the cloying sentimentality to which it so often falls victim.

One of the rendering's particular merits was the total rapport between the interested parties, and it is not extravagant to say that for ensemble work this may yet turn out to be the shining example of the season. The pianist, who is self-assurance in person, put on display a fleet and accurate technique, as well as a whole rainbow of pianistic colors. She was poetic and thunderously dramatic, by turns, though not quite in the fashion of the keyboard's fabulous giants. Anyway, she got a gigantic ovation for her splendid feat.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 13 1951

Pianist Augments Usual Good Program by Boston Orchestra

By JOAN BROOKWELL

French pianist Monique de la Bruchollerie received a tremendous and well deserved ovation last night at her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Playing the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto in D minor, Mme. Bruchollerie exhibited a flawless technique and an astonishingly powerful, yet deft and crisp, touch. She is obviously equipped with plenty of stamina, for the concerto is an exhausting one to play, and the soloist's performance was anything but half-hearted. Despite the vigor of her playing, she is capable of great delicacy of touch and feeling, as expressed particularly in the second movement of the Rachmaninoff work.

Palatable Melody.

Thanks to Mr. Ansermet's surprise encore, we were favored with a pair of Honegger's works born 23 years apart—the "Pacific 231" in 1928, "Monopartita" in 1951. Their styles, needless to say, are also separated by at least that many years. However, their common bonds are palatable melody provocative rhythm and, from beginning to end, versatile invention.

The "Monopartita" drawing from the classic partita of Bach, is compressed into a continuous line of brief sections. The orchestra performed it beautifully. "Pacific 231" seems tame in these days of jet-powered flight or, perhaps, Mr. Ansermet, in a stringent mood of economy, shoveled into the boiler barely enough coal to make the run.

Conductor and orchestra collaborated on a highly polished, elegant account of the "Italian" Symphony, which had opened proceedings, then turning in a vivid, justly paced and attractively phrased version of "La Valse" to close them.

The orchestra itself gave the sort of concert one has grown to expect of the Boston Symphony, one of the performances which have made it such a drawing card in the Rutgers concert series.

Conducted by Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor who is appearing during the illness of Charles Munch, the regular director, the group gave a magnificent performance of the gay and melodic Symphony No. 4 in A major by Mendelssohn. The lively first movement, the strongly melodic second movement, where the theme is carried by the various strings, the purely classical third section, and the almost frenzied dance movement of the fourth make this a favorite choice for any concert, and we've heard no better interpretation of it than that of the Boston Symphony. It is scarcely possible to improve on the perfection which the group has seemingly attained in previous concerts, and yet each year there seems to be something more to applaud.

Play Ravel Work

For its other two works, the orchestra played Ravel's choreographic poem "La Valse," and a new composition, "Monapartita" by Arthur Honegger, which is described in the program as "a succession of short movements presented in a continuous musical narrative."

The latter piece, first performed last June, added variety to the program, although it was not too well received by the audience. It is, however, an interesting work, atonal and sometimes syncopated, rather an unusual choice for the generally conservative orchestra. Forceful and dramatic, it has a feeling of apprehension, a mood of general unhappiness.

The performance of the Ravel work, which closed the program, was a typical one, though almost overpoweringly dramatic.

The concert, presented in the university gymnasium, was the third in this season's series.

This Clipping From
HELENA, MONT.
INDEPENDENT-RECORD

FEB 11 1952

With Other Editors . . .

Cultural War

A great task force is moving out from the United States in May. It is bound for Paris—Paris-in-the-spring. The Boston Symphony orchestra will lay a barrage of 20th-century European and American music. The New York City ballet, having established a toe hold on the alien shores, will let loose a fantastic array of flying misses. Men of letters like William Faulkner and John Dos Passos will infiltrate the surrounding terrain to lecture and preside over forms of discussion.

All this is by way of meeting the great cultural offensive which the Soviet Union has been conducting in Europe in recent years. It will be part of an unusual exposition of the arts to be held under the international Congress for Cultural Freedom, with comparable artistic enterprises and personalities from England, France, Italy, Switzerland and Austria.

The free world is at last on its toes, blowing its own horn, acting its part, painting itself in its true colors, speaking out in the multiple accents of creative independence. The galaxy of plays, operas, concerts, art shows, and forums which will go to make up the exposition should do something to show the resources of "bourgeois cosmopolitanism" in a divided world. Since the American contribution will depend on private philanthropy rather than government subsidy, we trust that alert citizens will be prompt to recognize the potentialities in this constructive sort of war.—Christian Science Monitor.

[85]

...ring From
...ORK, N. Y.
... TRIBUNE
... 14 1952

MUSIC

The Boston ...

By VIRGIL THOM...

... Ernest Ansermet, soloist, ...rucholleric, pianist. The pro...
... major No. 4, "Italian," ... Mendelssohn
... New York performance). ... Honegger
... D minor No. 3..Rachmaninoff
...eographic Poem.....Ravel

...ent
...ght's concert of the ... Symphony Orchestra ... Hall, with Ernest ...nducting and Monique ...llerie as piano soloist, ...greeable affair, even ...one. For the orchestra ... an ever so fine pre... Ansermet conducted ...enment and grace, and ...rench pianist not only ...h great style but re...eturn a real ovation.

...ram was a tasty one, ...with Mendelssohn's de...lian" Symphony deli...ved and ending with ...nely sumptuous "La ... novelty there was a ...rthur Honegger called ..., new to this city. For ...e same composer's ap...ixtieth birthday there ... twenty-eight-year-old ...1." For Miss de la ...e there was Rachmani...rd Piano Concerto, in ...is accustomed to shine.

...e she did. Not with 'a ...ance, but a crystalline ...d with the soft light of ...ry. She has what is ... a "big technique" but ...e usual sense, a "big ...ough in the concerto's ... she dominated the full ...without forcing. Perhaps ... been holding back her ... that moment. Perhaps ...ainly even, she is no ... She is clearly a sophis...chnician and a musical ...o ordinary kind. To have ... so great a variety of ...rs, all of them beautiful. ...vily scored a composition ... of musicianship and ...on all too unusual in ...s of bang-bang concerto ... And to have given this ...e at no loss to its quality ... brooding or to its final ... of will was to clean away ...ed patina of commercial ...t and reveal the music ...th. No barnstormer is ...de la Brucholleric, though ...s prodigious effects, but ... technician of the piano ...usician of class.

...er's Monopartita is a ...rk in five contiguous sec...arkly scored and thickly ... it is not unlike, as to color, ...er piece about a Pacific ...motive. But it is the music ...ure master deeply flowing ...ect. It sums up Honegger; ...else could have written it. ...charming, but it has gran...

This Clipping From
...ASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FEB 15 1952

...emorable Conce...

... Boston Symphony Orchest... ...am at Constitution Hall la... ... was pretty much standard ... ...re. But the guest conducti... ...rnest Ansermet turned wh... ...t have been a routine affa... ...n inspiring concert.

...re's nothing much to say abo... ...ns variations on a Theme ... ...d n, Mendlessohn's "Italia... ...hony, Debussy's "La Mer," ... the Tschaikowsky-flavored ... ...nento of Stravinsky. But ... works, the great Swiss co... ... brought understanding a... ...g.

... Ansermet goes in for no sho... ...nip. His attention is entire... ...ed by the music he is condu... With such a fine orchestra ... ...d to his demands, the famili... ...am took on new freshness a... The Debussy alone would ha... ...it a memorable evening.

MILTON BERLINER.

Feb 15 1952

ston Concerts

those on a theme by Haydn, Ar-sermet gave space and beauty. Unrushed, they changed in mood rooms variation to variation al-ways faithful to the spirit of the music.

The same was true of Men-delssohn's affectionate remem-brance of his Italian visit, his fourth symphony. The outer movements had the quick pulse they need, while the inner por-tions went untroubled on their serene way. The horn passages in the slow movement had a par-ticularly fine effect. We are glad of the chance to hear and ob-serve Ansermet again. He is one of the great orchestral leade

nts Usual Good oston Orchestra

The orchestra itself gave the sort of concert one has grown to expect of the Boston Symphony, one of the performances which have made it such a drawing card in the Rutgers concert series.

Conducted by Ernest Ansermet, Swiss conductor who is appearing during the illness of Charles Munch, the regular director, the group gave a magnificent per-formance of the gay and melodic Symphony No. 4 in A major by Mendelssohn. The lively first movement, the strongly melodic second movement, where the theme is carried by the various strings, the purely classical third section, and the almost frenzied dance movement of the fourth make this a favorite choice for any concert, and we've heard no better interpretation of it than that of the Boston Symphony. It is scarcely possible to improve on the perfection which the group has seemingly attained in pre-vious concerts, and yet each year there seems to be something more to applaud.

Play Ravel Work

For its other two works, the orchestra played Ravel's choreo-graphic poem "La Valse," and a new composition, "Monapartita" by Arthur Honegger, which is de-scribed in the program as "a suc-cession of short movements pre-sented in a continuous musical narrative."

The latter piece, first perform-ed last June, added variety to the program, although it was not too well received by the audience. It is, however, an interesting work, atonal and sometimes syn-copated, rather an unusual choice for the generally conservative or-chestra. Forceful and dramatic, it has a feeling of apprehension, a mood of general unhappiness.

The performance of the Ravel work, which closed the program, was a typical one, though almost overpoweringly dramatic.

The concert, presented in the university gymnasium, was the third in this season's series.

---

out from the United States in May. n-the-spring. The Boston Symphony 20th-century European and American et, having established a toe hold on fantastic array of flying misses. Men and John Dos Passos will infiltrate and preside over forms of discussion. the great cultural offensive which the ng in Europe in recent years. It will of the arts to be held under the Freedom, with comparable artistic England, France, Italy, Switzertoes, blowing its own horn, acting colors, speaking out in the multiple The galaxy of plays, operas, con-will go to make up the exposition resources of "bourgeois cosmo-ce the American contribution will ther than government subsidy, we mpt to recognize the potentialities hristian Science Monitor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

The Bostonians

By VIRGIL THOMSON

Monique de la Bruchollerie

Teddy Piaz, Paris

Piano soloist with the Boston Symphony last night

ament

deur, a wonderful integrity, and strength.

* * *

The locomotive piece "Pacific 231," which followed it, is also characteristic of its author and still, after twenty-eight years, powerful evocative, even entertain-ing. It is the work of a young master, however, not a mature one; and its internal structure, its harmony and scoring reflect more strength of will than seasoned ad-dress. It is a pleasing piece, never-theless and full of bright, pic-turesque ideas. It would possibly seem less dated than it does now-adays if the steam locomotive it-self, the "high iron," were not so nearly a thing of the past, had a more present place in our living. Perhaps Honegger's piece is on its way back to favor; railroading has never really lost its glamour. Twice lately I've heard it (last week also in Louisville, Ky.), and both times it has worked its evocation on this listener.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet's reading of every-thing was clear and wondrously right. His Mendelssohn sounded like Mendelssohn, his Honegger like Honegger and his Rachman-inoff like something one has always dreamed maybe Rachmaninoff would sound like if you treated it as music. I suspect that this con-ductor's most distinguished qual-ity (aside from his great skill as a leader) and the one which is most disconcerting to many is his gift for making different composers sound like different composers. Musicianship, even culture, many have; but that kind of enlighten-ment is rare.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

Memorable Concert

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
FEB 16 1952

Boston's Muddling Through

The Boston Symphony's winter of discontent—caused in large part by the illness (virus infection) of Charles Munch—is edging along. Leonard Bernstein has agreed to shorten his year of rest and com-position in Mexico to conduct 2 weeks during March in Boston and 1 week on tour, following which G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Harvard Glee Club, will do Stra-vinsky's "Oedipus Rex" for a week in Boston. After that it is hoped that Munch will be well enough to do the St. John Passion of Bach during Holy Week and lead the or-chestra for its overseas visit in late April. This year's 6-week season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires will begin July 5.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 15 1952

News of Music

Ansermet Stresses Musicianship In Boston Symphony Concert

By Alice Eversman

The Boston Symphony Orches-tra and its guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet, bid farewell to Washington for the season last night with the concert given in Constitution Hall. A capacity audience welcomed the Swiss con-ductor, who goes next week to take charge of his own orchestra in Geneva, and who leaves many warm admirers gained through his several appearances here in the past. His is a special con-ducting art presenting last night another of its facets.

There has not been such natural orchestral music making in the local hall for some time. Mr. An-sermet directs quietly, with few gestures, and with the idea of musicianship uppermost. No large-scaled excitement entered into the performance, although from some points of view it would have been desirable. The entire breadth of the orchestral sound operated pri-marily with the sheen of the different instrumental voices pene-trating as called for, without stepping too prominently into the limelight.

Yet the program Mr. Ansermet selected called for more imagina-tive treatment in several instances than he exercised. A challenge was offered in the first number, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." with its sharp con-trasts, and more definitely still in Debussy's "La Mer,' with which the program closed.

If the Brahms required greater vigor and spaciousness than was given it, more capriciousness and swiftness at times, "La Mer" needed not only a painter's vision but the particular sympathy with its moods that springs from a love of the sea. Mr. Ansermet directed it straightforwardly without tak-ing advantage of the orchestral palette to conjure forth the lights and shadows of the fantasy of its changing aspects.

Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 4," so filled with the composer's impressions of Italy, was the more rewarding. Mr. Ansermet suc-ceeded in blending charm and en-ergy in the first movement, infus-ing the second with appropriate tenderness, the third with light-ness and delicacy, with only the final movement, or "Saltarello," lacking somewhat exciting pace and buoyancy. Stravinsky's or-chestral suite made from his bal-let, "Le Baiser de la Fee," was given a monotone reading.

The orchestra, playing with fine tone and musical regard for shad-ings, nevertheless did not display much personal enthusiasm. Mr. Ansermet's effects would have come through more pronouncedly had the musicians been more alert and ready to put into their play-ing spirit and elasticity. As it was, a certain apathy prevailed al-while high caliber of musician-ship was always in evidence, the program moved slowly and unex-citingly.

ZANESVILLE, OHIO
NEWS

FEB 17 1952

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orches-tra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Satur-day evenings and Sunday after-noons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French mu-sic and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger con-certs will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Sat-urday evenings and Sunday after-noons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3, Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 17 1952

GRUMIAUX SOLOIST FOR MOZART WORK

Belgian Violinist Makes Local Bow With Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Ernest Ansermet, conductor. Arthur Grumiaux, violinist. Carnegie Hall.
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto in G major.....Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra.....Bartok

By NOEL STRAUS

The concert given by the Bos-ton Symphony Orchestra under Ernest Ansermet yesterday after-noon at Carnegie Hall was the occasion of the New York debut of Arthur Grumiaux. The Belgian violonist had chosen the Mozart Concerto in G major as his vehi-cle, a comparatively simple work of its kind, but nevertheless well calculated to make known many facets of an artist's musical equip-ment.

Listening to this concerto can be a moving experience. But Mr. Grumiaux' performance of it only scratched the surface of its ex-pressive possibilities. The tempi he favored were on the fast side, and this in itself made sufficient plasticity of line difficult of achievement. One felt a want of subtlety of color and also a lack of meaningful dynamic contrasts in this playing, which also could not be said to have arrived at distinc-tion in matters of tone.

The sounds Mr. Grumiaux pro-duced from the strings varied in quality. Too much of the time they took on a reedy, strident character, but there were passages where they became more pleasing, if never exceptional in texture. The violinist adhered well to pitch and his bowing had lightness and elasticity. The fact that he did some of his best playing in the cadenzas might indicate that he could make a better impression in a work of a different stripe.

One of the cadenzas, that of the slow movement, was played with a mute, and at this point Mr. Gru-miaux accomplished his most tell-ing work in an otherwise none too ingratiating performance, in which no attention whatever was paid to proper interpretation of the orna-ments.

The rapid tempi employed in the Mozart were again in evidence in the Second symphony of Beetho-ven. It is true that in his own arrangement of the symphony for piano trio the composer added the words "quasi andante" to the "larghetto" time indication of the second movement. But even though Mr. Ansermet's tempo was practically an allegretto, he lent charm to his reading through his treatment of prismatic tints.

And, although the entire sym-phony was somewhat dry in effect, it had verve and transparency and a sort of classic purity of approach that made it very likable, espe-cially in the extremely virtuosic finale.

Climax in Bartok Concerto

The afternoon, however, reached its climax in the splendid reading granted Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, which that composer wrote for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation that had commissioned it in memory of Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky. This masterly cre-ation, stemming from the year 1943, enjoyed its New York pre-mière in 1945 and has become familiar through repeated hearings since.

The first three of the five move-ments of this singularly lovable opus seem to outlive the last two in interest, and certainly the sec-ond division, entitled "Giuoco delle coppie," is one of the most enticing of modernistic musical inventions.

The whole, however, offers end-less opportunities for the produc-tion of moods and fascinating sonorities. It would be hard to im-agine a more completely satisfying and wonderfully intergrated in-terpretation than that it received yesterday from Mr. Ansermet and his gifted musicians, who appar-ently said the last word possible in regard to this ever welcome composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1952

Boston Symphony

Grumiaux Is Violin Soloist, Ansermet Conducts

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Ernest Ansermet, guest conductor. Soloist, Arthur Grumiaux, violinist. Concert yes-terday afternoon with the following program:
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto in G major, K. 216...Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra.....Bartok

Ernest Ansermet completed the last of his American assignments for the season with his Carnegie Hall appearance yesterday after-noon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. The Swiss con-ductor has rewarded us with un-commonly perceptive and lucid music-making during his engage-ment with the Bostonians. At his final concert it seemed that he and the orchestra were just getting around to establishing the neces-sary rapport for the ultimate finish in readings so delicately balanced and unclouded as his are apt to be. We hope he will be back on its podium before long.

While being the occasion for Mr. Ansermet to say what we trust was just "au revoir," yesterday's con-cert also gave us the opportunity to make a new acquaintenance, that of Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist who comes from abroad with a substantial reputation. As the vehicle through which to intro-duce himself, Mr. Grumiaux chose a work of modest technical de-mands, Mozart's Concerto in G major. Its simple content does, however, leave a performer's musicianship, taste and articula-tion thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Grumiaux' approach was sufficiently forthright and unaf-fected, and he had musicianship enough for the work at hand, though there was nothing special in the way of subtlety to lend more than ordinary interest to his in-terpretation. It was in the handling of simple phrases that he failed to give full emphasis to the notes. The phrase, at times, seemed to slip from under him, to run away from him. The beauty and security of tone and the personal breadth to suspend them were not always present. He made a better im-pression in the cadenzas, notably that of the second movement, where he used a mute and achieved a striking effect of remoteness. Mr. Grumiaux is a well-schooled performer. We shall have further occasion to hear him, and we will then be in a better position to judge him. For yesterday's show-ing, though in many ways laud-able, left me with unresloved, mixed feelings.

Mr. Ansermet's account of Bar-tok's Concerto for Orchestra had a rare degree of perfection. In Beethoven's Second Symphony he delighted us with rapid pacing that made the music breathe and soar. His conception justly favored the eighteenth century affiliations of this relatively early Beethoven work. While there are other ways to approach it, Mr. Ansermet's was so carefully calculated that it suc-ceeded brilliantly, especially where the finale was concerned, which became the climax of the sym-phony. Earlier, there had been a few rough ends in the execution. But it is only because Mr. Anser-met's performances are so re-markably transparent, that the slightest aberration shows up much more than ordinarily when he is at the helm.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

Ansermet Fills In For Ailing Munch

New York. (UP)—Ernest Anser-met, the eminent Swiss conductor, has taken over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suc-ceeding Pierre Monteux as guest conductor.

Ansermet is filling in for Charles Munch, musical director of the or-chestra, who has been forced to take an extended rest. Munch is under medical advice to curtail his activities because of complications which developed after a recent virus infection.

POPS

Europe

Europe

...n Concerts

...ose on a theme by Haydn, Ar... gave space and beauty. ...rushed, they changed in mood ...om variation to variation al... ...ays faithful to the spirit of the ...music.

The same was true of Men... ...delssohn's affectionate remem... ...brance of his Italian visit, his ... symphony. The outer ...ovements had the quick pulse ...they need, while the inner por... ...tions went untroubled on their ...serene way. The horn passages ...in the slow movement had a par... ...ticularly fine effect. We are glad ...of the chance to hear and ob... ...serve Ansermet again. He is one ...of the great orchestral leade...

...nt's Usual Good ...oston Orchestra

The orchestra itself gave the ...ort of concert one has grown to ...expect of the Boston Symphony, ...one of the performances which ...have made it such a drawing card ...at the Rutgers concert series.

Conducted by Ernest Ansermet, ...Swiss conductor who is appearing ...during the illness of Charles ...Munch, the regular director, the ...group gave a magnificent per... ...formance of the gay and melodic ...Symphony No. 4 in A major by ...Mendelssohn. The lively first ...movement, the strongly melodic ...second movement, where the ...theme is carried by the various ...strings, the purely classical third ...section, and the almost frenzied ...dance movement of the fourth—...make this a favorite choice for ...any concert, and we've heard no ...better interpretation of it than ...that of the Boston Symphony. It ...is scarcely possible to improve ...on the perfection which the group ...has seemingly attained in pre... ...vious concerts, and yet each year ...there seems to be something more ...to applaud.

Play Ravel Work

For its other two works, the ...orchestra played Ravel's choreo... ...graphic poem "La Valse," and a ...new composition, "Monapartita" ...by Arthur Honegger, which is de... ...scribed in the program as "a suc... ...cession of short movements pre... ...sented in a continuous musical ...narrative."

The latter piece, first perform... ...last June, added variety to the ...program, although it was not too ...well received by the audience. ...It is, however, an interesting ...work, atonal and sometimes syn... ...copated, rather an unusual choice ...for the generally conservative or... ...chestra. Forceful and dramatic, it ...has a feeling of apprehension, a ...mood of general unhappiness.

The performance of the Ravel ...work, which closed the program, ...was a typical one, though almost ...overpoweringly dramatic.

The concert, presented in the ...University gymnasium, was the ...third in this season's series.

...from the United States in May. ...spring. The Boston Symphony ...century European and American ...having established a toe hold on ...fantastic array of flying misses. Men ...and John Dos Passos will infiltrate ...and preside over forms of discussion. ...great cultural offensive which the ...in Europe in recent years. It will ...the arts to be held under the ...freedom, with comparable artistic ...England, France, Italy, Switzer...

...es, blowing its own horn, acting ...iors, speaking out in the multiple ...The galaxy of plays, operas, con... ...will go to make up the exposition ...resources of "bourgeois cosmo... ...the American contribution will ...her than government subsidy, we ...mpt to recognize the potentialities ...Christian Science Monitor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB

MUSIC

The Bostonians

By VIRGIL THOMSON

...Monument

...ast concert of the ...Symphony Orchestra ...Hall with Ernest ...Comte ...and Monique ...piano soloist. ...affair even ...For the orchestra ...an enormous fine pre... ...Mr. Ansermet conducted ...and grace and ...pianist not only ...style but re... ...a real ovation.

...program was a tasty one. ...Mendelssohn's de... ...Symphonie delu... ...and ending with ...Honegger's "La ...There was a ...Arthur Honegger called ...to this city. For ...the same composer's ap... ...fourth birthday there ...twenty-one-year-old ...No. 231." For Miss de la ...there was Rachmani... ...Third Piano Concerto, in ...she is accustomed to shine.

...and shine she did. Not with a ...brilliance, but a crystalline ...and with the soft light of ...poetry. She has what is ...as a "big technique" but ...in the usual sense, a "big ...though in the concerto's ...she dominated the full ...orchestra without forcing. Perhaps ...had been holding back her ...for that moment. Perhaps ...certainly even, she is no ...under. She is clearly a sophis... ...technician and a musical ...of no ordinary kind. To have ...played so great a variety of ...colors, all of them beautiful, ...so keenly scored a composition ...proof of musicianship and ...imagination all too unusual in ...these days of bang-bang concerto ...playing. And to have given this ...music grace at no loss to its quality ...of dark brooding or to its final ...assertion of will was to clean away ...the accumulated patina of commercial ...sentiment and reveal the music ...underneath. No barnstormer is ...Monique de la Bruchollerie, though ...she makes prodigious effects, but ...a skilled technician of the piano ...and a musician of class.

...Honegger's Monopartita is a ...work in five contiguous sec... ...Darkly scored and thickly ...textured, it is not unlike, as to color, ...an earlier piece about a Pacific ...locomotive. But it is the music ...of a mature master deeply flowing ...and perfect. It sums up Honegger; ...nobody else could have written it. ...In short, whatever you think of it has gran-

Monique de la Bruchollerie

Teddy Piaz, Paris

Piano soloist with the Boston Symphony last night

deur, a wonderful integrity, and strength.

* * *

The locomotive piece "Pacific 231," which followed it, is also characteristic of its author and still, after twenty-eight years, powerful evocative, even entertaining. It is the work of a young master, however, not a mature one; and its internal structure, its harmony and scoring reflect more strength of will than seasoned address. It is a pleasing piece, nevertheless and full of bright, picturesque ideas. It would possibly seem less dated than it does nowadays if the steam locomotive itself, the "high iron," were not so nearly a thing of the past, had a more present place in our living. Perhaps Honegger's piece is on its way back to favor; railroading has never really lost its glamour. Twice lately I've heard it (last week also in Louisville, Ky.), and both times it has worked its evocation on this listener.

* * *

Mr. Ansermet's reading of everything was clear and wondrously right. His Mendelssohn sounded like Mendelssohn, his Honegger like Honegger and his Rachmaninoff like something one has always dreamed maybe Rachmaninoff would sound like if you treated it as music. I suspect that this conductor's most distinguished quality (aside from his great skill as a leader) and the one which is most disconcerting to many is his gift for making different composers sound like different composers. Musicianship, even culture, many have; but that kind of enlightenment is rare.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FE

Memorable Concert

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
FEB 16 1952

Boston's Muddling Through

The Boston Symphony's winter of discontent—caused in large part by the illness (virus infection) of Charles Munch—is edging along. Leonard Bernstein has agreed to interrupt his year of rest and composition in Mexico to conduct 2 weeks during March in Boston and 1 week on tour, following which G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Harvard Glee Club, will do Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" for a week in Boston. After that it is hoped that Munch will be well enough to do the St. John Passion of Bach during Holy Week and lead the orchestra for its overseas visit in late April. This year's 6-week season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires will begin July 5.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 15 1952

News of Music

Ansermet Stresses Musicianship In Boston Symphony Concert

By Alice Eversman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest conductor, Ernest Ansermet, bid farewell to Washington for the season last night with the concert given in Constitution Hall. A capacity audience welcomed the Swiss conductor, who goes next week to take charge of his own orchestra in Geneva, and who leaves many warm admirers gained through his several appearances here in the past. His is a special conducting art presenting last night another of its facets.

There has not been such natural orchestral music making in the local hall for some time. Mr. Ansermet directs quietly, with few gestures, and with the idea of musicianship uppermost. No large-scaled excitement entered into the performance, although from some points of view it would have been desirable. The entire breadth of the orchestral sound operated primarily with the sheen of the different instrumental voices penetrating as called for, without stepping too prominently into the limelight.

Yet the program Mr. Ansermet selected called for more imaginative treatment in several instances than he exercised. A challenge was offered in the first number, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," with its sharp contrasts, and more definitely still in Debussy's "La Mer,' with which the program closed.

If the Brahms required greater vigor and spaciousness than was given it, more capriciousness and swiftness at times, "La Mer" needed not only a painter's vision but the particular sympathy with its moods that springs from a love of the sea. Mr. Ansermet directed it straightforwardly without taking advantage of the orchestral palette to conjure forth the lights and shadows of the fantasy of its changing aspects.

Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 4," so filled with the composer's impressions of Italy, was the more rewarding. Mr. Ansermet succeeded in blending charm and energy in the first movement, infusing the second with appropriate tenderness, the third with lightness and delicacy, with only the final movement, or "Saltarello," lacking somewhat exciting pace and buoyancy. Stravinsky's orchestral suite made from his ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," was given a monotone reading.

The orchestra, playing with fine tone and musical regard for shadings, nevertheless did not display much personal enthusiasm. Mr. Ansermet's effects would have come through more pronouncedly had the musicians been more alert and ready to put into their playing spirit and elasticity. As it was, a certain apathy prevailed and while high caliber of musicianship was always in evidence, the program moved slowly and unexcitingly.

ZANESVILLE, OHIO
NEWS
FEB 17 1952

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3, Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 17 1952

GRUMIAUX SOLOIST FOR MOZART WORK

Belgian Violinist Makes Local Bow With Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Ernest Ansermet, conductor. Arthur Grumiaux, violinist. Carnegie Hall.
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto in G major.....Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra.....Bartok

By NOEL STRAUS

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Ernest Ansermet yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall was the occasion of the New York debut of Arthur Grumiaux. The Belgian violonist had chosen the Mozart Concerto in G major as his vehicle, a comparatively simple work of its kind, but nevertheless well calculated to make known many facets of an artist's musical equipment.

Listening to this concerto can be a moving experience. But Mr. Grumiaux' performance of it only scratched the surface of its expressive possibilities. The tempi he favored were on the fast side, and this in itself made sufficient plasticity of line difficult of achievement. One felt a want of subtlety of color and also a lack of meaningful dynamic contrasts in this playing, which also could not be said to have arrived at distinction in matters of tone.

The sounds Mr. Grumiaux produced from the strings varied in quality. Too much of the time they took on a reedy, strident character, but there were passages where they became more pleasing, if never exceptional in texture. The violinist adhered well to pitch and his bowing had lightness and elasticity. The fact that he did some of his best playing in the cadenzas might indicate that he could make a better impression in a work of a different stripe.

One of the cadenzas, that of the slow movement, was played with a mute, and at this point Mr. Grumiaux accomplished his most telling work in an otherwise none too ingratiating performance, in which no attention whatever was paid to proper interpretation of the ornaments.

The rapid tempi employed in the Mozart were again in evidence in the Second symphony of Beethoven. It is true that in his own arrangement of the symphony for piano trio the composer added the words "quasi andante" to the "larghetto" time indication of the second movement. But even though Mr. Ansermet's tempo was practically an allegretto, he lent charm to his reading through his treatment of prismatic tints.

And, although the entire symphony was somewhat dry in effect, it had verve and transparency and a sort of classic purity of approach that made it very likable, especially in the extremely virtuosic finale.

Climax in Bartok Concerto

The afternoon, however, reached its climax in the splendid reading granted Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, which that composer wrote for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation that had commissioned it in memory of Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky. This masterly creation, stemming from the year 1943, enjoyed its New York première in 1945 and has become familiar through repeated hearings since.

The first three of the five movements of this singularly lovable opus seem to outlive the last two in interest, and certainly the second division, entitled "Giuoco delle coppie," is one of the most enticing of modernistic musical inventions.

The whole, however, offers endless opportunities for the production of moods and fascinating sonorities. It would be hard to imagine a more completely satisfying and wonderfully intergrated interpretation than that it received yesterday from Mr. Ansermet and his gifted musicians, who apparently said the last word possible in regard to this ever welcome composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1952

Boston Symphony

Grumiaux Is Violin Soloist, Ansermet Conducts

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Ernest Ansermet, guest conductor. Soloist, Arthur Grumiaux, violinist. Concert yesterday afternoon with the following program:
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Beethoven
Violin Concerto in G major, K. 216...Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra.....Bartok

Ernest Ansermet completed the last of his American assignments for the season with his Carnegie Hall appearance yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. The Swiss conductor has rewarded us with uncommonly perceptive and lucid music-making during his engagement with the Bostonians. At his final concert it seemed that he and the orchestra were just getting around to establishing the necessary rapport for the ultimate finish in readings so delicately balanced and unclouded as his are apt to be. We hope he will be back on its podium before long.

While being the occasion for Mr. Ansermet to say what we trust was just "au revoir," yesterday's concert also gave us the opportunity to make a new acquaintenance, that of Arthur Grumiaux, Belgian violinist who comes from abroad with a substantial reputation. As the vehicle through which to introduce himself, Mr. Grumiaux chose a work of modest technical demands, Mozart's Concerto in G major. Its simple content does, however, leave a performer's musicianship, taste and articulation thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Grumiaux' approach was sufficiently forthright and unaffected, and he had musicianship enough for the work at hand, though there was nothing special in the way of subtlety to lend more than ordinary interest to his interpretation. It was in the handling of simple phrases that he failed to give full emphasis to the notes. The phrase, at times, seemed to slip from under him, to run away from him. The beauty and security of tone and the personal breadth to suspend them were not always present. He made a better impression in the cadenzas, notably that of the second movement, where he used a mute and achieved a striking effect of remoteness. Mr. Grumiaux is a well-schooled performer. We shall have further occasion to hear him, and we will then be in a better position to judge him. For yesterday's showing, though in many ways laudable, left me with unresloved, mixed feelings.

Mr. Ansermet's account of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra had a rare degree of perfection. In Beethoven's Second Symphony he delighted us with rapid pacing that made the music breathe and soar. His conception justly favored the eighteenth century affiliations of this relatively early Beethoven work. While there are other ways to approach it, Mr. Ansermet's was so carefully calculated that it succeeded brilliantly, especially where the finale was concerned, which became the climax of the symphony. Earlier, there had been a few rough ends in the execution. But it is only because Mr. Ansermet's performances are so remarkably transparent, that the slightest aberration shows up much more than ordinarily when he is at the helm.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

Ansermet Fills In For Ailing Munch

New York. (UP)—Ernest Ansermet, the eminent Swiss conductor, has taken over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Pierre Monteux as guest conductor.

Ansermet is filling in for Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, who has been forced to take an extended rest. Munch is under medical advice to curtail his activities because of complications which developed after a recent virus infection.

[86]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 2 - 1952

IN PERSPECTIVE

Infantry Hall

As an aficionado of South Main Street, I was naturally delighted over Robert Wheeler's articles, "The Story of the Towne Street," and Charlotte Estey's colorful and lively photographs in The Rhode Islander. As one who has spent hours sauntering along this historic and gamey street, I was happy that a record had been made before the wreckers and the builders, the twins of progress, have changed its present face.

But I queried Robert Wheeler: "Why not more attention to Infantry Hall?" and he replied that others had made the same query and that he had been offered considerable information on the one-time Forum or Madison Square Garden of Providence, the victim of fire, and that he contemplated an article devoted solely to Infantry Hall.

* * *

Many of this and the last generation think of South Main Street only in terms of the sprawling, barn-like structure that was a catch-all for large public performances, from the now almost forgotten sport of roller polo to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There may exist a hall less inviting, more uncomfortable, more barren in its barracks-like appearance than Infantry Hall, but these eyes have yet to see it. It was approached from the South Main Street entrance by an Everest flight of stairs or from Benefit Street with a pair of spiked shoes to keep one from headlong falls. The seats were refugees from an undertaker's parlor latched together. After a certain time, when a hard-pressed body had finally to succumb, the audience resembled a field of wheat tossed by the wind as the squirms flowed in rhythm. The lights were glaring and yellow and threw a true egalitarian tone in that, under them, everybody looked alike—that is, terrible. The draughts in cold weather would come sweeping around the ankles as though blown from the North Pole and during the torrid season the heat would store up.

Yet despite its unhappy physical accommodations, thousands, including myself, will always hold it in affection for the memories its very name invokes. It was a center of Providence communal life, appealing one night to the fans who cheered "Jigger" Higgins in his feats on roller skates and on another to the audience that faithfully appeared for Pierre Monteaux or Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra certainly deserves all its fame, for it made Beethoven conquer over the discomforts and distractions of that barn.

One night the orchestra played Honegger's Pacific 231, the really first introduction of Providence (if my memory is correct) to the modernists; and the faithful, with ear attuned to the romantics, acted as though they had wandered into a weave shed. But, as always, they were polite; they applauded; and friend nodded understandingly to friend as though to say that the eccentricity of the conductor was understandable and that this would certainly not happen again.

One night, when I was covering a Chamber of Commerce banquet, I stood in the wings of the hall in the expectation of coppering some manuscripts when one of the most distinguished men I had ever seen, dressed flawlessly in evening clothes, wandered in and spoke to me: "I am Senator Harding," he said. A functionary hurried the principal speaker of the evening and the ill-starred President-to-be away before I could solicit his speech.

On exactly the same spot I stood one morning talking to Congressman Ambrose Kennedy of Woonsocket, dressed in formal day attire, his manuscript of acceptance ready and his mentor, the late Senator Henry F. Lippitt, giving final instructions. Congressman Kennedy never did get around to address that Republican convention; the insurgents overthrew the Old Guard and Harold Gross was nominated for governor. That day was historic in Rhode Island political history: it was the beginning of the end of long years of Republican rule.

One Saturday night I heard Fritz Kreisler fiddle away the ugliness of Infantry Hall, and I remember that night well. I was eating at the horseshoe bar in what is now the Biltmore's Town Room and two men sat opposite me. One rested his violin case on the seat beside him and looked at the menu. His face lighted up in a broad smile and he pointed out an item to his friend. He then pointed it out to the waitress and in a few minutes there was put before Fritz Kreisler a pot of Boston baked beans.

* * *

As great an artist in his way as Kreisler, Roland Hayes or Geraldine Farrar, who had all appeared in Infantry Hall, was Newton D. Baker, a small man with black horned-shelled glasses, who gaped at a spouting local Democratic demagogue as if he were some rare animal. Then Baker started to talk and one felt himself lifted into another world, as the magnificent language clothed by that wonderful voice fell on entranced ears.

It was a wonder that all the beauty and all the greatness that were present during its life did not give Infantry Hall a patina of distinction. The distinction lives vividly in the memory.

G. W. P.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
FEB 3 - 1952

Boston Orchestra To Visit Paris

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra has accepted an invitation from the Congress for Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe, with three Paris concerts in May, during the month-long exposition of the arts. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, has invited Pierre Monteux to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition is a dramatization of efforts of the Congress to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world. The cavalcade, bearing the title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, a program of ballets by Igor Stravinsky, with plans for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson-Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts."

* * *

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
FEB 3 1952

Orchestra for Europe

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 2.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6, during the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
FEB 4 1952

Boston Symphony To Debut in Paris

Boston, Feb. 4 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6, according to an announcement Monday by The American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by The Congress for Cultural Freedom, whose theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past fifty years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The congress' affiliate in this country is The American Committee for Cultural Freedom of which Sidney Hook is chairman. The exposition committee of this group, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing funds from private philanthropy to send the 104-member musical aggregation abroad. Other American participants in the Paris exposition will be the New York City Ballet Co. and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH
FEB 4 - 1952

Berkshire Music Center To Enroll Amateurs

Westchester's musical amateurs will be interested to know that the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will open a new department this Summer for group study for amateurs who play or sing a little. In order to enable as many people as possible to take advantage of this opportunity, the school will accept enrollments for two week periods this year, so that people with vacations of this duration, may enjoy the benefits of planned group musical activity. Ingolf Dahl, of the University of Southern California, will head the new department.

Another innovation this Summer will be that the school orchestra will be made up entirely of scholarship students, who will be selected on the basis of their qualification to become part of the group, and how much they are needed to fill it out.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
FEB 4 - 1952

AND HAVE YOU HEARD

By BETTY REILLY

Though we were thrilled, as usual, to spend our Friday-off attending the Boston symphony, perhaps our most interested moments came while we were reading of the Boston symphony's forthcoming tour of Europe...It is a marvelous compliment to Boston that her orchestra has been chosen by the Congress of Cultural Freedom to represent American musical accomplishment ... Such a tour has been dreamed of for 72 years, so surely 1952 will be remembered as a stellar year, both in the history of the orchestra and in the artistic annals of a re-awakening Europe...

Twenty-one days will be spent on the continent and in England during which time 14 concerts will be given... The orchestra sails on the Ile de France the morning of April 28, the vessel having kindly arranged its schedule to accommodate the tour... Happily, too, Charles Munch is expected to be fully recovered and to conduct the series...The first concert on foreign soil is planned for May 6 at the Paris Opera house...

On May 8 Pierre Monteux will conduct and will make history by presenting Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" at the Champs Elysees theater almost 39 years after he gave the important work its first performance at that theater...On that evening a riot was caused by the new music...

On May 10 and 11 the orchestra will visit Holland and play in the Hague and in Amsterdam...Perhaps after that American soldiers in Germany will be entertained ...But definitely planned are a Belgium performance and a concert on May 17 in Strasbourg, Munch's home town ...Southern Europe and a return to Paris are in process of being arranged on the itinerary...

To conclude, the symphony will make its London debut on May 26 and will probably sail for home on May 27, arriving in time to do the final month of the Pops under the baton of Arthur Fiedler...We are confident that Boston's wonderful orchestra, second to none in Europe's mind, will do much to cement European and American unity... How very fortunate New Englanders are to have such an orchestra within an hour or so...Noted appreciating each moment t past Friday were Mrs. Fr Qua, Mrs. George Boyc S. Marden...

We were ... to receive ... for a ...

...Quite an honor for a freshman!

Paint and Powder members are really concentrating on having a wonderful show this year and have already started to get those gams in shape...Each Thursday evening quite a group gathers at the YWCA and under the tutelage of Betty Armington, recreational director, are taking a series of limbering-up sessions...Be sure to see how well they've learned their fancy stepping by being on hand for the gala evenings when the show is presented the last of March.

Our best wishes to charming Frances (Brunelle) Hogan, popular instructor at St. John's hospital school of nursing, on the birth of her daughter...So nice to hear from Mrs. Bevan Dunsford and the board of directors of the Lowell Girls club...Our good wishes to the new group of postulants who are beginning their religious lives at the Marist house on Chestnut street...

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 7 1952

Boston Symphony Set for Paris Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House on May 6 at the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The exposition's theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms. Other American participants in the Paris event will be the New York City Ballet Company and conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

In addition to its performances for the exposition, the Boston orchestra will make as comprehensive a tour of European cities as its crowded schedule will permit, between the conclusion of its 71st symphony season in Boston on April 26 and the opening of its annual "Pops" Concerts there on June 1.

[87]

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 7 - 1952

Guest Conductors Boston Symphony

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in Havana, Cuba, [illegible] improved health after his recent illness. He will shortly return to Boston and expects then to lead the concerts for the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York February 16, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will lead the concerts of the week following after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last four of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's St. John Passion on Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26 and on April 28, he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on it first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress For Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicholas Nabokov, its secretary general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, for six weeks beginning July 5.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees of the Orchestra, has sent the following letter to M. Ansermet:

"When this orchestra in the course of a season suddenly found itself without Mr. Munch, it was in a serious predicament. I do not know what we would have done if, hearing of our conductor's illness, you had not generously given up your winter plans and come to us in Boston. Your visit has been a personal pleasure and your series of concerts a rare experience for us all."

All of Tanglewood Faculty Will Return Next Season

Charles Munch, director of the Berkshire Music Center, has invited the heads of all departments of the school during the 1951 season to return for the coming season and they have accepted, according to a report given the Tanglewood Advisory Committee yesterday noon. George E. Judd, Boston Symphony Orchestra manager, told the local committee, meeting at the Pittsfield Country Club, that details of the Tanglewood season will be announced after he has conferred with Mr. Munch and Pierre Monteux, former Boston Orchestra conductor, who will lead it in two concerts in the first and second weeks of the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Judd will fly to Cuba Feb. 18 to discuss plans for the summer season and European tour, on which Mr. Monteux will accompany the orchestra as guest conductor. The two conductors are vacationing in Havana, where Mr. Munch is convalescing from an illness that followed a virus infection.

On the Ile de France, 110 persons and 13,270 pounds of luggage will cross the Atlantic, Mr. Judd said. The personnel will include 104 musicians (103 men and one woman harpist), the two conductors; Mr. Judd; Thomas D. Perry Jr., assistant orchestra manager; Leslie J. Rogers, librarian; and a baggage man. The orchestra will play 15 concerts in 21 days, or an average of two every three days.

Start in Paris

Starting in Paris in May, they will play in Amsterdam and The Hague, Holland; Brussels; three concerts in Germany, including one for the armed forces; Strasbourg, Turin, Lyons, Paris again, Lille and London. Sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the Paris concerts will be an important part of the month-long exposition it will hold in that city to represent the accomplishments of the Western democracies in the arts in the past half-century. Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra May 6 in the Paris Opera House and Mr. Monteux will conduct May 8 Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Le Theatre des Champs Elysees, where he led its premiere 39 years ago for an audience who hissed the strange music. It is expected that Mr. Stravinsky will be present.

In other cities, typical Boston Symphony programs of classical and modern music will be played. The return trip will be made from Southampton May 28, also on the Ile de France. Among the invitations that cannot be accepted is one from Iceland.

The Boston Pops season will be of the usual length, and not curtailed because of the European trip, as originally seemed necessary. "By taking advantage of the services of fine players living in the Boston area, whose seasons with other orchestras end in March or April," Mr. Judd said, "the Pops season will go on as usual, but with four nights a week of the same program, until June 3, when the full personnel will return to play different programs every night until the Esplanade concerts start the last Sunday in June." Formal announcement of the Pops plan was made in Boston yesterday by Arthur Fiedler, the conductor.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
[illegible] 1952

BEST IN MUSIC

New England Cities Get Live Performances of Symphony Orchestras

BOSTON (INS)—Full length live performances of symphonic works are scheduled for broadcasts [illegible] a new Boston radio station.

Through the facilities of WBMS, power [illegible] for educational programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are within the range of an estimated 200 [illegible] families.

The station, which has [illegible] in Symphony Hall, [illegible] the advice and cooperation of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

The council's members include the Lowell Institute and [illegible] colleges and universities of Greater Boston — Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern and Tufts.

The station's aim is to offer programs of general education for adult groups in the community.

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
FEB 9 - 1952

Tanglewood Festival Be Cast in Same ...ern as in Past

1952 Berkshire Symphonic ... at Tanglewood, according ... announced today, will ... the same pattern as ... past years.

Charles Munch, conductor ... Boston Symphony orches... that again there will be ... festival concerts in ... shed on three succes... day and Saturday even... Sunday afternoons, sta... 24. These will be prec... concerts by small orc... choral groups in the t... cert hall on three su... Saturday evenings and ... afternoons, starting Ju... works of Bach, Mozart, ... and early French music ... ye in the small conc... Munch will conduct tw... free concerts in each o... shed series. Pierre ... appearing at Tangle... the first time, will co... concert each in Series A ... Leonard Bernstein ... one in the final seri... Berkshire Music cent... for advanced studen... music, will open fo... season on June 30 and ... multaneously with the ... concert, Mr. Munch ... the school.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 9 - 1952

...NCH TO HEAD ...SIC CENTER ...HIS SUMMER

Conductor Recoverin... Illness; Also Will Con... duct 12 Concerts

... Feb. 9 (U.P.)—Music Direct... Munch of the Boston Sy... orchestra has agreed to ... tor of the Berkshire Mu... at Tanglewood in Lenox ne... and will conduct 12 concer... announced today.

... is recuperating in Cuba fro... illness. He will resume h... ...p of the orchestra ne...

...glewood, Munch will condu... ...oncerts in the theater-conce... ... smaller auditorium, on Ju... 13, 19 and 20.

...o will conduct six of the ni... ... in the Music Shed on Ju... ...7 and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 7,...

... Monteux, making his fi... ...ce at Tanglewood, will co... ... of the Music Shed conce... ...of the first two weeks. ...Leo... ...stein will conduct one of t... ...ek's three concerts.

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
FEB 9 - 1952

...glewood Festiva... ...e Cast in Same ...tern as in Past

1952 Berkshire Sympho... ...l at Tanglewood, accor... ...ns announced today, wi... ...h the same pattern as ... ...ent past years.

...rles Munch, conductor ... Boston Symphony orche... ...hat again there will be ... festival concerts in ... shed on three succes... day and Saturday even... Sunday afternoons, sta... 24. These will be prec... concerts by small orc... choral groups in the t... cert hall on three su... Saturday evenings and ... afternoons, starting Ju... works of Bach, Mozart, ... and early French music ... ye in the small conc... Munch will conduct tw... free concerts in each o... shed series. Pierre ... appearing at Tangle... the first time, will co... concert each in Series A ... Leonard Bernstein ... one in the final seri... Berkshire Music cent... for advanced studen... music, will open fo... season on June 30 and ... multaneously with the ... concert, Mr. Munch ... the school.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 7 - 1952

est Conductors
ston Symphony

rles Munch, Music Director of oston Symphony Orchestra, is n Havana, Cuba, in greatly im-health after his recent illness, ll shortly return to Boston and s then to lead the concerts for mainder of the season.

r a week's tour ending in New February 16, Ernest Ansermet as been conducting the concerts
s orchestra since mid-Decemll return to his own orchestra neva, Switzerland. Richard Bure associate conductor, will take ncerts of the week following which Leonard Bernstein, who en wintering in Mexico, will guest conductor for two weeks ton and the last tour of the allace Woodworth will present sky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 22 with the Harvard and Rad-Choruses of which he is the tor, and Mr. Munch will con-Bach's St. John Passion in Week, according to plan.

Munch will bring the Boston to a close on April 26 and on 8, he will accompany the or-as it sails on it first trip to for a tour under the auspices Congress For Cultural Freerranged by Nicholas Nabokov, retary general. The Berkshire
l will be given at Tanglewood, ng July 5.

y B. Cabot, president of the of Trustees of the Orchestra,
it the following letter to Mr.
et:

n this orchestra in the cour e season suddenly found itself
Mr. Munch, it was in a sedicament. I do not know what uld have done if, hearing of nductor's illness, you had no-sly given up your winter nd come to us in Boston. You ve been a personal pleasur ur series of concerts a rare ex e for us all."

Faculty
Season

hance. Among the invita-t cannot be accepted i Iceland.
ston Pops season will b
ual length, and not curcause of the European originally seemed necesy taking advantage of es of fine players living ston area, whose seasons
r orchestras end in March
Mr. Judd said, "the Pops ll go on as usual, but r nights a week of the gram, until June 3, when personnel will return to ferent programs every ll the Esplanade concerts last Sunday in June."
nnouncement of the Pops made in Boston yester-
Arthur Fiedler, the con-

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
FEB 7 - 1952

BEST IN MUSIC

Englanders Get Live Perform-es Of Symphony Orchestras

(INS)—Full length live ances of one of the world's symphony orchestras are be-channeled into the homes of Englanders by a new Boston station.
ough the facilities of noncommercial FM station ducational broadcasting of the Boston Symphony Or-ra are within the reach e of an estimated 200,000

e station, which has its studios mphony Hall, is operated with dvice and co-operation of the ll Institute Co-operative Broad-ng Council.
e council's members include Lowell Institute and the six es and universities of Greater on — Boston College, Boston
rsity, Harvard, Massachusetts tute of Technology, Northeast-nd Tufts.
station's aim is to offer pros of general education for all s in the community.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

Hon[illegible] Award Given
To [illegible] Composer

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MUNCH TO HEAD MUSIC CENTER THIS SUMMER

[illegible] Conductor Recovering From Illness; Also Will Conduct 12 Concerts

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 10 1952

Munch to Direct At Tanglewood

Boston—(UP)—Music Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood next Summer, it was announced today.

Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness. He will resume his leadership of the orchestra next month.

At Tanglewood, Munch will conduct six concerts in the theater-concert hall, the smaller auditorium, on July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20.

He also will conduct six of the nine concerts in the Music Shed on July 24, 26, 27 and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10.

Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert in each of the first two weeks. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the final week's three concerts.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Tanglewood Gets Munch, Monteux and Bernstein

Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux and Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., according to plans announced yesterday. As usual, there will be six concerts in the smaller of Tanglewood's two auditoriums, the Theater-Concert Hall, on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20, and nine concerts in the large Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 24, 26, 27, 31; Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10. Mr. Munch will also be the director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Munch will conduct the concerts in the smaller hall, devoting his programs to early French music and works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. He will also conduct three concerts each week in the large hall. Mr. Monteux, who [illegible] seventeen years' service as San Francisco Symphony's principal conductor this spring, will conduct one concert in each of the first two weeks in the music shed, and Mr. Bernstein will conduct one, two concerts in the final week. Hugh Ross will train the festival chorus for concerts in both halls. Choral works announced include Honegger's "Dance of Death" and Berlioz' Requiem."

Mr. Munch, now recuperating in Cuba from the illness which has kept him inactive since November, is due to resume his duties as the Boston Symphony's regular conductor next month.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MUNCH ANNOUNCES TANGLEWOOD PLANS

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, yesterday announced his plans for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. As in previous years, concerts will be given in the Theatre-Concert Hall and in the Music Shed.

Those in the hall will be heard Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13 and 19-20. Mr. Munch, for these programs, will draw upon early French music, Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

In the Music Shed, Series A will be offered on July 24, 26 and 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; and Series C on Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each series. Pierre Monteux, who will make his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in series A and B, and Leonard Bernstein will lead a single concert the final week.

Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include performances of Honegger's "Dance of Death" and the Berlioz Requiem. The conductor also will head the Berkshire Music Center. The session of the latter, its tenth, will run from June 30 through August 10.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 10 1952

BERNSTEIN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Munch to Return Soon to Complete Season

Boston, Feb. 9—Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is now in Havana, Cuba, in much improved health after his recent illness, will shortly return to Boston and conduct some concerts during the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York on the 16th, Ernest Ansermet who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid December will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

European Tour

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's "St. John Passion" in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26, and on April 28 he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicolas Nabokov, its secretary general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, for six weeks beginning July 5.

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his second piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November. The Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award", was established in 1946 as an annual prize for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10).

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 10 1952

Tanglewood Concert Conductors Listed

Boston, Feb. 9. (UP)—Music Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct 12 concerts at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox next Summer, it was announced today.

Munch will conduct six concerts in the theater-concert hall on July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20 and six of the nine concerts in the music shed on July 24, 26, 27 and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10.

Pierre Monteaux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood will conduct one of the music shed concerts in each of the first two weeks. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the final week's three concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 10 1952

MUNCH ACCEPTS POST

Boston Symphony Conductor to Direct Berkshire Music Center

Boston—(UP)—Music director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced yesterday.

Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness. He will resume his leadership of the orchestra next month.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 10 1952

Metropolitan Opera, Theatre and Music, All in a Mixed Grill

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Sunday piece today is a mixed grill—Metropolitan Opera, some aspects of the theatre (or show business, if you prefer the word), and music miscellaneously considered. Let's begin with the coming Spring visit—the 18th, reckoning from 1934 when the New York organization resumed diplomatic relations with Boston after a long interim—of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

As duly published last Friday, and re-printed elsewhere in this section this morning, the Metropolitan will be with us from April 21 to 27 at the Boston Opera House, giving nine performances in seven days. The repertory is neither the richest nor the most imaginative that could be imagined, but it will do. Choosing repertory for the road tour is always a difficult selection at best, and at the present time it is complicated by the fact that certain operas are still retired, awaiting future new productions.

The singers have not yet been announced, and that aspect of the engagement must await comment when we know just which of the expensive larynxes we shall hear. Let us hope that Mr. Bing finds a way of bringing some of the recent importations.

But why, Oh why, are we [illegible] to have the Met's big smash hit of the season, the new production of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," directed by Alfred Lunt? That is one we surely ought to see and hear.

New Productions

The big news of next April's "opera week," therefore, centers about the new productions of "Aida," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." To go at it backwards, the "Heavenly Twins" as the short verismo operas of Mascagni and Leoncavallo are sometimes called, received their new Metropolitan settings and re-staging last season but Boston did not draw them at that time.

In New York these new productions of two of the most popular among standard operas aroused sharp controversy. The settings reportedly were of today, the direction equally against them. That surely is a sign of vitality, and we shall be able to decide for ourselves.

"Aida" has been completely done over, and I gathered from the Manhattan reviews that the style is definitely contemporary. One feature that seemed to arouse feeling, as it has been related, was that the Nile scene now is represented as down by the docks. That sounds like a peculiar place for royalty and a ranking general to gather after dark, but you never can tell about those Egyptians and Ethiopians.

"Carmen" likewise has been accorded a full treatment in staging and settings, with perhaps the most noteworthy alteration the shifting of part of the third act to Escamillo's dressing room in the bull-fighting amphitheatre at Seville. Here again, we shall see what we shall see.

Please, Gentlemen

These next few paragraphs are a plea addressed to those gentlemen who control our theatrical fortunes through the power they exercise as booking agents for the attractions that come to Boston. The point is that we are either at the extremes of feast or famine.

This season has seen Monday evenings with several simultaneous openings, and some with nothing at all. For example, on Jan. 28 we had "The Autumn Garden," Emlyn Williams in his Dickens show, and "The Merry Widow" all opening the same night. The week before there had been no new attraction here.

If Boston as a road city could be booked more evenly, all concerned would benefit. Now it is no easy matter to plan what play goes to what theatre on what date, but it does seem as if improvement could be made. Simultaneous openings make it difficult for the total theatre-going public, for the reviewers who would like to cover all the new shows, and upon space for reviews. In New York in these times there is almost never a night when more than one new attraction opens, and New York has a much bigger theatre-going public than a city like Boston. If, each week during the season we could be sure of one opening, or if when there have to be more they could be assigned to successive evenings, the situation would be eased. There would be less of a strain upon the public's entertainment budget, and we would have steady theatre right through the season. Please, gentlemen.

Thanks to Ansermet

When it became evident last Fall that Charles Munch would be several months recovering from his illness, the management and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were [illegible] problem. They had to find an interim conductor of suitable stature, one whose commitments would allow him to come for a more or less indefinite stay, and whose conducting style would not radically alter the course of the season.

They found an admirable musician in Ernest Ansermet, who graciously agreed to interrupt his work upon a book, leave Switzerland and come to Boston. All considered, the choice could not have been better, and the local symphony public are in Mr. Ansermet's debt.

A highly skilled conductor, of taste and a certain elegance, Mr. Ansermet has a personal approach which in its technical standards and quality of temperament is just what was sought. That he is not so exciting an interpreter as Mr. Munch is a fact of secondary importance. What counts most is that he has given us programs of the sort which are desired here, and mostly he has prepared them beautifully. The traditions and the standards of the Boston Symphony have been maintained. Now, as Mr. Ansermet takes his leave, we are bound to salute with gratitude a gentleman and a musical scholar.

The Morning Musicales

The Boston Morning Musicales, given in the Hotel Statler ballroom to benefit the Boston School of Occupational Therapy, will enter their 25th season next November. All other considerations aside, that is a long time for a continuous concert operation. But the enormous success of the Musicales makes this anniversary one of importance. The concerts always have been sold out, and a waiting list of new subscribers has existed.

Musically speaking, these concerts have for the most part represented top quality. Many of the artists are of the first rank, and those of lesser capacity have been in a minority. That bespeaks good selection. The list for 1952-53 is characteristic.

But I think it is logical and not querulous to point out that the conservative policy which governs these series makes for sameness year in and out. There could be more interesting new blood, and rather more imaginative programs. Why not an ensemble, like a string quartet, occasionally? Or a joint concert, instead of the evidently inflexible rule of only one soloist at a time?

I am speaking as an outsider, however, and none of the responsibility for the success of the Morning Musicales weights my shoulders. Good fortune to them, anyway!

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

ERNEST ANSERMET.
Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony program in Constitution Hall Thursday. Mr. Ansermet returns to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland, the following week.

Boston Symphony With Ansermet to Appear Thursday

Ernest Ansermet, eminent Swiss conductor, who took over the music directorship of the Boston Symphony during Charles Munch's convalescence from an attack of virus pneumonia, will conduct the orchestra in its third and final concert this season, Thursday night at 8:30 in Constitution Hall.

Since Ansermet's first American appearance in 1915, when he toured the country as conductor of the Diaghileff Ballet Russe, he has made lengthy tours in South America and founded the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in his native country. During the war, he conducted concerts over the Swiss Radio Berne.

This winter, the conductor took some time to work on a book he is writing. He says it is not memoires but a "theoretical book on music which could be called, perhaps, a philosophy of music."

NEW YORK
NEW

Munch to Tanglewood

Boston, Feb. 9 (U.P.)—[illegible] Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood next Summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced today. Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness.

POPS
[illegible]

Europe

Europe

WORCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 7 · 1952

est Conductors ton Symphony

ler Munch, Music Director of oston Symphony Orchestra, is Hayana, Cuba, greatly improved health after his recent illness, shortly return to Boston and then to lead the concerts for mainder of the season.

a week's tour ending in New ebruary 16, Ernest Ansermet as been conducting the concerts orchestra since mid-December return to his own orchestra eva, Switzerland. Richard Burassociate conductor, will take ncerts of the week following, hich Leonard Bernstein, who en wintering in Mexico, will guest conductor for two weeks on and the last tour of the allace Woodworth will present sky's "Oedipus Rex" on March 22 with the Harvard and Radchoruses of which he is the tor, and Mr. Munch will conach's St. John Passion in eek, according to plan.

Munch will bring the Boston to a close on April 26 and on 8, he will accompany the orras it sails on it first trip to for a tour under the auspices Congress For Cultural Freeranged by Nicholas Nabokov, retary general. The Berkshire will be given at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, for six weeks ng July 5.

B. Cabot, president of the of Trustees of the Orchestra, nt the following letter to Mr. tor:

n this orchestra in the course eason suddenly found itself Mr. Munch, it was in a sedicament. I do not know what uld have done if, hearing of nductor's illness, you had not ady given up your winter nd come to us in Boston. You as been a personal pleasure r series of concerts a rare ex for us all."

Faculty Season

Eagle 2-7-52

ance. Among the invitat cannot be accepted is Iceland.

ston Pops season will be ual length, and not curcause of the European originally seemed necesby taking advantage of es of fine players living ston area, whose seasons r orchestras end in March Mr. Judd said, "the Pops ll go on as usual, but nights a week of the ram, until June 3, when personnel will return to ferent programs every the Esplanade concerts last Sunday in June." nnouncement of the Pops made in Boston yesterArthur Fiedler, the con-

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
FEB 7 · 1952

BEST IN MUSIC

Englanders Get Live Performes Of Symphony Orchestras

(INS)—Full length live nances of one of the world's symphony orchestras are bechanneled into the homes of Englanders by a new Boston station.

ough the facilities of a high- noncommercial F. M. station ducational broadcasting, pros of the Boston Symphony Orra are within the hearing of an estimated 208,000 famie station, which has its studios mphony Hall, is operated with dvice and co-operation of the ll Institute Co-operative Broadg Council.

e council's members include owell Institute and the six es and universities of Greater — Boston College, Boston ity, Harvard, Massachusetts te of Technology, Northeastnd Tufts.

station's aim is to offer proof general education for all in the community.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

Horblit Award Given To Young Composer

By The Times Herald

The Mark for 1951 has been Foss for his Sec- certo. The young ...d from Rome, ...ing under a ...olarship to in- ... Boston Sym- ... No- ...

Award ... Boston Symphony ... ...

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 7 - 1952

...est Conductors ...ston Symphony

...arles Munch, Music Director of ...Boston Symphony Orchestra, is ...in Havana, Cuba, in health im... ...d health after his recent illness, ...ill shortly return to Boston and ...ts then to lead the concerts for ...emainder of the season.

...er a week's tour ending in New ...February 16, Ernest Ansermet ...has been conducting the concerts ...is orchestra since mid-Decem... ...will return to his own orchestra ...neva, Switzerland. Richard Bur... ...he associate conductor, will take ...oncerts of the week following ...which Leonard Bernstein, who ...been wintering in Mexico, will ...e guest conductor for two weeks ...ston and the last tour of the ...n.

...Wallace Woodworth will present ...nsky's "Oedipus Rex" on March ...d 23 with the Harvard and Rad... ...Choruses of which he is the ...ctor, and Mr. Munch will con... ...Bach's St. John Passion in ...Week, according to plan.

...Munch will bring the Boston ...to a close on April 26 and on ...28, he will accompany the or... ...as it sails on it first trip to ...e for a tour under the auspices ...Congress For Cultural Free... ...arranged by Nicholas Nabokov, ...retary general. The Berkshire ...l will be given at Tanglewood, ...Massachusetts, for six weeks ...ing July 5.

...y B. Cabot, president of the ...of Trustees of the Orchestra, ...nt the following letter to Mr. ...net:

...n this orchestra in the course ...season suddenly found itself ...t Mr. Munch, it was in a se... ...edicament. I do not know what ...uld have done if, hearing of ...nductor's illness, you had not ...ously given up your winter ...and come to us in Boston. You ...e been a personal pleasure ...ur series of concerts a rare ex... ...e for us all."

Faculty ... Season

...ance. Among the invita... ...t cannot be accepted is ...Iceland.

...ston Pops season will be ...ual length, and not cur... ...cause of the European ...riginally seemed neces... ...y taking advantage of ...es of fine players living ...ston area, whose seasons ...r orchestras end in March ...Mr. Judd said, "the Pops ...ll go on as usual, but ... nights a week of the ...gram, until June 3, when ...personnel will return to ...ferent programs every ...f the Esplanade concerts ... last Sunday in June."

...nnouncement of the Pops ... made in Boston yester... ...Arthur Fiedler, the con...

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
FEB 7 - 1952

BEST IN MUSIC

...nglanders Get Live Perform... Of Symphony Orchestras

...(INS)—Full length live ...ances of one of the world's ...symphony orchestras are be... ...nanneled into the homes of ...Englanders by a new Boston ...station.

...ough the facilities of a non... ...noncommercial F. M. station ...ucational broadcasting, pro... ...of the Boston Symphony Or... ...are within the hearing ...of an estimated 208,000 ...

...station, which has its studios ...mphony Hall, is operated with ...vice and co-operation of the ... Institute Co-operative Broad... ... Council.

...council's members include ...owell Institute and the six ... and universities of Greater ... — Boston College, Boston ...ity, Harvard, Massachusetts ...te of Technology, Northeast... ...d Tufts.

...tation's aim is to offer pro... ...of general education for all ...in the community.

INFO... OBSCURED

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

...Horn" Award Given To Young Composer

...

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MUNCH TO HEAD MUSIC CENTER THIS SUMMER

Boston Conductor Recovering From Illness; Also Will Conduct 12 Concerts

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

Tanglewood Festival To Be Cast in Same Pattern as in Past

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 9 1952

Munch to Direct At Tanglewood

Boston—(UP)—Music Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced today.

Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness. He will resume his leadership of the orchestra next month.

At Tanglewood, Munch will conduct all six concerts in the theater-concert hall, the smaller auditorium, on July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20.

He also will conduct six of the nine concerts in the Music Shed on July 24, 26, 27 and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10.

Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one of the music shed concerts in each of the first two weeks. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the final week's three concerts.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Tanglewood Gets Munch, Monteux and Bernstein

Charles Munch, Pierre Monteux and Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., according to plans announced yesterday. As usual, there will be six concerts in the smaller of Tanglewood's two auditoriums, the Theater-Concert Hall, on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20, and nine concerts in the large Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 24, 26, 27, 31; Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10. Mr. Munch will also be the director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Munch will conduct the concerts in the smaller hall, devoting his programs to early French music and works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. He will also conduct two concerts each week in the Music Shed hall. Mr. Monteux, who has seventeen years' service as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony's summer conductor this spring, will conduct one concert in each of the first two weeks in the music shed, and Mr. Bernstein will conduct one, a concert in the final week. Hugh Ross will train the festival chorus for concerts in both halls. Choral works announced include Honegger's "Dance of Death" and Berlioz' "Requiem."

Mr. Munch, now recuperating in Havana from the illness which has kept him inactive since November, expects to resume his duties as the Boston Symphony's regular conductor next month.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MUNCH ANNOUNCES TANGLEWOOD PLANS

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, yesterday announced his plans for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. As in previous years, concerts will be given in the Theatre-Concert Hall and in the Music Shed.

Those in the hall will be heard Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13 and 19-20. Mr. Munch, for these programs, will draw upon early French music, Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

In the Music Shed, Series A will be offered on July 24, 26 and 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; and Series C on Aug. 7, 9 and 10.

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each series. Pierre Monteux, who will make his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in series A and B, and Leonard Bernstein will lead a single concert the final week.

Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include performances of Honegger's "Dance of Death" and the Berlioz Requiem. The conductor also will head the Berkshire Music Center. The session of the latter, its tenth, will run from June 30 through August 10.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 10 1952

BERNSTEIN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Munch to Return Soon to Complete Season

Boston, Feb. 9—Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is now in Havana, Cuba, in much improved health after his recent illness, will shortly return to Boston and conduct some concerts during the remainder of the season.

After a week's tour ending in New York on the 16th, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the concerts of this orchestra since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will take the concerts of the week following, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be the guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and the last tour of the season.

European Tour

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses of which he is the conductor, and Mr. Munch will conduct Bach's "St. John Passion" in Holy Week, according to plan.

Mr. Munch will bring the Boston season to a close on April 26, and on April 28 he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, arranged by Nicolas Nabokov, its secretary general. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, for six weeks beginning July 5.

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his second piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November. The Horblit award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestral Merit Award", was established in 1946 as an annual prize for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10).

PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
FEB 10 1952

Tanglewood Concert Conductors Listed

Boston, Feb. 9. (UP)—Music Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct 12 concerts at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox next Summer, it was announced today.

Munch will conduct six concerts in the theater-concert hall on July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20 and six of the nine concerts in the music shed on July 24, 26, 27 and 31 and Aug. 2, 3, 7, 9 and 10.

Pierre Monteaux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood will conduct one of the music shed concerts in each of the first two weeks. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the final week's three concerts.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 10 1952

MUNCH ACCEPTS POST

Boston Symphony Conductor to Direct Berkshire Music Center

Boston—(UP)—Music director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced yesterday.

Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness. He will resume his leadership of the orchestra next month.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 10 1952

Metropolitan Opera, Theatre and Music, All in a Mixed Grill

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Sunday piece today is a mixed grill—Metropolitan Opera, some aspects of the theatre (or show business, if you prefer the word), and music miscellaneously considered. Let's begin with the coming Spring visit—the 18th, reckoning from 1934 when the New York organization resumed diplomatic relations with Boston after a long interim—of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

As duly published last Friday, and re-printed elsewhere in this section this morning, the Metropolitan will be with us from April 21 to 27 at the Boston Opera House, giving nine performances in seven days. The repertory is neither the richest nor the most imaginative that could be imagined, but it will do. Choosing repertory for the road tour is always a difficult selection at best, and at the present time it is complicated by the fact that certain operas are still retired, awaiting future new productions.

The singers have not yet been announced, and that aspect of the engagement must await comment when we know just which of the expensive larynxes we shall hear. Let us hope that Mr. Bing finds a way of bringing some of the recent importations.

But why, O why, are we [illegible] to have the Met's big smash hit of the season, the new production of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," directed by Alfred Lunt? That is one we surely ought to see and hear.

New Productions

The big news of next April's "opera week," therefore, centers about the new productions of "Aida," "Carmen," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." To go at it backwards, the "Heavenly Twins" as the short verismo operas of Mascagni and Leoncavallo are sometimes called, received their new Metropolitan settings and restaging last season, but Boston did not draw them at that time.

In New York these new productions of two of the most popular among standard operas aroused sharp controversy. The settings reportedly were of today, the direction was described as an extension of old-fashioned tradition. At any rate, some people were enthusiastically for the change, others equally against them. That surely is a sign of vitality, and we shall be able to decide for ourselves.

"Aida" has been completely done over, and I gathered from the Manhattan reviews that the style is definitely contemporary. One feature that seemed to arouse feeling, as it has been related, was that the Nile scene now is represented as down by the docks. That sounds like a peculiar place for royalty and a ranking general to gather after dark, but you never can tell about those Egyptians and Ethiopians.

"Carmen" likewise has been accorded a full treatment in staging and settings, with perhaps the most noteworthy alteration the shifting of part of the third act to Escamillo's dressing room in the bull-fighting amphitheatre at Seville. Here again, we shall see what we shall see.

Please, Gentlemen

These next few paragraphs are a plea addressed to those gentlemen who control our theatrical fortunes, through the power they exercise as booking agents for the attractions that come to Boston. The point is that we are either at the extremes of feast or famine.

This season has seen Monday evenings with several simultaneous openings, and some with nothing at all. For example, on Jan. 28 we had "The Autumn Garden," Emlyn Williams in his Dickens show, and "The Merry Widow" all opening the same night. The week before there had been no new attraction here.

If Boston as a road city could be booked more evenly, all concerned would benefit. Now it is no easy matter to plan what play goes to what theatre on what date, but it does seem as if improvement could be made. Simultaneous openings make it difficult for the total theatre-going public, for the reviewers who would like to cover all the new shows, and upon space for reviews.

In New York in these times there is almost never a night when more than one new attraction opens, and New York has a much bigger theatre-going public than a city like Boston. If, each week during the season, we could be sure of one opening, or if when there have to be more they could be assigned to successive evenings, the situation would be eased. There would be less of a strain upon the public's entertainment budget, and we would have steady theatre right through the season. Please, gentlemen.

Thanks to Ansermet

When it became evident last Fall that Charles Munch would be several months recovering from his illness, the management and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were [illegible] problem. They had to find an interim conductor of suitable stature, one whose commitments would allow him to come for a more or less indefinite stay, and whose conducting style would not radically alter the course of the season.

They found an admirable musician in Ernest Ansermet, who graciously agreed to interrupt his work upon a book, leave Switzerland and come to Boston. All considered, the choice could not have been better, and the local symphony public are in Mr. Ansermet's debt.

A highly skilled conductor, of taste and a certain elegance, Mr. Ansermet has a personal approach which in its technical standards and quality of temperament is just what was sought. That he is not so exciting an interpreter as Mr. Munch is a fact of secondary importance. What counts most is that he has given us programs of the sort which are desired here, and mostly he has prepared them beautifully. The traditions and the standards of the Boston Symphony have been maintained. Now, as Mr. Ansermet takes his leave, we are bound to salute with gratitude a gentleman and a musical scholar.

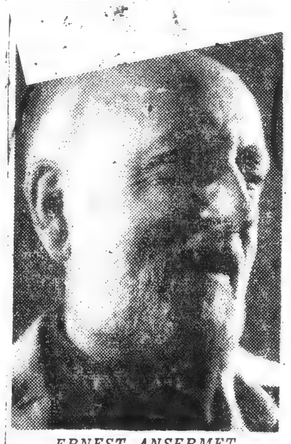
The Morning Musicales

The Boston Morning Musicales, given in the Hotel Statler ballroom to benefit the Boston School of Occupational Therapy, will enter their 25th season next November. All other considerations aside, that is a long time for a continuous concert operation. But the enormous success of the Musicales makes this anniversary one of importance. The concerts always have been sold out, and a waiting list of new subscribers has existed.

Musically speaking, these concerts have for the most part represented top quality. Many of the artists are of the first rank, and those of lesser capacity have been in a minority. That bespeaks good selection. The list for 1952-53 is characteristic.

But I think it is logical and not querulous to point out that the conservative policy which governs these series makes for sameness year in and out. There could be more interesting new blood, and rather more imaginative programs. Why not an ensemble, like a string quartet, occasionally? Or a joint concert, instead of the evidently inflexible rule of only one soloist at a time?

I am speaking as an outsider, however, and none of the responsibility for the success of the Morning Musicales weights my shoulders. Good fortune to them, anyway!



ERNEST ANSERMET.
Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony program in Constitution Hall Thursday. Mr. Ansermet returns to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland, the following week.

Boston Symphony With Ansermet to Appear Thursday

Ernest Ansermet, eminent Swiss conductor, who took over the music directorship of the Boston Symphony during Charles Munch's convalescence from an attack of virus pneumonia, will conduct the orchestra in its third and final concert this season, Thursday night at 8:30 in Constitution Hall.

Since Ansermet's first American appearance in 1915, when he toured the country as conductor of the Diaghileff Ballet Russe, he has made lengthy tours in South America and founded the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in his native country. During the war, he conducted concerts over the Swiss Radio Berne.

This winter, the conductor took some time to work on a book he is writing. He says it is not memoires but a "theoretical book on music which could be called, perhaps, a philosophy of music."

NEW YORK
NEW

Munch to Tanglewood

Boston, Feb. 9 (U.P.) Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has agreed to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood next Summer and will conduct 12 concerts, it was announced today. Munch is recuperating in Cuba from a recent illness.

POPS
Europe
Europe

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 10 1952

On the Aisle
by Claudia Cassidy

ANY EXCUSE is welcome if it gets you to Paris in the spring, but even in the depths of winter the Paris Exposition would look enticing. Dubbed "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," and sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, the exposition runs from April 28 thru June 1, and has by way of American participation the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, the New York City Ballet, the Hall Johnson choir, and performances conducted by Bruno Walter and Igor Stravinsky, who like Monteux and Munch are American by mutual adoption.

This will be the Boston's orchestra's first visit to Europe, tho it was long Serge Koussevitzky's most ardent dream to take it there. The Boston season ends Saturday night, April 26, and the orchestra sails April 28 on the Ile de France, which has moved up its sailing date to expedite matters. Munch, who is recovering from a long illness, conducts the opening concert May 6 in the Opera house, with President Vincent Auriol and the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. On May 8 Monteux conducts a concert including "Sacre du Printemps" in the Theater des Champs-Elysees where the ballet premiere under his direction stirred up a riot 39 years ago. The orchestra also appears in the Hague, Strasbourg [Munch's birthplace], western Germany, Brussels, Turin, Milan, and Lille, then goes to London's new Festival hall, and sails home May 27.

Other Orchestras Scheduled

...refuse to be lured from Paris in the spring will find ...tras in festival residence—John Barbirol- ...lia orchestra of Rome, L'Orches- ...rmet conducting, Joseph ...orchestra, the Paris

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
FEB 12 1952

Berkshire Festival Plans Outlined By Charles Munch

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death", and Berlioz' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-August 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
HAVRE, MONT.
NEWS
FEB 19 1952

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK—
CULTURAL WAR

A great task force is moving out from the United States in May. It is bound for Paris—Paris-in-the-spring. The Boston Symphony orchestra will lay a barrage of 20th-century European and American music. The New York City ballet, having established a toe hold on the alien shores, will let loose a fantastic array of flying misses. Men of letters like William Faulkner and John Dos Passos will infiltrate the surrounding terrain to lecture and preside over forms of discussion.

All this is by way of meeting the great cultural offensive which the Soviet Union has been conducting in Europe in recent years. It will be part of an unusual exposition of the arts to be held under the international Congress for Cultural Freedom, with comparable artistic enterprises and personalities from England, France, Italy, Switzerland and Austria.

The free world is at last on its toes, blowing its own horn, acting its part, painting itself in its true colors, speaking out in the multiple accents of creative independence. The galaxy of plays, operas, concerts, art shows, and forums which will go to make up the exposition should do something to show the resources of "bourgeois cosmopolitanism" in a divided world. Since the American contribution will depend on private philantrophy rather than government subsidy, we trust that alert citizens will be prompt to recognize the potentialities in this constructive sort of war.—Christian Science Monitor.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
FEB 12 1952

Golden Opportunity

Edward W. Barret, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, has pointed out that last year the Soviet Union sent abroad 39,000 scientists, writers, musicians and the like to demonstrate Russia's superior cultural activities. These envoys, while they represent not the ideas of free artists but the ideas of the Kremlin, still have made their propaganda felt.

Our own contribution to the cultural offensive has been negligible, principally because the State Department concluded that a government-subsidized program to compete on the Russian lines was unwise and less in keeping with American tradition than a voluntary one.

Such a program has now been effected by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, the American affiliate of the Congress of Cultural Freedom, a world-wide organization conceived by intellectuals to refute Red propaganda as to the decadence of free world art. The organization is sponsoring this summer an unusual exposition of the arts, to be held in Paris—a cultural cavalcade of the best in symphony, opera, concert, ballet and the plastic arts. The extent of the effort will depend on the extent of private contribution. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House and play during the month of the exposition. Julius Fleischmann of this city heads the exposition committee which is providing funds from private philanthropy to send the unit abroad. Other participants in the Paris Exposition will be the New York City Ballet Company, Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

Of these efforts little is known hereabouts. That their direction and intent is laudable and vital cannot be disputed.

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
FEB 12 1952

Berkshire Festival Plans Are Announced

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks; series A on July 24, 26, 27; series B on July 31, August 2, 3; series C on August 7, 9, 10.

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's Dance of Death and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30 to August 10 will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 11 1952

BERNSTEIN IN MEXICO

Tampico, Mexico — (AP) — Leonard Bernstein, composer and director, arrived here yesterday en route to New York. Bernstein, who has been working in Cuernavaca, said he is returning to Boston via New York to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and that later in the year he will write music for a new Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
FEB 11 1952

Berkshire Festival Plans Announced By Charles Munch

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces that the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2-3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10.).

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death" and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus, and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-Aug. 10, will be the tenth and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

Charles Munch Announces Berkshire Festival Plans

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-August 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

Charles Munch Announces Berkshire Festival Plans

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-August 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
FEB 15 1952

Moving Bosto... Orchestra Is...

Boston, Feb. 15.—Perh... of the Boston Sympho... llowing next Thursday n... Symphony Hall will be... will become a beehive o... move the huge basses, fr... ission instruments to... ese capable men don't ... Not one!—Each artist... case or trunk. For no... ay in precisely the sam...

ethods Vary

The methods of putting ... truments have as many v... ns as the music made on t... tra bows and rosin, ... ings and sometimes even ... evening clothes, will all go... huge cases that hold ... ing bases. The tympanist ... his favorite sticks, ran... m the fuzziest felt to woo... aded sticks (demanded in ... n scores by Richard Str... d other moderns) and the ... the "battery" (percussion ...) have enough instrumen... a good-sized store up in ... ss. The cases for these are ... levably compact.

In a matter of minutes, ... ursday morning, the h... nks and cases will be ca... wn the long stairway to ... lting van at the stage doo... g box of miscellaneous ex... th a few music racks, ch... d an assortment of oddm... ly to be needed in emerge... o will be loaded before ... takes off for Portland ... ll, 110 miles distant, for ... thur Fiedler — Boston "P... chestra Concert that even... e concert is being sponsore... Portland Kiwanis Club ... benefit of its Underprivil... ild Fund.

All smaller instruments ... g since gone with their own... re for leaving them betw... ncerts in their fire-proof lo... In Symphony Hall, not ... these artists would trust ... trument out of his sight. T... all heavily insured.

vel In Full Dress

Any time after four o'cl... ly commuters at the No... ation will see these arti... rly or in groups, make t... r in full evening dress to ... iting Pine Tree Limited. It ... 15 years since the Bos... mphony has played in Portl... most always they travel sou... rd or westward from Bos... d South Station commuters ... customed to seeing men in ... g dress going through the ... n en route to Providence, R... Worcester, Mass., to play ... evening concert.

At Union Station, special bu... waiting to take them dire... City Hall to unpack and ... for the concert, as they'll ... en on the train.. Their con... Arthur Fiedler, will have ... Portland several hours alre... ring come on an earlier tr...

ferent Setup

At the hall the stage will alr... e been set up in the fam... ops" arrangement, which ... from the regular Sympho... ll arrangement in that the ... violins are at the conduc... nt. In the symphony seaso... violins are massed at the ... ctor's left. Harvey Gene... sidered by many to be ... er orchestral stage-manag... Country, will have see... t. He knows every big co...

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 15 1952

(Photo by Fabian Bachrach)
CHARD BURGIN, ...
...ductor of Boston Sympho...
...will conduct ...
...concerts next week.

[89]

...ON, CONN.
...52

...es Munch Announces ...hire Festival Plans

...les Munch, Music Director ... Boston Symphony Orches- ...nounces his plans for the ...re Festival at Tanglewood, ...Mass. He is now in Ha- ...o recuperate from his re- ...ness, and will resume his ...ship of the Boston concerts ...onth.

...Berkshire Festival will con- ...six concerts in the smaller ...ium, the Theatre-Concert ...n Saturday evenings and ... afternoons, July 5-6, 12- ...20. Charles Munch will ... and will draw his pro- ...rom early French music ...the works of Bach, Mo- ...d Schubert. Choral works ... and the larger concerts ... prepared by Hugh Ross, ...of the Festival Chorus.

...oncerts in the Music Shed ...iven on Thursday and ... evenings and Sunday ...ons for three weeks (Ser- ...n July 24, 26, 27; Series ...ly 31, August 2, 3; Series ...ugust 7, 9, 10).

... Munch will conduct ...erts in each week, while ...onteux, making his first ...ce at Tanglewood, will ...ne concert each in Ser- ...s A and B; Leonard Bernstein ...duct one concert in the ...eek. Choral projects an- ... by Mr. Munch will in- ...Honegger's "Dance of ...and Berlioz' Requiem, for ...and Orchestra with four ...entary brass choirs.

...Munch has accepted the ...n of the Orchestra's ... to serve as Director of ...Berkshire Music Center, the ...of music maintained by ...ton Symphony Orchestra ...glewood. The 1952 ses- ...30-August 10, will be ...h, and will be marked by ... new features which are ...nounced shortly.

...LLERTON, N.Y.
...WS
...14/52

...es Munch Announces ...shire Festival Plans

...rles Munch, Music Director ... Boston Symphony Orches- ...nounces his plans for the ...ire Festival at Tanglewood, ...Mass. He is now in Ha- ...o recuperate from his re- ...ness, and will resume his ...ship of the Boston concerts ...onth.

...Berkshire Festival will con- ...six concerts in the smaller ...ium, the Theatre-Concert ...on Saturday evenings and ...y afternoons, July 5-6, 12- ...20. Charles Munch will ... and will draw his pro- ... from early French music ...om the works of Bach, Mo- ...nd Schubert. Choral works ...is and the larger concerts ...e prepared by Hugh Ross, ... of the Festival Chorus.

... concerts in the Music Shed ...e given on Thursday and ...day evenings and Sunday ...oons for three weeks (Ser- ...on July 24, 26, 27; Series ...July 31, August 2, 3; Series ...August 7, 9, 10).

...rles Munch will conduct ...oncerts in each week, while ... Monteux, making his first ...rance at Tanglewood, will ...ot one concert each in Ser- ...s A and B; Leonard Bernstein ...conduct one concert in the ...week. Choral projects an- ...ed by Mr. Munch will in- ... Honegger's "Dance of ..." and Berlioz' Requiem, for ...s and Orchestra with four ...mentary brass choirs.

... Munch has accepted the ...tion of the Orchestra's ...ep to serve as Director of ...Berkshire Music Center, the ...of music maintained by ...oston Symphony Orchestra ...anglewood. The 1952 ses- ...June 30-August 10, will be ...rth, and will be marked by ... new features which are ...announced shortly.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Moving Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Precision Job

Boston, Feb. 15. Before ... minutes after the conduc- ... of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lays down his baton ... Tuesday morning's rehearsal, the great stage ... Hall will be empty of musicians. Immediately ... a peep of activity a ... corps of skilled men ... cellos, tuba, tympani and per- ... waiting cases backstage. But ... does not pack a single instrument.

... puts his own instrument away in ... artists ever pack instruments ... fashion.

Methods Vary

... the manner in which the various ... make on them. ... extra ... often suits ... all to put ... hold the ... The ... has ... changing ... wooden- ... and ... men ... play- ... to ... a good deal more on music ... The ... and the men ... a number of minutes next ... heavy ... will be carried ... and ... will be carried ... the ... stage door. A ... of ... extras, ... chairs ... of ornament- ... to be needed in emergencies ... will be loaded before the ... leaves for Portland City ... for the ... Pops ... evening. ... opened by ... Club for ... record

... Hall ... concert ... Boston ... Symphony ... Hall, not one ... his ... of his sight. They ... all beautifully insured.

Travel In Full Dress

... time after four o'clock, ... commuters at the North ... will see their artists, ... or in evening, make their ... in full evening dress to the ... Pine Tree Limited. It will ... 15 years since the Boston ... has played in Portland. ... always ... ra of contribu- ... and from Boston, ... communities are ... to see the men in eve- ... dress ... through the sta- ... en route to Providence, R. I., ... Worcester, Mass., to play in ... evening concert.

... Union Station, special buses ... waiting to take form directly ... City Hall to unpack and tune ... for the concert, as they'll have ... on the train. Their conduc- ... Arthur Fiedler, will have been ... Portland several hours already ... came on an earlier train.

Different Setup

... the stage will already ... been set up in the familiar ... arrangement, which dif- ... from the regular Symphony ... arrangement in that the se- ... at the conductor's ... symphony season al- ... are massed at the con- ... Harp, Concert ... to be ... at the ... corner.

... Hall ... Boston ... Symphony ... Hall, not one ... his ... of his sight. They ... all beautifully insured.

Travel In Full Dress

... time after four o'clock, ... commuters at the North ... will see their artists, ... or in evening, make their ... in full evening dress to the ... Pine Tree Limited. It will ... 15 years since the Boston ... has played in Portland. ... always ... ra of contribu- ... and from Boston, ... communities are ... to see the men in eve- ... dress ... through the sta- ... en route to Providence, R. I., ... Worcester, Mass., to play in ... evening concert.

... Union Station, special buses ... waiting to take form directly ... City Hall to unpack and tune ... for the concert, as they'll have ... on the train. Their conduc- ... Arthur Fiedler, will have been ... Portland several hours already ... came on an earlier train.

Different Setup

... the stage will already ... been set up in the familiar ... arrangement, which dif- ... from the regular Symphony ... arrangement in that the se- ... at the conductor's ... symphony season al- ... are massed at the con- ... Harp, Concert ... to be ... at the ... corner.

... Hall ... concert

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Moving Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Precision Job

Boston, Feb. 15.—Perhaps ten minutes after the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lays down his baton following next Thursday morning's rehearsal, the great stage of Symphony Hall will be empty of musicians. Immediately it will become a beehive of activity as a corps of skilled men remove the huge basses, fragile 'cellos, tuba, tympani and percussion instruments to their waiting cases backstage. But these capable men don't pack a single instrument.

Not one!—Each artist puts his own instrument away in its case or crate. For no two artists ever pack instruments exactly precisely the same fashion.

Methods Vary

The methods of putting away instruments have as many variations as the music made on them. Extra reeds and rosin, extra strings and sometimes even suits of clothes, will all go into the cases that hold the string bass. The timpanist has all his favorite sticks, ranging from the tiniest felt to wooden-headed sticks demanded in certain scores by Richard Strauss and other moderns, and the men of the battery" percussion play-ers have enough instruments to open a good-sized store up in business. The cases for these are unbelievably compact.

In a matter of minutes next Thursday morning, the heavy trunks and cases will be carried down the long stairway to the waiting van at the stage door. A long box of miscellaneous extras and a few music racks, chairs, and an assortment of odiments likely to be needed in emergencies also will be loaded before the van takes off for Portland City Hall, 110 miles distant, for the Arthur Fiedler—Boston "Pops" Orchestra Concert that evening. The concert is being sponsored by the Portland Kiwanis Club for the benefit of its Underprivileged Child Fund.

All smaller instruments have long since gone with their owners. Save for leaving them between concerts in their fire-proof lockers in Symphony Hall, not one of these artists would trust his instrument out of his sight. They are all heavily insured.

Travel In Full Dress

Any time after four o'clock, each commuters at the North Station will see these artists, singly or in groups, make their way in full evening dress to the waiting Pine Tree Limited. It will be 15 years since the Boston Symphony has played in Portland. Almost always they travel southward or westward from Boston, and South Station commuters are accustomed to seeing men in evening dress going through the station en route to Providence, R. I., or Worcester, Mass., to play in an evening concert.

At Union Station, special busses are waiting to take them directly to City Hall to unpack and tune up for the concert, as they'll have eaten on the train. Their conductor Arthur Fiedler, will have been in Portland several hours already, having come on an earlier train.

Different Setup

At the hall the stage will already have been set up in the familiar "Pops" arrangement, which differs from the regular Symphony Hall arrangement in that the second violins are at the conductor's right. In the symphony season all the violins are massed at the conductor's left. Harvey Genereux, considered by many to be the best professional stage-manager of any Concert will have seen to that. He knows every big concert hall stage in America and will soon have a chance to become familiar with European stages too, since the orchestra goes abroad in April to remain until June, giving concerts sponsored by the U. S. Government and philanthropic agencies representing our American culture. Genereux will have come to Portland with the instruments and have had a local crew busy since about 4.30 o'clock. Genereux has his hobby, too. He's a woodworker of no mean talent. In Maine we call it whittling. But it helps fill the long hours during concerts and it has its results! He made all of the late Dr. Koussevitzky's batons at such times and always kept a few made up ahead, as they sometimes got broken! Spare "sticks" are always carried in the "extra" box along with other emergency equipment.

The big black concert grand will be in its niche at the side of the stage, ready to be rolled out when Leo Litwin performs the Rhapsody In Blue. That will have been brought from Boston in the van, too. The magically mysterious sound of instruments tuning up will filter through the auditorium.

Stick To Schedule

In two hours the concert will be over, the instruments repacked and on their way back to Boston's Symphony Hall for the Friday afternoon concert. And they will be back right on schedule! Perchance some friends will come backstage after the Friday afternoon concert to talk with the artists and perhaps Ludwig Juht, a mountain of a man, just the kind of man who should play the huge string bass, will point to his instrument and say "See that bass? Last night I played that bass in Maine!" Such is the affection in which our state is held by great artists from all over the world.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 15 1952

Postlude

Ansermet Conducts Last of Boston Concerts

By Paul Hume

The Boston Symphony and Ernest Ansermet came to Washington last night for the final Constitution Hall concert in the Boston series.

Ansermet, who has been heard here in the last two years as guest conductor of the National Symphony, is serving in that capacity in Boston while Charles Munch recovers from a lingering affliction.

The program was skillfully balanced between familiar Nineteenth Century fare and great pages, by Stravinsky and Debussy, of the present century. It was in the latter half of the program, devoted to these more recent masters, that orchestra and conductor achieved their greatest degree of sympathy and power.

Stravinsky wrote his ballet, The Fairy's Kiss, with a dedication to "The music of Tschaikowsky." The allegiance to his predecessor is clear throughout the music. Among its greatest charms are the constant references to the moods and sounds of Swan Lake, Sleeping Beauty, and the other attractive moments of Tschaikowsky's theater writing.

Along with these comes the gentle bite of Stravinsky's more mellow style, with alluring pieces that cry out for a stage, an adagio, and a pas de deux. It is a tantalizing score, with moments of beauty, such as the string quartet, solo clarinet and harp, and many more. The playing was of unusual delicacy and flavor.

Debussy's La Mer is music that recalls the Boston orchestra's great days under Koussevitsky. But it also is music for which Ansermet has both the affinity and the genius to bring about a powerful reading of his own design. There was a strong sense of motion in much of the music that is sometimes more relaxed. It was a sea in clouded phases, as well as that clear, sunlit expanse Debussy drew so well. The sound and playing of the orchestra was a tribute to the guest leader for whom the audience had a great welcome.

To Brahms' finest variations, those on a theme by Haydn, Ansermet gave space and beauty. Unrushed, they changed in mood from variation to variation always faithful to the spirit of the music.

The same was true of Mendelssohn's affectionate remembrance of his Italian visit, his fourth symphony. The outer movements had the quick pulse they need, while the inner portions went untroubled on their serene way. The horn passages in the slow movement had a particularly fine effect. We are glad of the chance to hear and observe Ansermet again. He is one of the great orchestral leaders

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of Boston Symphony, who will conduct the orchestra in its concerts next week.

MUSIC

SANDERS THEATER

Vaughan Williams Concert

At Sanders Theater, Harvard University, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, conducted by G. Wallace Woodworth and assisted by the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, Russell Stanger, conductor, presented the following concert of music by Ralph Vaughan Williams in honor of his eighthieth year. The selections were as follows:

Darest Thou Now, O Soul (1925)
Lord, Thou Hast Been Our Refuge (1921)
British Folk Songs Arranged for Chorus From "Folk Songs of the Four Seasons (1950)
Early In the Spring
The Lark in the Morning
John Barleycorn
The Unquiet Grave
An Acre of Land
The Turtle Dove (1919)
Solo: James M. Harkless
Ca' the Yowes (1922)
Solo: James M. Harkless
Just As the Tide Was Flowing (1913)
Serenade to Music (1938), written fot the Jubilee of Sir Henry Wood Soloists: Dorothy Redman, Julie Unverferth, Dorothy Barnhouse, Oscar M. Henry, Gordon Philip, Edmund P. Allison, J. Vernon Patrick
Fantasia on the Old 104th Psalm Tune (1950)
For Pianoforte Solo accompanied by chorus and orchestra
Solo pianoforte: Richard Sugg

By ELINOR HUGHES

One of these days someone ought to write an ode in praise of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and their most excellent conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. After last evening's concert in Sanders Theater, I think it should be Ralph Vaughan Williams, to whose energy and ability time sets no limits, for this concert was devoted entirely to the choral works of this fine English composer, from 1913 to 1950, and a really notable occasion it turned out to be. The chorus sang with the freshness, the proficiency and the intelligence that we expect of them, the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra and the assorted pianists rendered excellent service, and the roof of Sanders Theater is probably still echoing with the very genuine and hearty applause of the capacity audience.

If the loveliest work on the evening's program was the "Serenade To Music," written in 1938 for the Jubilee of Sir Henry Wood, the most ambitious was certainly the Fantasia on the Old 104th Psalm Tune for piano accompanied by chorus and orchestra. True, the pianist, Richard Sogg, seemed definitely outnumbered by the triumphant massed voices of the singers and the orchestra, but he went at it manfully as the chorus made a joyful noise unto the Lord. Obviously, Vaughan Williams loves writing resounding choral music, and if, in his 78th year, he can turn out so lusty a work, more power to him.

The "Serenade to Music" uses for its text some of the most exquisite passages from Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice" beginning "How Sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank," and ending "Peace, ho—the moon sleeps with Endymion and would not be awakened!" Text and music were exquisitely blended, solo voices and chorus were harmoniously arranged and re-enforced by the orchestra. So far as I know, this composition, like most of the others on the program, has never bee iheard here before—the loss has certainly been ours.

The composer's delightful arrangements of a group of English folk songs, for male and female voices alone or combined, were admirably presented in the first half of the program, with a sense of morning freshness and sweenness about them that was irresistible. William's setting for a Walt Whitman poem, Darest Thou, O Soul; and Lord, Thous Has Been Our Refuge, a stirring motet for double chorus combining the text of Psalm 90 with the hlmn, O God, our help in ages past, were the opening selections. It was an evening of high quality on all counts.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
FEB 16 1952

Berkshire Music Festival Plans Announced

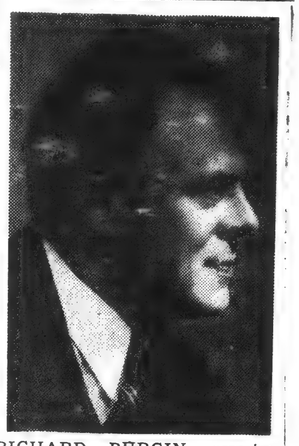
CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, he will resume leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, The Theater-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks—Series A on July 24-27; Series B on July 31-Aug. 3; Series C on Aug. 7-10. Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B, and Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

Choral projects, prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus, include Honegger's "Dance of Death" and the Berlioz Requiem, the latter for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, the tenth, June 30-Aug. 10, will be marked by several new features to be announced shortly.



RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will direct the concerts next week on Tuesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

MUSIC

Harvard and Radcliffe Honor Vaughan Williams

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society last night did honor to Ralph Vaughan Williams, who will be 80 years old next Oct. 12. This was also the annual joint concert of the two choruses in Sanders Theatre, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting.

A full evening of Vaughan Williams—or, at least, the choral side of him—is bound to be more of a ceremonial than a musically varied evening. He has been recognized these many years as an estimable composer, an English musician with his roots in English folk music, a most fastidious craftsman in whom ugliness does not exist. But also, truth to tell, the choral Vaughan Williams is pretty much on the sweet side.

Within this limitation, however, one of the most beautiful of modern choral works must be his Serenade to Music, written for the jubilee of Sir Henry Wood in 1938. Here is a skilled and imaginative work, blending voices—massed and solo—with small orchestra.

I think Vaughan Williams would have been enormously pleased had he been on hand to hear the sensitive, fluent performance these forces gave it. Such was consistently true, however, whether it was this work, the piano-accompanied British Folksongs (1950) for women's voices, or "The Turtle Dove" (1919) and "Ca' the Yowes" (1922), for smaller groups — and with fine execution of the lyrical tenor solos by James M. Harkless.

The program ended with the Fantasia on the Old 104th Psalm Tune (1950), which carries the curious designation: "for piano solo accompanied by chorus and orchestra." This is a form of rhapsody, with the piano most prominent, all in a broad, neo-Romantic vein, and very pleasant.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra assisted. The program began with "Darest Thou Now, O Soul" (1925) and "Lord, Thou Hast Been Our Refuge" (1921).

Harvard-Radcliffe

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ralph Vaughan Williams, dean of English composers, will be 80 in October and last evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society took note of that fact by devoting an entire program to his music. The conductor of the combined choirs, G. Wallace Woodworth, assembled a varied list that included numbers for chorus alone and pieces with orchestral accompaniment, in addition to several folk song arrangements. One of these, dating from 1913, was the oldest piece on the list. Five others were composed in 1950 as was the Fantasia on the Old 104th Psalm Tune rather oddly set for piano solo with accompaniment of chorus and orchestra.

More pleasing on the whole than this rather bombastic number was the "Serenade to Music," based on lines from Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice," written in 1938 for the Jubilee of Sir Henry Wood. This is really lovely music, and the chorus, orchestra and the seven soloists performed it most ingratiatingly. The numbers for chorus alone, "Darest Thou Now, O Soul" and "Lord, Thou Hast Been Our Refuge," are typical of the composer's rugged style. Vaughan Williams has always had a special affinity for English folk music and the eight folk song settings heard last evening, exemplified his skillful handling of such material.

Throughout the evening the chorus distinguished itself in matters of tone and articulation. A word must be said for the solo singing of Mr. James Harkness in the folk song group and for the excellent performance by Richard Sogg of the piano solo in the Fantasia. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

[90].

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 17 1952

Boston Symphony Leader Already Making Plans for Summer Festival

Charles Munch to Direct Tanglewood Concerts; Berkshire Symphonette to Conduct Series of Spring Programs

(Special to The Republican)

Berkshire Hills, Feb. 16—Although the music festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, is months away, Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which holds sway for several weeks in Lenox is already making plans for the coming season. Mr. Munch has announced the program for the coming summer, and the festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday night and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct the concerts and will draw his programs from early French music, and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus, will prepare the choral works for this and the larger concerts.

The concerts in the main music shed will be given on Thursdays and Saturday nights, and Sunday afternoons. Series A will be on July 24, 26, 27; Series B, July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C, Aug. 7, 9, and 10.

Two concerts in each week will be conducted by Mr. Munch. Pierre Monteux will make his first appearance at Tanglewood this summer when he will conduct one concert each in series A and B. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one of the concerts during the final week.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session from June 30 through Aug. 10, will be the 10th, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced in the near future.

While the big music organization in the Berkshires is making plans for the coming season the modest Berkshire Symphonette, made up of 32 members, both professional and amateur, is also making plans for a series of programs to be presented this spring. The musicians in the symphonette come from Berkshire County, northern Connecticut and eastern New York state. Henry P. Cross is the conductor. The small group has won much acclaim for its fine style and performance.

Five concerts have been booked thus far. They are to be given in Falls Village, Conn., regional high school; the Wassaic, N. Y., state school, Amenia, N. Y.; and two concerts in Sheffield. The group holds weekly rehearsal in Sheffield Grange Hall. President of the Berkshire Symphonette is Hadley K. Turner of Southfield. Mrs. Florice Evans Thompson of Housatonic, well-known violinist, is concertmaster.

Dates of the concerts will be announced later. Included in the ensemble are the well-known instrumentalists, Frank Gordon and Thaddeus Tutak, clarinets; Joseph Sullivan, trumpet; Randolph Collet and Hugo Eisenhuth, trombones; Raymond Kipp, French horn, and Elizabeth O'Connor, pianist.

To Receive Yale Medal

Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes of Brook Farm, Lenox, is one of 15 persons headed by Yale's president emeritus, Charles Seymour, who will receive Yale medals for distinguished service to the university. President A. Whitney Griswold of Yale, will make the presentation of medals on Alumni Day, Feb. 22. The awards, given by the executive committee, are being presented for the first time this year in conjunction with the university's 250th anniversary celebration. The medals have been designed by John Howard Benson of Newport, R. I. The board plans to make similar presentations on alumni day from now on.

Mr. Stokes was secretary of the university from 1899 to 1921 and was graduated with the class of 1896. He and Mrs. Stokes are spending the winter in Washington, D. C.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert L. Heathfield of Walker St., Lenox, left New York City by plane Tuesday for a visit in England and Ireland. They planned to attend the funeral services of King George, which were held yesterday. They will return to the States around April 1 and will take up residence in their Walker St. home. They plan to open their Yokun Ave. home, "T'Other House," a little later for the summer months.

Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Mah-Kee-Nac Farms, Lenox, are vacationing in the Bahamas.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Stanford Briggs of the Dorniers, Lenox, will leave soon for Bermuda for several weeks' stay.

Announcement has been made of the marriage of Mrs. Hugh Peters of Englewood, N. J., and Great Barrington, to Richard Fenby Bausman of Cresskill, N. J. The ceremony took place on the 8th in Englewood. Mrs. Bausman is the former Elsie Snare, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Snare of New York City. She is a member of the Great Barrington Garden Club and served as its president last year.

Mr. Bausman is son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Abner L. Bausman of Minneapolis, Minn. Before his retirement from active business he was vice-president of the Eastern Division of General Mills Inc., in charge of the New York export office.

Residents of New Marlboro were saddened this week to hear of the sudden death in New York Monday of Charles Scribner, a former summer resident of New Marlboro and a frequent visitor in the Berkshires. Mr. Scribner was president of the Charles Scribner & Sons, well-known publishers of Fifth Ave., New York. The firm was founded by Mr. Scribner's grandfather, Charles Scribner, 106 years ago.

He was married to the former Vera Bloodgood of New York and New Marlboro. Mrs. Scribner was an outstanding horsewoman. She and her sister, Mrs. J. Macy Willets of New Marlboro, conducted Mepal Farms, the estate of their father, Hildreth K. Bloodgood, after the latter's death.

Mr. Scribner is survived by his wife, one daughter, Mrs. Thomas J. Bingham, and one son, Charles, Jr., vice-president of the publishing firm.

That spring cannot be too far off can be seen by the fact that Landlord James J. Joyce of Berkshire Inn, Great Barrington, has a crew of painters and other workmen redecorating and sprucing up the premises for the coming season. The inn will open around mid-May and Landlord Joyce said that several conventions will take up most of the reservations during the first few days of the opening.

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
FEB 17 1952

Munch Lists Plans For Tanglewood Festival

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made known plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Now in Havana, recuperating from a recent illness, Mr. Munch will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theater-Concert hall, on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus. The concerts in the Music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlios' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30 - August 10, will be the 10th, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1952

U. S. Will Be Well Represented At Exposition of Arts in Paris

New York — UP — The United States will be well-represented at the forthcoming Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom and scheduled for Paris in May.

The theme of the congress is the intellectual and artistic achievements by men of the free world in the last 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera on May 6. The entire orchestra will be transported abroad and in addition to its engagements during the Paris festival, will be heard in The Hague, Amsterdam, various cities in western Germany and possibly in Belgium and Italy. The orchestra is headed by Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, associate conductor.

The New York City Ballet Company also will attend the exposition, which is called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 17 1952

Ansermet and Hayes in a Musical Conversation

An interesting episode took place recently in the Brookline home of Roland Hayes, the distinguished tenor, who gives an intimate recital in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon March 9. He was sought out, both as singer and as musicologist, by a famous Swiss musician, and the resulting discussion went on for two hours.

The visitor was Ernest Ansermet, who has just completed notable services as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While speaking of the book he is writing on "The Meaning of Music," Mr. Ansermet disclosed that it will include his observations on Negro music. Shown a copy of Roland Hayes' book concerning Negro spirituals, he borrowed it, studied it closely, and eagerly had a meeting with the author arranged.

During the visit, Mr. Hayes played a rare recording, made in Africa, of native singers and drummers, and showed his collection of African instruments. This led to a discussion of the relationship between the uses of rhythm by primitive and civilized races. An example of syncopation in a 300-year-old song by Monteverdi. This brought comments from Mr. Ansermet on relationships and contrasts in the music of the Basques, the Spanish, French, and Russians.

Before a log fire in Mr. Hayes' well-stocked library, the conversation continued about places and personalities familiar to both musicians in Europe and America. They discovered that they had crossed and re-crossed each other's paths, without meeting until in Mr. Hayes' home, a few miles from Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
FEB 17 1952

Tanglewood Plans Set For Summer

BOSTON—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theater-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prenared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

CHARLES MUNCH will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death", and Berlioz' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-Aug. 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

Tanglewood Plans Important Works

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, Feb. 16—Plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood were announced today by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch, conductor and music director of the Festival, is now in Havana recovering from a recent illness.

The Festival this year will consist of six concerts in the Theater Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct, drawing his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

The Shed Series will be given Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks: July 24, 26 and 27; July 31, Aug. 2 and 3; Aug. 7, 9, and 10.

Mr. Munch will conduct two concerts each week; Pierre Monteux, making his debut at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in the first two series; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

Among important works scheduled for performance are Honegger's "Dance of Death" and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra, with four supplementary brass choirs.

Boston Station Beams Symphony To Families

Boston. (INS)—Full length "live" performances of one of the world's great symphony orchestras are being channeled into the homes of New Englanders by a new Boston radio station.

Through the facilities of WGBH, a high-power non-commercial FM station for educational broadcasting, programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are within the hearing range of an estimated 208,000 families.

The station, which has its studios in Symphony Hall, is operated with the advice and co-operation of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

The council's members include the Lowell Institute and the six colleges and universities of Greater Boston—Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern and Tufts.

The station's aim is to offer programs of general education for all groups in the community. In addition to the symphony, WGBH presents:

1. Comprehensive interpretations of world news and events. 2. Full-length dramatic productions. 3. A children's hour. 4. Forums on world affairs with distinguished New England scholars and scientists. 5. Poetry readings by noted poets. 6. Regular college or extension courses recorded in the classrooms.

This Clipping From
TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony To Make European Tour

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera house on May 6, according to an announcement by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom, whose theme is the vitality of intellectual and artistic achievements by free men in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms. The Congress' affiliate in this country is the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, of which Sidney Hook is chairman. The exposition committee of this group, headed by Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, is providing funds from private philanthropy to send the 104-member musical aggregation abroad. Other American participants in the Paris exposition will be the New York City Ballet company and Conductors Igor Stravinsky and Bruno Walter.

While final details of the Boston Symphony orchestra's tour await clarification from abroad, visits are planned to 13 cities in six countries, between the conclusion of the 71st symphony season in Boston and the opening of the annual "Pops" concerts there on June 1. Munch, now recovering from a lengthy illness and expected back on the podium in March, will share the conducting assignments with his long-time friend and colleague, Pierre Monteux. He will lead the symphony in its initial concert abroad on May 6 at the Paris Opera house. This event will be honored by the presence of President Vincent Auriol and state, diplomatic, civic and social leaders with the National Guard of Honor of the Republic of France in attendance. Tips and a second exposition concert which Monteux will conduct at Paris' Theater des Champs-Elysees on May 8 will be devoted to 20th century European and American music.

Monteux's program will mark a historical re-creation, a performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring) almost 39 years after he introduced this work in the same theater. In The Hague, Holland, Munch will conduct on May 10, and on May 11 Monteux will conduct in Amsterdam.

On May 17, the Boston orchestra will visit Strasbourg, Conductor Munch's birthplace, where the concert will be broadcast through Voice of America facilities to Russia and its satellite countries.

Performances are planned in Western Germany, Brussels, Belgium; Turin and Milan, Italy, and Lille, France.

The tour will conclude with the orchestra's first appearance in London's Festival hall on May 26.

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
FEB 18 1952

Art Thrives

government is not well equ
ral competition, Edward W ant secretary of state for publ rly of Birmingham, has poi rtheless there is such a conte ikely to lose it unless some are taken. The New York T that the initial effort must c e philanthropy.
that the world may know tha eratic nations have a great de e in the way of culture, there ed for the month of May al cavalcade of the best th hony, opera, concert, ballet nses are being contributed a on is under the sponsorsh ress for Cultural Freedom, is an American Committee Freedom. American leaders by a committee made up of s in the arts, so many Americanism cannot be here is no doubt that the tru

Clipping From
V YORK, N. Y.
NAL-AMERICAN
FEB 18 1952

rtok Played B

ILES KASTENDIECK
t brought special distinction est Ansermet's final pro-with the Boston Symphony negie Hall Saturday after-was the performance of
's "Concerto for Orchestra," contemporary masterpiece
ed an illuminating inter-ion, giving it the stature well deserved.
is music that quickens the
Its more serious aspect at rt may not win enthusiasts iately, but its jesting allegro life-assertive finale per-most people.
making his music more al, Bartok came into his Ansermet had obviously red the score to have given penetrating and compre-e exposition of its beauty
eaning. The Bostonians
t their best.
rwise, the concert again
on a platform of respect-Ansermet's refinement of d taste made Beethoven's Symphony sound ingrati-ut not thoroughly vital.
same might be said for s Violin Concerto K. 216
thur Grumiaux as soloist.
lgian violinist proved him-well-disciplined musician.
ed with awareness of nicehout wholly communicat-sical quality through them.

towering masterpiece of music, Beethoven's "Missa lis," received a rewarding erwhelming, performance

...STIMES

...17 1952

...Station ...Symphony ...milies

...)—Full length "live" ... of one of the world's ...ny orchestras are be... ...d. into the homes of ...lers by a new Boston

...e facilities of WGBH, ... non-commercial FM ...ducational broadcast... ...s of the Boston Sym... ...estra are within the ...e of an estimated 208,...

..., which has its stu... ...hony Hall, is operated ...vice and co-operation ... Institute Co-operative ... Council.

...cil's members include ...nstitute and the six col... ...niversities of Greater ...on College, Boston ... Harvard, Massachusetts ... Technology, Northeast...

...'s aim is to offer pro... ...neral education for all ...e community. In addi... ...ymphony, WGBH pre...

...ehensive interpretations ...ws and events. 2. Full... ...matic productions. 3. A ...hour. 4. Forums on ...irs with distinguished ...nd scholars and scien... ...etry readings by noted ...egular college or exten... ... recorded in the class...

...To ... Tour

... the conducting ... his long-time ...e, Pierre Mon... ...the symphony in ...broad on May 6 ...ra house. This ...red by the pres... ... Vincent Auriol ...ic, civic and so... ... the National ... the Republic of ...nce. This and a ... concert which ...nduct at Paris' ...amps-Elysees on ...voted to 20th cen... ... and American

...ram will mark a ...tion, a perform... ...vinsky's "Sacre du ... of Spring) almost ... introduced this ... theater. In The ... Munch will con... ... and on May 11 ...duct in Amster...

... Boston orchestra ...burg, Conductor ..., where the con... ...badcast through ... facilities to Rus... ...e countries. ... ...are planned, ..., Brussels, Be... ... Milan, Italy, ...

...onclude with the ...ppearance in Lon... ...l on May 25.

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

Art Thrives Where Freedom Lives

...equipped for ... W. Barrett, ... efforts, ... pieces and out ... contest and we ... some definite ... re com... ... come from ... tree and ... con... ... has been ... of Modern Paris a ... scene is in ... ballet and art, ... and the ex... ... the ... of which ... for Cul... ...ship is pro... ... of important ... individuals ... be questioned ... that the true purpose is to show that a vital culture can thrive in a free world.

The cultural lineup is imposing. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play several concerts of modern European and American compositions. The New York City Ballet Company and the Hall Johnson Choir will participate. Such distinguished men of music as Igor Stravinsky, Leopold Stokowski and Bruno Walter (foreign-born but now naturalized American citizens) will conduct. There will be an exhibition of modern American and European art, and there will be lectures and discussion groups led by such men as William Faulkner, John Dos Passos and John Steinbeck.

There will also be groups and individuals from other free countries, men and organizations of comparable reputation.

It is hoped that similar expositions may be held in other cities in future years. There has never been anything else like it in the free world.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

Bartok Played By Ansermet

By MILES KASTENDIECK

What brought special distinction to Ernest Ansermet's final program with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was the performance of Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra."

This contemporary masterpiece received an illuminating interpretation giving it the stature it so well deserved.

...music that quickens the ... its more serious aspect at ... might not win enthusiasts ..., but its jesting allegro ... life-asserting finale per... most people.

In making his music more personal, Bartok came into his own. Ansermet had obviously mastered the score to have given such a penetrating and comprehensive exposition of its beauty and meaning. The Bostonians were at their best.

On ... again ... re-pect... ...ement of ... Beethoven's ... interpre... ... for ... K. 216 ... Soloist ... played him... ... Russian ... ...

TIGHT BINDING

-/21/52

Berkshire Music Center To Enroll Amateurs

Westchester's musical amateurs will be interested to know that the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will open a new department this Summer for group study for amateurs who play or sing a little. In order to enable as many people as possible to take advantage of this opportunity, the school will accept enrollments for two week periods this year, so that people with vacations of this duration, may enjoy the benefits of planned group musical activity. Ingolf Dahl, of the University of Southern California, will head the new department.

Another innovation this Summer will be that the school orchestra will be made up entirely of scholarship students, who will be selected on the basis of their qualification to become part of the group, and how much they are needed to fill it out.

This Clipping From
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
FEB 2[illegible] 1952

Horblit Award to Lukas Foss

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his second piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Mark M. Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN PATRIOT
FEB 21 1952

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced his plans for the 1952 Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass. Mr. Munch now is in Havana recovering from his recent illness.

The Berkshire festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theater-Concert hall at Tanglewood on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

The concerts in the Music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon for three weeks—Series A on July 24, 26, 27; series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3 and series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10.

Conductors will include Mr. Munch, Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein.

[illegible]
2/21/52

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 23 1952

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler's Ninth Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at the helm this week. As a devoted admirer of Gustav Mahler, he provides us with a rare opportunity of hearing that composer's Ninth Symphony. The first half of the program consists of six numbers from the ballet score "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven.

Every time a major score by Mahler is performed, the fact renews the old double-barreled argument: was Mahler one of the creative great, and didn't he write much too long? Generally speaking, there are only two sets of answers, a plain yes or a clear-cut no, depending upon the individual and his intellectual outlook upon music. (My own answers are yes to both questions.)

It is precisely this intellectual preoccupation that makes the difficulty. In emotional terms, there is little or no problem, for Mahler, with all his inner torments, his darksome outlook upon life, and a temperament that led him to express his own feelings with utmost passion, is by all odds an emotional composer. In fewer words, he was and is a profoundly moving composer.

But then the brain takes charge, and begins to question certain aspects of the Mahler style: the huge orchestral forces, the seeming triviality of some of Mahler's thematic melodies, his fondness for marches and the overwhelming complexity in which he always became involved. Then the trouble begins. The mind quibbles over what the heart would readily accept.

Next there is a question of length, which is also one of a listener's endurance. It is true that just so much music can be absorbed in a given time. Less than that, one is un-satisfied; more, and one is either satiated or exhausted. Mahler, like Wagner, was in the 19th Century tradition of prolixity.

My view, accordingly, is this: that the over-all grandeur of Mahler, his superlative technic as a writer for orchestra, his transcendent musical imagination, his great powers of invention and development, and his ability to transfer his own large, profound views of life into musical indisputably "big," entitles him to be regarded as a creative artist of the first rank. The cost, to the listener, is a devoted willingness to bear with all the repetition and the tiring length.

The Ninth Symphony is characteristic, with an opening movement that is far too long, but nonetheless majestic and imposing. The dance-like slow movement is in the tradition of the finest 19th Century lyrical beauty, and the rondo burleske brings a satirically treated irony. With all its reiteration, the final adagio is one of the supremely noble, nakedly personal and exalted symphonic meditations of the past half-century.

The orchestra played admirably, except for a few almost unnoticed slips in certain of Mahler's extremely difficult passages. For once Beethoven was lost in the shuffle, for apart from the "Prometheus" Overture, the other five little movements were small Beethoven, indeed, and a bit drowsy. But Messrs. Mayes, Laurent and Zighera richly deserved their special applause for cello, flute and harp solos.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 23 1952

French Pianist Too Gentle With Rachmaninoff

By IRVING KOLODIN

MONIQUE de la Bruchollerie, the French pianist who made her New York debut at the latest concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is well in the forefront of her contemporaries so far as musicality, technical equipment and command of her resources are concerned—qualified to give any audience an absorbing evening.

This was evident even though the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff, her choice for this occasion, is a tough nut to crack and she didn't succeed in more than bruising its surface.

Monique de la Bruchollerie

* * *

WHERE THE MUSIC was subdued or but moderately demanding, her scales rippled evenly, her phrasing was flexible, her tone had the lovely clinging sound that testified to her training by one of the masters of tonal discipline, Isidor Philipp. However, Rachmaninoff is not a composer whose notes can be strung, pearl-like, on a string; something more violent, less orderly, is required, and this Miss de la Bruchollerie, for all her refinement and taste, did not provide. She will be heard in recital next week, to greater advantage, one imagines.

Ernest Ansermet's conducting for the Concerto was glossy enough, though it did not burn with any Slavic conviction to compensate for Miss de la Bruchollerie's reticence.

* * *

ANSERMET was most himself in the preceding "Monopartita" of Honegger, in which his beat was notably more supple, his whole manner vastly more alive than it had been in Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, with which the evening opened.

The Honegger (new to New York and completed less than a year ago) honors its classic derivation with five sections in contrasting tempi, bound together in a single movement lasting less than 15 minutes. It might be described as a ballet suite without program or a Mozart divertimento without tunes. Texture it has, and some momentum, but a rather gray, colorless sound, without enough rhythmic contrast to engage the attention.

* * *

BEFORE beginning it, Ansermet verbally informed the audience that he had also programmed the celebrated "Pacific 231" to eonor Honegger's approaching 60th birthday (Mar. 10, 1952). It eventually pulled out, after the "Monopartita," but its tonal portraiture seemed much more sedate than it did in the '20s. Let us not disparage any man who invented an idiom, as Honegger assuredly did for "train music"; but little remains save the instrumental effects. (The subway rumbling by beneath the Carnegie Hall foundation unfortunately proposed a critical comparison more than acute.)

Quite the liveliest experience of the evening was the playing at the very end of Ravel's "La Valse," an Ansermet specialty.

* * *

BY WAY of an interview in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune comes a blast from Harry Benson, company manager of the Met's ill-fated road "Fledermaus," enlarging upon some of the charges of mismanagement that have accrued ever since the tour started in September.

He attributes the loss (cited in some quarters as $100,000) to overoptimistic estimates of how long the attraction could be booked in some towns, the bad choice of towns where even one performance didn't draw, overpayment of the chorus ($150 a week against $100 in most touring musicals), engagement of alternate personnel for leads, thus adding $4,000 to the weekly budget, etc. He also charged that the tour was just beginning to earn money when it was suddenly curtailed.

Next speaker, Rudolf Bing!

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 23 19[illegible]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the first program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Suite from "Prometheus" Op. [illegible] ..... Beethoven Symphony No. 9 .....

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Mahler's Ninth Symphony remains one of the most enigmatic in the entire orchestral repertoire.

Its proportions are gigantic, its content immense, its language obscure, its mood dark and brooding and often bitter. It is long drawn-out, occasionally obscure, frequently tiresome. But somehow it achieves a cumulative sort of impact; when it is over you realize you have been in the presence of a towering musical communication.

The strange thing about this work is that it is, all said and done, the final utterance of Germanic romanticism, a sort of dirge for the end of a musical epoch. Within a few years of its composition in 1909, Stravinsky, Schoenberg (Mahler's own disciple) and others were to administer the coup de grace to the musical language in which perhaps 80 per cent. of all music still most beloved by contemporary audiences, was written. And the Ninth, which may be considered the final extension of that romantic language, is its epitaph. In the 40-odd years since, despite such conservatives as Sibelius, Rachmaninoff and Strauss, music has gone off in every direction only, as Sir Thomas Beecham put it recently, to fizzle out in a tormented search for a new melodic and harmonic idiom.

But the Ninth is more than a fin de siecle epitaph. It is also a highly personal expression of a personal tragedy. The closing moments of the first movement and of the final adagio, are unutterably tragic in their implication. Indeed, few more impressive moments are to be found anywhere in music; the mood strikes home so tellingly it a[illegible] but holds the audience gripped in breathless silence.

But as is so often the case with Mahler, these moments of magic are contrasted with the most appalling conceits. The rondo burleske is almost unto[illegible]

THE MET'S current announcement that "The Rake's Progress" will be a feature of the 1952-53 season bears out, in virtually all details, rumors that have been circulating since Christmas time. Fritz Reiner will conduct the Stravinsky opera, and George Balanchine will stage it. Only deviation from forecast is that the designer and costumer will be Horace Armistead, not Eugene Berman. The latter will probably have his hands full with a revival of Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," which is expected to open the season with Leonard Warren in a prominent role. Also, 'tis said, the English Armistead is expected to have a better slant on the period than the Russian Berman.

Other operas rumored for inclusion as new productions include "Tosca" (Dorothy Kirsten, Richard Tucker and George London), "Boheme," and a second contemporary work not yet identified.

(Copyright, 8R)

This Clipping From
[illegible]ORK, N. Y.
[illegible]D TRIBUNE
FEB 24 1952

Brucholleries

Pianist Gives First [illegible]al in New York

[illegible]rancis D. Perkins

[illegible] DE LA
[illegible]LERIE
[illegible]ALL
[illegible] yesterday afternoon. The [illegible] ..... Bach
[illegible] G minor ..... Bach
[illegible] Vous dirai-je mamam" ..... Mozart [illegible] ..... Chopin
[illegible] engloutie; General
[illegible] a fille aux cheveux ..... Debussy
[illegible] La plus que lente. Debussy
[illegible] ..... Saint-Saens

[illegible] de la Bruchollerie, who New York debut eleven [illegible] soloist with the Boston Orchestra, gave [illegible] here yesterday afternoon Carnegie Hall, offering [illegible]onata in B flat minor as [illegible]xtensive work in a con[illegible]d and mainly familiar [illegible]nch pianist displayed a [illegible]y deft, flexible and fluent [illegible]and an ability to realize [illegible]ctions of tone color and [illegible]of volume: her dynamic [illegible]as remarkably well con[illegible]e lucidity of her musical [illegible]nd its thorough disclo[illegible]ail were particularly ad[illegible]s in the Bach fugue and [illegible]rt variations. Uniformity [illegible]d a sense of mechanized [illegible]nich often mark the per[illegible] of a Bach work at the [illegible] of a piano recital, were this spirited interpreta- Mozart variations, played [illegible]mentum and delicacy, [illegible]nguished for the persua[illegible]rentiation of color and [illegible]ach variation.

Chopin sonata, for some [illegible]le reason, the reviewer [illegible]et an impression of ex[illegible]ogency in the interpre[illegible] a whole, although this [illegible]ent in certain episodes, [illegible]ly in part of the scherzo [illegible]he imposing waxing of [illegible]nd tension in the funeral [illegible]The first statement of the [illegible]eme in the first move[illegible]arked, indeed, sostenuto, [illegible] an unusual deliberation [illegible]essened the sense of con[illegible]The finale was remarkable [illegible]its smooth swiftness of pace, [illegible]esting the "wind over the graves" title applied to t[illegible] something of tragedy was m[illegible] accomplishmen[illegible] from a slight [illegible] climactic or [illegible] was consisten[illegible] sonata as well [illegible] program.

The Debuss[illegible] with tonal ap[illegible] or and under[illegible] perspective, [illegible] pression of a[illegible] of this music[illegible] suasiveness o[illegible] its variations[illegible] communicativ[illegible] tions here we[illegible] aux cheveux[illegible] with admira[illegible] and "La plus[illegible] Saint-Saens[illegible] propriate mu[illegible] illustration [illegible] nical prowes[illegible]

SUNDA[illegible]

Much Ar[illegible] Berkshire

Charles [illegible] of the Bost[illegible] tra, announ[illegible] Berkshire F[illegible] He is now [illegible]te from h[illegible] will resume[illegible] Boston cond[illegible] The Berk[illegible]ist of six [illegible] auditorium, [illegible] Hall, on S[illegible] Sunday afte[illegible] 19-20. Cha[illegible]uct and [illegible] from early [illegible] the works [illegible] Schubert. [illegible] and the lar[illegible]pared by H[illegible] Festival Ch[illegible] Charles [illegible] concerts in [illegible] Monteux, m[illegible]ance at Ta[illegible] one concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SM[illegible]
Feb 23

This Clipping From
EWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
[illegible]EB 24 1952

AN I-WITNESS

BY IRVING KOLODIN

[illegible] says of Monique de la [illegible]erie, the French pianist who [illegible]r New York debut at the [illegible]ncert of the Boston Sym[illegible]rchestra in Ca[illegible]all, [illegible]will never make headlines [illegible]y for the technical reason [illegible] name is too long to fit the [illegible]newspaper's convenience in [illegible]tters. So far as musicality, [illegible] equipment and command [illegible]esources are concerned, the [illegible]nch artist is well in the [illegible] of her contemporaries, [illegible] to give any audience an [illegible] evening.

[illegible]as evident even though the [illegible]concerto of Rachmaninoff, [illegible]ce for this occasion, is a [illegible]ut to crack and she didn't [illegible]n more than bruising its [illegible]Where the music was sub[illegible]but moderately demanding, [illegible]s rippled evenly, her phras[illegible] flexible, her tone had the [illegible]inging sound that testified [illegible]aining by one of the masters [illegible] discipline. Isidor Philipp. [illegible] Rachmaninoff is not a [illegible]r whose notes can be strung, [illegible]e, on a string; something [illegible]ent, less orderly is required, [illegible] Miss de la Bruchollerie, for [illegible]efinement and taste, did not [illegible]She will be heard in recital [illegible]k, to greater advantage, one [illegible]

[illegible] Ansermet's conducting for [illegible]certo was glossy enough, [illegible]t did not burn with any [illegible]nviction to compensate for [illegible] la Bruchollerie's reticence. [illegible]whole, he was most himself [illegible]receding "Monopartita" of [illegible]r, in which his beat was [illegible]more supple, his whole man[illegible]ly more alive than it had [illegible] Mendelssohn's "Italian" [illegible]ny, with which the evening [illegible]The Honegger (new to New [illegible]nd completed less than a [illegible]) honors its classic deriva[illegible]n five sections in contrast[illegible]t, bound together in a single [illegible]nt lasting less than 15 min[illegible]ught be described as a bal[illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

CHAPPAQUA, N.Y
TRIBUNE
2/21/52

Berkshire Music Center To Enroll Amateurs

Westchester's musical amateurs will be interested to know that the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will open a new department this Summer for group study for amateurs who play or sing a little. In order to enable as many people as possible to take advantage of this opportunity, the school will accept enrollments for two week periods this year, so that people with vacations of this duration, may enjoy the benefits of planned group musical activity. Ingolf Dahl, of the University of Southern California, will head the new department.

Another innovation this Summer will be that the school orchestra will be made up entirely of scholarship students, who will be selected on the basis of their qualification to become part of the group, and how much they are needed to fill it out.

This Clipping From
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
FEB 21 1952

Horblit Award to Lukas Foss

It is announced that the Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his second piano concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome, where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship, to introduce his concerto with the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Mark M. Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN PATRIOT
FEB 21 1952

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced his plans for the 1952 Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass. Mr. Munch now is in Havana recovering from his recent illness.

The Berkshire festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theater-Concert hall at Tanglewood on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Mr. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

The concerts in the Music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon for three weeks—Series A on July 24, 26, 27; series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3 and series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10.

Conductors will include Mr. Munch, Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein.

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y
HERALD
2/22/52

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 23 1952

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler's Ninth Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is at the helm this week. As a devoted admirer of Gustav Mahler, he provides us with a rare opportunity of hearing that composer's Ninth Symphony. The first half of the program consists of six numbers from the ballet score "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven.

Every time a major score by Mahler is performed, the fact renews the old double-barreled argument: was Mahler one of the creative great, and didn't he write much too long? Generally speaking, there are only two sets of answers, a plain yes or a clear-cut no, depending upon the individual and his intellectual outlook upon music. (My own answers are yes to both questions.)

It is precisely this intellectual preoccupation that makes the difficulty. In emotional terms, there is little or no problem, for Mahler with all his inner torments, his darksome outlook upon life, and a temperament that led him to express his own feelings with utmost passion, is by all odds an emotional composer. In fewer words, he was and is a profoundly moving composer.

But then the brain takes charge, and begins to question certain aspects of the Mahler style: the huge orchestral forces, the seeming triviality of some of Mahler's thematic melodies, his fondness for marches and the overwhelming complexity in which he always became involved. Then the trouble begins. The mind quibbles over what the heart would readily accept.

Next there is a question of length, which is also one of a listener's endurance. It is true that just so much music can be absorbed in a given time. Less than that, one is un-satisfied; more, and one is either satiated or exhausted. Mahler, like Wagner, was in the 19th Century tradition of prolixity.

My view, accordingly, is this: that the over-all grandeur of Mahler, his superlative technic as a writer for orchestra, his transcendent musical imagination, his great powers of invention and development, and his ability to transfer his own large, profound views of life into musical indisputably "big," entitles him to be regarded as a creative artist of the first rank. The cost, to the listener, is a devoted willingness to bear with all the repetition and the tiring length.

The Ninth Symphony is characteristic, with an opening movement that is far too long, but nonetheless majestic and imposing. The dance-like slow movement is in the tradition of the finest 19th Century lyrical beauty, and the rondo burleske brings a satirically treated irony. With all its reiteration, the final adagio is one of the supremely noble, nakedly personal and exalted symphonic meditations of the past half-century.

The orchestra played admirably, except for a few almost unnoticed slips in certain of Mahler's extremely difficult passages. For once Beethoven was lost in the shuffle, for apart from the "Prometheus" Overture, the other five little movements were small Beethoven, indeed, and a bit drowsy. But Messrs. Mayes, Laurent and Zighera richly deserved their special applause for cello, flute and harp solos.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 23 1952

French Pianist Too Gentle With Rachmaninoff

By IRVING KOLODIN

MONIQUE de la Brucholerie, the French pianist who made her New York debut at the latest concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, is well in the forefront of her contemporaries so far as musicality, technical equipment and command of her resources are concerned—qualified to give any audience an absorbing evening.

This was evident even though the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff, her choice for this occasion, is a tough nut to crack and she didn't succeed in more than bruising its surface.

Monique de la Brucholerie

* * *

WHERE THE MUSIC was subdued or but moderately demanding, her scales rippled evenly, her phrasing was flexible, her tone had the lovely clinging sound that testified to her training by one of the masters of tonal discipline, Isidor Philipp. However, Rachmaninoff is not a composer whose notes can be strung, pearl-like, on a string; something more violent, less orderly, is required, and this Miss de la Brucholerie, for all her refinement and taste, did not provide. She will be heard in recital next week, to greater advantage, one imagines.

Ernest Ansermet's conducting for the Concerto was glossy enough, though it did not burn with any Slavic conviction to compensate for Miss de la Brucholerie's reticence.

* * *

ANSERMET was most himself in the preceding "Monopartita" of Honegger, in which his beat was notably more supple, his whole manner vastly more alive than it had been in Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, with which the evening opened.

The Honegger (new to New York and completed less than a year ago) honors its classic derivation with five sections in contrasting tempi, bound together in a single movement lasting less than 15 minutes. It might be described as a ballet suite without program or a Mozart divertimento without tunes. Texture it has, and some momentum, but a rather gray, colorless sound, without enough rhythmic contrast to engage the attention.

* * *

BEFORE beginning it, Ansermet verbally informed the audience that he had also programmed the celebrated "Pacific 231" to eonor Honegger's approaching 60th birthday (Mar. 10, 1952). It eventually pulled out, after the "Monopartita," but its tonal portraiture seemed much more sedate than it did in the '20s. Let us not disparage any man who invented an idiom, as Honegger assuredly did for "train music"; but little remains save the instrumental effects. (The subway rumbling by beneath the Carnegie Hall foundation unfortunately proposed a critical comparison more than acute.)

Quite the liveliest experience of the evening was the playing at the very end of Ravel's "La Valse," an Ansermet specialty.

* * *

BY WAY of an interview in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune comes a blast from Harry Benson, company manager of the Met's ill-fated road "Fledermaus," enlarging upon some of the charges of mismanagement that have accrued ever since the tour started in September.

He attributes the loss (cited in some quarters as $100,000) to overoptimistic estimates of how long the attraction could be booked in some towns, the bad choice of towns where even one performance didn't draw, overpayment of the chorus ($150 a week against $100 in most touring musicals), engagement of alternate personnel for leads, thus adding $4,000 to the weekly budget, etc. He also charged that the tour was just beginning to earn money when it was suddenly curtailed.

Next speaker, Rudolf Bing!

THE MET'S current announcement that "The Rake's Progress" will be a feature of the 1952-53 season bears out, in virtually all details, rumors that have been circulating since Christmas time. Fritz Reiner will conduct the Stravinsky opera, and George Balanchine will stage it. Only deviation from forecast is that the designer and costumer will be Horace Armistead, not Eugene Berman. The latter will probably have his hands full with a revival of Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," which is expected to open the season with Leonard Warren in a prominent role. Also, 'tis said, the English Armistead is expected to have a better slant on the period than the Russian Berman.

Other operas rumored for inclusion as new productions include "Tosca" (Dorothy Kirsten, Richard [illegible] and George London), "Boheme," and a second contemporary work not yet identified.

(Copyright, 52)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 23 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 16th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Suite from "Prometheus" Op. 43.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 9.....Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Mahler's Ninth Symphony remains one of the most enigmatic in the entire orchestral repertoire.

Its proportions are gigantic, its content immense, its language obscure, its mood dark and brooding and often bitter. It is long drawn-out, occasionally obscure, frequently tiresome. But somehow it achieves a cumulative sort of impact; when it is over you realize you have been in the presence of a towering musical communication.

The strange thing about this work is that it is, all said and done, the final utterance of Germanic romanticism, a sort of dirge for the end of a musical epoch. Within a few years of its composition in 1909, Stravinsky, Schoenberg (Mahler's own disciple) and others were to administer the coup de grace to the musical language in which perhaps 80 per cent. of all music still most beloved by contemporary audiences, was written. And the Ninth, which may be considered the final extension of that romantic language, is its epitaph. In the 40-odd years since, despite such conservatives as Sibelius, Rachmaninoff and Strauss, music has gone off in every direction only, as Sir Thomas Beecham put it recently, to fizzle out in a tormented search for a new melodic and harmonic idiom.

But the Ninth is more than a fin de siecle epitaph. It is also a highly personal expression of a personal tragedy. The closing moments of the first movement and of the final adagio, are unutterably tragic in their implication. Indeed, few more impressive moments are to be found anywhere in music; the mood strikes home so tellingly it all but holds the audience gripped in breathless silence.

But as is so often the case with Mahler, these moments of magic are contrasted with the most appalling conceits. The rondo burleske is almost utter trash from beginning to end. In this instance, though its purpose is clear enough. The first movement, with its endless ups and downs, its bombast, its pretension and its repetitious laendler would be twice as effective at half the length, while even the [illegible] laendler would be infinitely more delightful had it not re-told the same little tale so often.

Yet these three movements [illegible] but the introduction to the adagio and this, the crowning movement of the work, is of immense nobility, such exalted resignation of spirit, that it carries the entire 62-minute work.

It may be said that Mr. Burgin, whose special aptitude is the music of Mahler has been noted, observed a number of cuts in the work, omitting perhaps 10 or more minutes of them missed), and that read it with the utmost devotion never fussing it or over-emphasizing it. And the orchestra played it beautifully with notable first-desk contributions by Alfred Kripps and Joseph de Pasquale, among others.

The concert began with the performance hereabouts of suite from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" since 1919. This is Bethoven in his supniest, most charming and ingratiating mood and I am hard put to see why the work has lain so long neglected. Although the original ballet score consists of 16 pieces, Mr. Burgin played but five yesterday, even omitting one (the famous "Prometheus" variations on a theme that is recurrent in Bethoven that was programmed. Soloists Mayes, George Laurent and Joseph Zighera, respectively the first cellist, flutist and harpist of the orchestra, performed the solos in the central adagio exquisitely to make this a delightful concert-raiser.

Leonard Bernstein returns next week to conduct Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtumsik," the E flat Piano Concerto (with himself as soloist), Berg's "Der Wein" (with Patricia Neway, soloist) and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony.

This Clipping From
[illegible]ORK, N. Y.
[illegible]D TRIBUNE
FEB 24 1952

[illegible] Brucholleric

Pianist Gives First [illegible] in New York

[illegible]ancis D. Perkins

[illegible] DE LA [illegible]LERIE

[illegible]ALL [illegible] yesterday afternoon. [illegible]

[illegible]ue in G minor.....Bach
[illegible]Ah! Vous dirai-je maman.....Mozart
[illegible] Flat minor.....Chopin
[illegible]Cathedrale engloutie; General [illegible]
[illegible]rie; La fille aux cheveux [illegible]
[illegible].....Debussy
[illegible]'s pluie; La plus que lente.....Debussy
[illegible].....Saint-Saens

[illegible] de la Brucholleric, who [illegible] New York debut eleven [illegible] soloist with the Boston [illegible] Orchestra, gave [illegible] here yesterday afternoon [illegible] Carnegie Hall, offering [illegible]onata in B flat minor as [illegible]xtensive work in a concert [illegible]d and mainly familiar [illegible]nch pianist displayed a [illegible]y deft, flexible and fluent [illegible]and an ability to realize [illegible]tions of tone color and [illegible]f volume; her dynamic [illegible]s remarkably well con[illegible]e lucidity of her musical [illegible]nd its thorough disclo[illegible]ail were particularly ad[illegible] in the Bach fugue and [illegible]t variations. Uniformity [illegible] a sense of mechanized [illegible]ich often mark the per[illegible] of a Bach work at the [illegible] of a piano recital, were [illegible] this spirited interpreta[illegible] Mozart variations, played [illegible]mentum and delicacy [illegible]nguished for the persua[illegible]rentiation of color and [illegible]ach variation.

[illegible]Chopin sonata, for some [illegible]e reason, the reviewer [illegible]et an impression of ex[illegible]gency in the interpre[illegible] a whole, although this [illegible]nt in certain episodes, [illegible]y in part of the scherzo [illegible]he imposing waxing of [illegible]d tension in the funeral [illegible]he first statement of the [illegible]eme in the first move[illegible]arked, indeed, sostenuto, [illegible]an unusual deliberation [illegible]ssened the sense of con[illegible]he finale was remarkable [illegible]ooth swiftness of pace, [illegible] the "wind over the [illegible] grave" [illegible] applied to [illegible] something [illegible] tragedy [illegible] accomplish[illegible] from a sin[illegible] climactic [illegible] was consis[illegible] sonata as [illegible] program.

The Debu[illegible] with toni[illegible] or and unu[illegible] perspective[illegible] pression of [illegible] of this mu[illegible] suasiveness [illegible] its variation[illegible] communica[illegible]tions here [illegible]aux cheveux [illegible] with admi[illegible] and "La plu[illegible] Saint-Saens[illegible] propriate i[illegible] illustration[illegible] nical prow[illegible]

This Clipping From
[illegible]EWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
FEB 24 1952

[illegible] I-WITNESS

IRVING KOLODIN

[illegible] says of Monique de la [illegible]rie, the French pianist who [illegible] New York debut at the [illegible]ert of the Boston Sym[illegible]rchestra in Ca[illegible]ll, [illegible] never make headlines [illegible]y for the technical reason [illegible] name is too long to fit the [illegible] newspaper's convenience in [illegible]tters. So far as musicality, [illegible] equipment and command [illegible]sources are concerned, the [illegible]nch artist is well in the [illegible] of her contemporaries [illegible] to give any audience an [illegible] evening.

[illegible]as evident even though the [illegible]oncerto of Rachmaninoff [illegible]e for this occasion, is a [illegible]t to crack and she didn't [illegible]in more than bruising its [illegible]where the music was sub[illegible]but moderately demanding. [illegible]s rippled evenly, her phras[illegible] flexible, her tone had the [illegible]nging sound that testified [illegible]aining by one of the masters [illegible] descipline, Isidor Philipp.

Rachmaninoff is not a [illegible] whose notes can be strung [illegible], on a string; something [illegible]ent, less orderly is required, [illegible] Miss de la Brucholleric, for [illegible]tinement and taste, did not [illegible] she will be heard in recital [illegible], to greater advantage, one

Ansermet's conducting for [illegible] certo was glossy enough, [illegible]t did not burn with any [illegible]nviction to compensate for [illegible]a Bruchollerie's reticence. [illegible]whole, he was most himself [illegible] preceding "Monopartita" [illegible], in which his beat was [illegible]more supple, his whole [illegible]y more alive than it [illegible] Mendelssohn's "[illegible], with which the [illegible] The Honegger (new [illegible]nd completed less [illegible]) honors its classic [illegible] five sections in [illegible]g bound together i[illegible]g less than [illegible]ight be described

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SM[illegible]

It is a curious program [illegible] Richard Burgin is offering at [illegible] week's Symphony Concerts. [illegible] numbers make it and they [illegible] strong contrast to one [illegible] The first of them is the Suite [illegible] Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," the other [illegible] Ninth Symphony of Mahler, [illegible] one extreme, innocence and [illegible] plicity; at the other, sophistica[illegible] soul-searching, bitter ironv [illegible] in the last movement of this [illegible] ler's last complete symphony, [illegible] thing very close to the sub[illegible]

Only the Overture to [illegible] metheus" has been of anything [illegible] frequent occurrence at the [illegible] phony Concerts. It is a [illegible] piece, bearing a superficial [illegible] blance to Mozart's Overture [illegible] "The Marriage of Figaro," [illegible] hardly worthy to stand beside [illegible] masterpiece. Sixteen numbers [illegible] prise the ballet that Beethoven composed in 1800. Four of [illegible] were given yesterday. The [illegible] in which Beethoven used the [illegible] later employed in the last [illegible] ment of his "Eroica," was [illegible] the program but not played. [illegible] cial pleasure was afforded by [illegible] Adagio, with its solos for [illegible] flute and harp, beautifully [illegible] by Messrs. Mayes, Laurent [illegible] Zighera.

In terms of yesterday's per[illegible] ance the Symphony took a [illegible] turn for the better in the [illegible] Burleske, which is so amazing [illegible] prophetic of the ways of [illegible] ernism. Nor did Mr. Burgin [illegible] the telling anticipation of the [illegible] which, if memory serves, Dr. [illegible] sevitzky was wont to excise. [illegible] the Adagio, which reaches a [illegible] attained only by Bruckner and later Beethoven. Mahler and [illegible] Burgin, between them, [illegible] spell. There was a degree of [illegible] plause at the end not to be [illegible] pected when a symphony, [illegible] over an hour, fades so very [illegible] ally into nothingness.

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC

trash from beginning to end. ... instance, though its purpose ... clear enough. The first m... ment, with its endless ups ... downs, its bombast, its over... tension and its repetitiven... would be twice as effective at ... the length, while even the l... brious laendler would be i... itely more delightful had Ma... not re-told the same little ... so often.

Yet these three movements ... but the introduction to the ... adagio and this, the crow... movement of the work, is of ... immense nobility, such exa... resignation of spirit, that it ... ries the entire 62-minute wor...

It may be said that Mr. ... gin, whose special aptitude ... the music of Mahler has ... been noted, observed a num... of cuts in the work, omitting ... haps 10 or more minutes (... of them missed), and that ... read it with the utmost devo... never fussing it or over-emot... alizing it. And the orche... played it beautifully with not... first-desk contributions by ... fred Kripps and Joseph de ... quale, among others.

The concert began with the ... performance hereabouts of ... suite from Beethoven's "Creat... of Prometheus" since 1919, ... is Bethoven in his sunniest, m... charming and ingratiating mo... and I am hard put to see why ... work has lain so long neglec... Although the original ballet ... consists of 16 pieces, Mr. Bu... played but five yesterday, ... omitting one (the famous "... metheus" variations on a th... that is recurrent in Bethov... that was programmed. San... Mayes, George Laurent and B... ard Zighera, respectively the ... cellist, flutist and harpist of ... orchestra, performed the col... the central adagio exquisitely ... make this a delightful curt... raiser.

Leonard Bernstein returns ... week to conduct Mozart's "... Kleine Nachtumsik," the E... Piano Concerto (with himself ... soloist), Berg's "Der Wein" (... tricia Neway, soloist) and Si... lus' Fifth Symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCER...

BY WARREN STOREY SM...

It is a curious program ... Richard Burgin is offering at ... week's Symphony Concerts. ... numbers make it and they a... strong contrast to one ano... The first of them is the Suite ... Beethoven's ballet, "The Crea... of Prometheus," the other ... Ninth Symphony of Mahler, ... one extreme, innocence and ... plicity; at the other, sophistic... soul-searching, bitter irony ... in the last movement of this ... ler's last complete symphony. ... thing very close to the sublil...

Only the Overture to ... metheus" has been of anything ... frequent occurrence at the ... phony Concerts. It is a ple... piece, bearing a superficial r... blance to Mozart's Overtur... "The Marriage of Figaro," th... hardly worthy to stand beside ... masterpiece. Sixteen numbers ... prise the ballet that Beeth... composed in 1800. Four of ... were given yesterday. The ... in which Beethoven used the ... later employed in the last ... ment of his "Eroica," was list... the program but not played. ... cial pleasure was afforded b... Adagio, with its solos for ... flute and harp, beautifully ... by Messrs. Mayes, Laurent ... Zighera.

In terms of yesterday's per... ance the Symphony took a de... turn for the better in the R... Burleske, which is so amaz... prophetic of the ways of ... ernism. Nor did Mr. Burgin ... the telling anticipation of the ... which, if memory serves, Dr. ... sevitzky was wont to excise. ... the Adagio, which reaches a h... attained only by Bruckner an... later Beethoven, Mahler an... Burgin, between them, wo... spell. There was a degree ... plause at the end not to ... pected when a symphony, ... over an hour, fades so very ... ally into nothingness.

This Clipping From
THE HERALD TRIBUNE

...e la Bruchollerie

...ch Pianist Gives Firs... Recital in New York

By Francis D. Perkins

...UE DE LA ...CHOLLERIE ...

...e which is sometimes ... to this movement, but ... of the element of ... is missing in this notable ... ment. The tone, apart ... slight hardness in a few ... or outspoken measures, ... ently musical, in the ... well as in the rest of the ...

...e Debussy works were played ... al appeal, variety of col... understanding of musical ..., but, despite an im... of artistic understanding ... music, the expressive per... of this group also had ... Among the most ... ive of the interpreta... were those of "La fille ... de lin," presented ... ble lyric simplicity, ... que lente," while the ... to cata was an ap... sical vehicle for the ... of the pianist's tech... ...

This Clipping From
PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STAR
FEB 24 1952

Much Announces Berkshire Plans

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theater-Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B.

This Clipping From
NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
FEB 7 ...

AN I-WITNESS REPORT

BY IRVING KOLODIN

...French pianist ... York debut at the ... of the Boston Sym... in Carnegie Hal...

MONIQUE DE LA BRUCHOLLIERIE

...ert program or a Mozart ...to without tones. Texture ...d some momentum, but a ...y, colorless sound, without ... rhythmic contrast to en... attention.

...e beginning it, Ansermet ... informed the audience that ... also programmed the cele... "Pacific 231" to honor Honeg... approaching 60th birthday ... 10, 1952). It eventually pull... after the "Monopartita," but ...al portraiture seemed much ...edate than it did in the '20s. ... not disparage any man who ...ed an idiom, as Honegger as... did for "train music"; but ...emains save the instrumental ... The subway rumbling by ...ath the Carnegie Hall founda... unfortunately proposed a crit... comparison more than acute.)

Quite the liveliest experience of the ... single evening was the playing at the very ... end of Ravel's "La Valse," an Anser... met specialty.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 24 1952

TANGLEWOOD'S FUTURE

Measures to Insure Continuity Include Extensive New Scholarship Program

By AARON COPLAND,

Composer and Assistant Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE summer of 1952 will mark the tenth anniversary session of the Berkshire Music Center. No one will find it strange, I suppose, if those of us who have been with the school from the start feel that this is a moment for rejoicing. This by now well-known school of music was established in 1940 because Serge Koussevitzky persuaded the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to undertake an unprecedented step: the formation of a summer school under the aegis of a symphony orchestra.

Before long the plan was enlarged to include the departments of opera production, composition and the study of the art of conducting. Beyond this—and here was a special love of Dr. Koussevitzky—a division of the school was to be set up for the musical enthusiast who wanted to spend a summer of "living and working in music."

Dr. Koussevitzky had the profound satisfaction of seeing his dream brought to reality. Everyone knows what Tanglewood came to mean in the mind of this great leader. Upon his death last spring there arose considerable speculation as to the course the school would take. It is indeed a pleasure to be able to announce in no uncertain terms that Tanglewood will go on! The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who have maintained the school at considerable sacrifice, have shown a sympathetic understanding of what is being accomplished in the Berkshire hills.

Last summer, to fill the gap caused by the death of Dr. Koussevitzky, the group of musicians who head the school's departments formed an administrative committee to carry out the projects he had planned. This board consisted of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, Leonard Bernstein, Hugh Ross, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Boris Goldovsky and myself.

Scholarships

It has always been the hope of the sponsors of the school that no talented student would be prevented from attending the center for lack of money to pay tuition fees. This year for the first time certain sections of the school are being placed frankly on an all-scholarship basis. This means that any student accepted for active work in the advanced departments will receive tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Fund.

Unfortunately, no funds are available for living expenses. But, with the burden of present tuition fees removed and the basis of admission entirely that of aptitude and talent, the center expects to have an even more brilliant group of students than in the past.

One point I should like to emphasize most strongly. Tanglewood has become so identified in the public mind with advanced work on a pre-professional level that we have not succeeded in making clear to the public at large that a quite different kind of music lover is equally welcome. This year a significant development is planned in this direction. For the first time a section of the school will be called the Tanglewood Study Group, and will work under its own supervisor.

We have secured the services of a remarkable musician from California, Ingolf Dahl — composer, conductor, pianist and musical historian—who will head this division. It will be his job to see to it that the intelligent amateur and music enthusiast, also the general music student and music educator, will combine forces for the exploration, discovery and performance - for - the - joy-of-performing such music as seems appropriate for their needs.

Innovation

Another innovation for this group: Tanglewood has never before accepted students for less than the full six-week summer session. This year, however, in order to make the study group available to those who cannot attend the full school term, students in that division will be accepted for shorter enrollments of two and four weeks as well as six. It goes without saying that members of the study group are encouraged to take part in the varied activities of the school.

A final new development is the opening of the chamber music and song repertoire divisions to students who wish to concentrate in these alone, without the requirement to take part in the orchestra or opera department as has formerly been the case. There has been an increasing demand for just such training from students who wish to concentrate in these special fields. These students, however, are not to be included in the all-scholarship policy mentioned above.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 24 1952

Boston Symphony Coming Here Next Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play here in April, 1953, at one of the concerts of the Worcester Civic Music Association, John H. Hitchcock, association president, announced yesterday.

It will be the Boston Symphony's first concert in Worcester in almost seven years.

Program Arranged

Members of the association's talent committee met yesterday afternoon in Hotel Sheraton to select the musicians to be heard at other concerts of the 1952-53 season. Announcements are completed, Mr. Hitchcock said.

Leslie B. Goff, membership campaign director, said that one change will be made this year in accepting applications for admissions to the Civic Music concert series.

Applications for new and renewed memberships will be honored only during April.

A group of 200 volunteer workers will take part in the April membership drive, Mr. Goff said.

Membership is limited to 3500 persons, the seating capacity of the Auditorium. The subscription fee for the season is $6.

CONDUCTOR

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who is scheduled to bring the orchestra to Worcester in April, 1953, for one of the Worcester Civic Music Association concerts.

SYMPHONY

Continued from Page One

Mr. Goff said that he believed the subscription fee was low enough to assure a capacity membership.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been presented by the Worcester Civic Music Association 11 times. The first appearance was made Dec. 11, 1933 and the most recent on March 19, 1946.

Considered one of the finest music organizations in the world, the Boston Symphony was founded by Henry L. Higginson in 1881. It's present conductor is Charles Munch, successor to the late Serge Koussevitzky.

O. O. Bottorff, president of the Civic Concerts Service, New York City, who met with the association's talent committee yesterday, praised the local group for the excellence of the programs it has presented since its founding in 1931.

He said that both the association and the city itself were noted throughout the country for high musical standards.

In addition to Mr. Hitchcock, members of the talent committee are Mrs. Phyllis Lations Hanson, Alfred W. G. Peterson, Mrs. Robert S. Ward, William Self, Mrs. Gerald Fales and David D. Kaplan.

Association officers are Mr. Hitchcock, president; Stanley W. Norwood, H. Earle Johnson and Mrs. C. Raymond Hagstrom, vice-presidents; Joseph G. Byran, treasurer; Miss Leon McDermid, secretary, and Mr. Goff, campaign director.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 24 1952

DEBUT MADE HERE BY FRENCH PIANIST

Monique de la Bruchollerie Gives a Familiar Program in Carnegie Hall Recital

MONIQUE DE LA BRUCHOLLERIE, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Prelude and Fugue in G minor ..... Bach
Variations on Ah, vous dirai-je, maman ..... Mozart
Sonata in B Flat minor ..... Chopin
Three Preludes: Jardins dans la pluie; La... que lente ..... Debussy
Toccata ..... Saint-Saens

By OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Monique de la Bruchollerie, who had a brilliant success when she appeared as soloist in the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday, gave her first New York recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Her program traversed familiar fields, and it may be said that when a wholly conventional program is offered it is highly desirable that the interpretations be distinguished ones, since the interest will center entirely in effect and originality.

There had been certain reservations about the interpretation of the concerto, despite its brilliancy, but there was reason to believe that if passages of the concerto demanded more power and grandeur than the pianist could always bring to bear, the more modest dimensions of a recital program would reveal subtler characteristics and a more clearly outlined individuality.

But there was little that was exceptional in the interpretations of yesterday afternoon. The best moments as they impressed us, were the opening of the Bach G minor fugue — the smaller one — when sustained phrases were finely sung with the suggestion, not mere imitation of the contrasting registers of the organ; in the charming variations of Mozart upon "Ah! Vous dirai-je Maman," played with exceptional loveliness and delicacy of tone, and the glittering Toccata of Saint-Saëns, tossed off with exemplary bravura and virtuoso spirit.

The Chopin B minor sonata was superficially interpreted, in the first movement, along conventional lines and with none too clean execution; in the second without the transformative imagination that should be brought to this haunted tonal vision of the battlefield; in the Funeral March with unsteadiness of tempo and pulse, not justified by the conception.

In the five Debussy pictures, the passage that stood out beyond the others was the final page of "Cathédrale engloutre," when the pianist projected her own conception of this place and painted it for us in significant tone-colors. There is a degree of wit and eccentricity in the "General Lavine" that it was not given. More saliency of line and articulation was needed for "La Fille au cheveux." "Jardin de la pruie" had fluency and exterior coloring, but not inside mood. The "Plus que lent," a pleasant little piece, was pleasantly given.

There was a large audience with many recalls for the pianist, who added at the end to the printed program.

This Clipping From
BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for thee weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

[94]

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

Boston Symphony will play in Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring. This was announced by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the congress, and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. It is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century.

The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression.

To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the RIAS (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestre Nationale, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director. It will give six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer.

Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson - Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts" as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St. Theater in New York in 1934.

In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years.

Prominent American men of letters also will participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

Conductor Will Return To Boston

BOSTON, Feb. 23—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba, in greatly improved health after his recent illness. He will return shortly to Boston and expects to lead the concerts for the rest of the season.

After a week's tour that ended in New York Saturday, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the orchestra concerts since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will take the concerts of the following week, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and on the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses of which he is the conductor. Munch will conduct Bach's "St. John Passion" in Holy Week.

Munch will bring the Boston season to a close in April 26. On April 28 he will accompany the orchestra on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for six weeks beginning July 5.

PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STAR
FEB 24 1952

charge.

Horblit Award

The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship to introduce his Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
FEB 24 1952

France Plans Arts Festival

Expect Tourist Rush When Spring Comes

Spring, like thousands of Americans, will be arriving soon in France. The fruit trees will burst into glorious bloom in Normandy, wild flowers will blossom in the fields of Auvergne and the Loire region, and the morning sunlight will flash in the fountains of the Place de la Concorde in Paris.

Spring is something extra-special in France, and for that reason the French observe the season with extraordinary events that never fail to excite the attention of footloose Americans. A headline attraction this year, and one of major interest to Americans, it to be the Paris Arts Festival. Titled "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," this epic month-long program of music, drama, art and literature will open April 30.

Performing groups will include the Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux conducting, the Paris Opera, the New York City Ballet, the Vienna State Opera, and the Orchestra and Chorus of the Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the world premiere of "Oedipus Rex," an opera he recently completed with Jean Cocteau. The Paris Festival of the Arts will also include an exhibition of two hundred European and American paintings of the 20th century.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 24 1952

Charles Munch To Be Director At Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, which will open its 10th season June 30. Munch, now in Havana recuperating from a long illness, is expected to return to conduct the Boston concerts next month.

He will conduct the six concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20, drawing his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STAR
FEB 24 1952

Boston Symphony To Play In Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House May 6, according to an announcement by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

This Clipping From
YAKIMA, WASH.
HERALD

U. S. Represented At Paris Festival

NEW YORK (UP)—The United States will be well represented at the forthcoming Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom and scheduled for Paris in May.

The theme of the congress is the intellectual and artistic achievements by men of the free world in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera on May 6. The entire orchestra will be transported abroad and in addition to its engagements during the Paris festival, will be heard in The Hague, Amsterdam, various cities in Western Germany and possibly in Belgium and Italy. The orchestra is headed by Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, associate conductor.

The New York City Ballet Company also will attend the exposition, which is called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Igor Stravinsky will conduct two ballets based on his scores. Bruno Walter, who will lead the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, also will represent the United States, as will the Hall Johnson Choir.

Orchestras from England, Switzerland and Italy will be heard. There will be a group of operas, including Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" by the Vienna State Opera and Benjamin Britten's "Billy Budd" in the Covent Garden production.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
FEB 24 1952

Dates Announced For Festival At Berkshire

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this Summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
FEB 25

New Features For Tanglewood Are Announced

Charles Munch, music dire[ctor] of the Boston Symphon[y] tra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school at Tangle[wood] announces several addi[tions] the plans for the s[chool] will hold its tenth sess[ion] weeks beginning June 30. [There] will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the Summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus; and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola again will come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

Munch Announces New Features for the Berkshire Music Center

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the Summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola again will come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 25 1952

unch Announces New atures for the rkshire Music Center

les Munch, music director of ston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Cen- e orchestra's Summer school nglewood, announces several ons in the plans for the school, will hold its 10th session for eks beginning June 30.

re will be a new and much ed scholarship policy, which ward tuition grants from the ewood Revolving Scholarship to all active students in the ced departments. The school's rship policy, which always has generous, is now broadened to make it possible for pre-pro- nal students to be admitted on derations of musical promise without regard for their pres- bility to pay tuition.

ther development is the ar- ment that advanced students concentrate on chamber music g repertoire alone. An impor- new feature of the Summer n will be an expanded depart- for general music students, ucators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study p, it will be headed by Ingolf and will carry into the field of mporary music the collegium um idea of group performance e pleasure of the participants. nts in this department who are ble to attend the full six-week n will be able to enroll for two ur weeks.

faculty, in addition to 20 bers of the Boston Symphony, include Aaron Copland as as- t director and teacher of com- ion; Leonard Bernstein in e of conducting and the stu- orchestra; William Kroll as of the chamber music depart- while Gregor Piatigorsky is ave of absence; Hugh Ross in e of chorus; and Boris Goldov- of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will come from Italy to teach position. The Berkshire Music er may be addressed at Sym- y Hall, Boston 15.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 25 1952

W FEATURES NNOUNCED AT USIC CENTER

der Scholarship Policies Part of Tanglewood Program

rles Munch, music director of oston Symphony Orchestra and or of the Berkshire Music Cen- he orchestra's summer school at lewood, announces several addi- in the plans for the school, h will hold its 10th session for eeks beginning June 30. There be a new and much enlarged ship policy which will award on grants from the Tanglewood olving Scholarship Fund to al e students in the advanced de- ments. The school's scholarshi y, which has always been gen s is now broadened to help mak ossible for pre-professional stu s to be admitted on consideration musical promise alone, without re d for their present ability to pa tion.

ther development is the a ement that advanced studen concentrate on chamber music o repertoire alone. An importan feature of the summer sessio n expanded department fo music students, music educ and amateurs. Called the Tangl Study Group, it will be heade Ingolf Dahl and will carry in ld of contemporary music t gium musicum idea of group pe mance for the pleasure of the pa ants. Students in this departme are not able to attend the f week session will be able to enr two or four weeks.

he Berkshire Music Center intained by the Boston Symph hestra in connection with kshire festival concerts. The f in addition to twenty memb the Boston Symphony, will in ron Copland as assistant di cher of composition; Leon ein in charge of conduct the student orchestra; Willi ell as head of the chamber mu artment while Gregor Piatigor on leave of absence; Hugh Ross rge of chorus, and Boris Gold of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola n come from Italy to teach co tion. The Berkshire Music Cen be addressed at Symphony H on 15.

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
FEB 24 1952

Boston Symphony will play in Europe

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's great musical organizations, has accepted an invitation from the Congress For Cultural Freedom to make its first appearance in Europe next Spring. This was announced by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the congress, and George E. Judd, the orchestra manager.

The aggregation of 104 players will give three concerts in Paris in May, as a major contribution from the United States to a month-long exposition of the arts. It is aimed at focusing the attention of the world upon the vitality of the cultural achievements by free men during the first half of the 20th Century.

The festival will open in the French capital April 28 and will last through the month of May. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra, has invited his colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share with him in conducting the concerts.

Conceived by intellectuals and financed by philanthropic interests, the Paris exposition of the arts is a dramatization of the efforts of the Congress for Cultural Freedom to assert the existence of a vital culture in the free world, and to demonstrate the validity of freedom of work and expression.

To this end the Paris cultural cavalcade, which bears the overall title "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," will parade undisputed bests in the fields of symphony, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy.

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra will thus join in Paris with such other of the free world's celebrated musical organizations as the Vienna State Opera, presenting the Alban Berg opera "Wozzeck"; the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome; the RIAS (Radio) Orchestra from West Berlin; the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, from Geneva; the Orchestra du Conservatoire and the Orchestre Nationale, both from Paris.

In other fields the United States will be represented by the New York City Ballet Company, of which George Balanchine is artistic director. It will give six performances, one program of ballets with music by Igor Stravinsky to be conducted by the composer.

Plans are being formulated for an all-Negro company to perform the Virgil Thomson - Gertrude Stein opera "Four Saints in Three Acts" as staged by John Houseman, it was given 48 performances at the former 44th St. Theater in New York in 1934.

In the realm of art, James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art, has been commissioned to assemble an exhibition of some 200 contemporary French, Dutch, American paintings, including many that have not been shown in Paris for many years.

Prominent American men of letters also will participate in lectures and forums to be held throughout the exposition.

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

Conductor Will Return To Boston

BOSTON, Feb. 23—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in Havana, Cuba, in greatly improved health after his recent illness. He will return shortly to Boston and expects to lead the concerts for the rest of the season.

After a week's tour that ended in New York Saturday, Ernest Ansermet, who has been conducting the orchestra concerts since mid-December, will return to his own orchestra in Geneva, Switzerland. Richard Burgin, associate conductor, will take the concerts of the following week, after which Leonard Bernstein, who has been wintering in Mexico, will be guest conductor for two weeks in Boston and on the last tour of the season.

G. Wallace Woodworth will present Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" March 21 and 22 with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses of which he is the conductor. Munch will conduct Bach's "St. John Passion" in Holy Week.

Munch will bring the Boston season to a close in April 26. On April 28 he will accompany the orchestra on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. The Berkshire Festival will be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for six weeks beginning July 5.

PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STAR
FEB 24 1952

charge.

Horblit Award

The Mark M. Horblit Award for 1951 has been given to Lukas Foss for his Second Piano Concerto. The young composer journeyed from Rome where he has been living under a Prix de Rome scholarship to introduce his Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last November.

The Horblit Award, known as "the Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award," was established in 1946 as an annual award for a symphonic composition by a composer resident in the United States.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
FEB 24 1952

France Plans Arts Festival

Expect Tourist Rush When Spring Comes

Spring, like thousands of Americans, will be arriving soon in France. The fruit trees will burst into glorious bloom in Normandy, wild flowers will blossom in the fields of Auvergne and the Loire region, and the morning sunlight will flash in the fountains of the Place de la Concorde in Paris.

Spring is something extra-special in France, and for that reason the French observe the season with extraordinary events that never fail to excite the attention of footloose Americans. A headline attraction this year, and one of major interest to Americans, it to be the Paris Arts Festival. Titled "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," this epic month-long program of music, drama, art and literature will open April 30.

Performing groups will include the Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux conducting, the Paris Opera, the New York City Ballet, the Vienna State Opera, and the Orchestra and Chorus of the Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the world premiere of "Oedipus Rex," an opera he recently completed with Jean Cocteau. The Paris Festival of the Arts will also include an exhibition of two hundred European and American paintings of the 20th century.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 24 1952

Charles Munch To Be Director At Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, which will open its 10th season June 30. Munch, now in Havana recuperating from a long illness, is expected to return to conduct the Boston concerts next month.

He will conduct the six concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20, drawing his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

PEORIA, ILL.
SUNDAY JOURNAL STAR
FEB 24 1952

Boston Symphony To Play In Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, musical director, will make its European debut at the Paris Opera House May 6, according to an announcement by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom.

The celebrated orchestra will play for the month-long Exposition of Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

This Clipping From
YAKIMA, WASH.
HERALD

U. S. Represented At Paris Festival

NEW YORK (UP)—The United States will be well represented at the forthcoming Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom and scheduled for Paris in May.

The theme of the congress is the intellectual and artistic achievements by men of the free world in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera on May 6. The entire orchestra will be transported abroad and in addition to its engagements during the Paris festival, will be heard in The Hague, Amsterdam, various cities in Western Germany and possibly in Belgium and Italy. The orchestra is headed by Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, associate conductor.

The New York City Ballet Company also will attend the exposition, which is called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Igor Stravinsky will conduct two ballets based on his scores. Bruno Walter, who will lead the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, also will represent the United States, as will the Hall Johnson Choir.

Orchestras from England, Switzerland and Italy will be heard. There will be a group of operas, including Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" by the Vienna State Opera and Benjamin Britten's "Billy Budd" in the Covent Garden production.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
FEB 24 1952

Dates Announced For Festival At Berkshire

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this Summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
FEB 25 19[illegible]

New Features For Tanglewood Are Announced

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 25 19[illegible]

Munch Announces New Features for the Berkshire Music Center

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy, which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department, while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus; and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola again will come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 25 1952

unch Announces New atures for the rkshire Music Center

les Munch, music director of ston Symphony Orchestra and r of the Berkshire Music Cen- orchestra's Summer school glewood, announces several ns in the plans for the school, will hold its 10th session for eks beginning June 30.

e will be a new and much ed scholarship policy, which ward tuition grants from the wood Revolving Scholarship to all active students in the ed departments. The school's rship policy, which always has enerous, is now broadened to make it possible for pre-pro- nal students to be admitted on derations of musical promise without regard for their pres- ility to pay tuition.

ther development is the ar- ment that advanced students oncentrate on chamber music g repertoire alone. An impor- new feature of the Summer n will be an expanded depart- for general music students, educators and amateurs. the Tanglewood Study p, it will be headed by Ingolf and will carry into the field of mporary music the collegium um idea of group performance e pleasure of the participants. nts in this department who are ble to attend the full six-week n will be able to enroll for two r weeks.

faculty, in addition to 20 ers of the Boston Symphony, include Aaron Copland as as- t director and teacher of com- on; Leonard Bernstein in e of conducting and the stu- orchestra; William Kroll as of the chamber music depart- while Gregor Piatigorsky is ve of absence; Hugh Ross in e of chorus; and Boris Goldov- of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will come from Italy to teach osition. The Berkshire Music er may be addressed at Sym- y Hall, Boston 15.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 25 1952

W FEATURES NNOUNCED AT USIC CENTER

der Scholarship Policies Part of Tanglewood Program

rles Munch, music director of oston Symphony Orchestra and or of the Berkshire Music Cen- he orchestra's summer school at lewood, announces several addi- in the plans for the school, will hold its 10th session for eeks beginning June 30. There be a new and much enlarged rship policy which will award n grants from the Tanglewood ving Scholarship Fund to al e students in the advanced de ments. The school's scholarshi y, which has always been gen , is now broadened to help ma ossible for pre-professional st to be admitted on consideration usical promise alone, without r for their present ability to pa on.

nother development is the a rement that advanced studen concentrate on chamber music o repertoire alone. An importan feature of the summer sessio be an expanded department fo ral music students, music educa and amateurs. Called the Tangl Study Group, it will be headed Ingolf Dahl and will carry in field of contemporary music t gium musicum idea of group pe mance for the pleasure of the pa ants. Students in this departm are not able to attend the f week session will be able to en two or four weeks.

e Berkshire Music Center ntained by the Boston Symph nestra in connection with kshire Festival concerts. The in addition to twenty mem the Boston Symphony, will in ron Copland as assistant d teacher of composition; Leon nstein in charge of conduc the student orchestra; Will ll as head of the chamber m rtment while Gregor Piatig in leave of absence; Hugh Ro ge of chorus; and Boris Gold of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola n come from Italy to teach tion. The Berkshire Music be addressed at Symphony 15.

[95]

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
FEB 25 1952

New Features For Tanglewood Are Announced

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood study group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 25 1952

Munch Announces New Features for the Berkshire Music Center

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy, which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the Summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department, while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus; and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 25 1952

Munch Announces New Features for the Berkshire Music Center

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 25 1952

De la Bruchollerie

French Pianist Gives First Recital in New York

By Francis D. Perkins

MONIQUE DE LA BRUCHOLLERIE

CARNEGIE HALL

Piano recital Saturday afternoon. The program:

Prelude and Fugue in G minor.....Bach
Variation on "Ah! Vous dirai-je mamam," Mozart
Sonata in B Flat minor.....Chopin
Preludes: La Cathedrale engloutie; General Lavine-excentric; La fille aux cheveux de lin.....Debussy
Jardins sous la pluie; La plus que lente.....Debussy
Toccata.....Saint-Saens

Monique de la Bruchollerie, who made her New York debut eleven days ago as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave her first recital here Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, offering Chopin's sonata in B flat minor as the most extensive work in a concise, varied and mainly familiar program.

The French pianist displayed a remarkably deft, flexible and fluent technique and an ability to realize fine distinctions of tone color and subtleties of volume; her dynamic shading was remarkably well controlled. The lucidity of her musical medium and its thorough disclosure of detail were particularly advantageous in the Bach fugue and the Mozart variations. Uniformity of hue and a sense of mechanized energy, which often mark the performance of a Bach work at the beginning of a piano recital, were absent in this spirited interpretation. The Mozart variations, played with momentum and delicacy, were distinguished for the persuasive differentiation of color and mood in each variation.

In the Chopin sonata, for some undefinable reason, the reviewer did not get an impression of expressive cogency in the interpretation as a whole, although this was present in certain episodes, particularly in part of the scherzo and in the imposing waxing of volume and tension in the funeral march. The first statement of the second theme in the first movement is marked, indeed, sostenuto, but here an unusual deliberation of pace lessened the sense of continuity. The finale was remarkable for its smooth swiftness of pace, suggesting the "wind over the graves" title which is sometimes applied to this movement, but something of the element of tragedy was missing in this notable accomplishment. The tone, apart from a slight hardness in a few climactic or outspoken measures, was consistently musical, in the sonata as well as in the rest of the program.

The Debussy works were played with tonal appeal, variety of color and understanding of musical perspective, but, despite an impression of artistic understanding of this music, the expressive persuasiveness of this group also had its variations. Among the most communicative of the interpretations here were those of "La fille aux cheveux de lin," presented with admirable lyric simplicity, and "La plus que lente," while the Saint-Saens toccata was an appropriate musical vehicle for the illustration of the pianist's technical prowess.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 25 1952

NEW FEATURES ANNOUNCED AT MUSIC CENTER

Broader Scholarship Policies Part of Tanglewood Program

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CAL.
ENTERPRISE

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
FEB 26 1952

Tanglewood Plans To Broaden Music Scholarship Offer

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, will have more non-paying students present on scholarships when it opens for its 10th season on June 30.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Music Center school at Tanglewood, announced today that a broadening of the scholarship policy is among the changes incident to the new season. The new policy, he said, will make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone without regard to their ability to pay. Scholarships generally were reserved in the past for those whose ability had been well established.

Other changes include expansion of the department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. This section of the school, called the Tanglewood study group, will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. And students who cannot stay the entire six weeks will be admitted for two or four.

In another change, Dr. Munch said, advanced students who wish to do so will be permitted to concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

The school, conducted in connection with the Berkshire festival concert season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has a faculty of 26, most of whom are members of the orchestra.

New Features At Tanglewood Next Season

2-26-52

Scholarship Policy Broadened—Study Group Planned

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. A new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
FEB 26 1952

Noted Woodstock Musician Will Return To Tanglewood as Head of Chamber Music

WILLIAM KROLL

The eminent concert violinist and composer William Kroll, also founder of the well known Kroll Quartet, will return to the Tanglewood School this year as head of the chamber music department, according to advice received today which also outlined several new additions in the plans for the tenth session of the summer school. The announcement was made by Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center.

William Kroll is best known perhaps in the field of chamber music. He was first violinist with the Coolidge String Quartet for 10 years before founding his own Kroll Quartet, which has concertized throughout the United States, Mexico and the Hawaiian Islands, and which has appeared frequently during this past season in New York city.

As a composer, Kroll has written works for violin, piano, string quartet and string orchestra. His most popular work, Banjo and Fiddle, has been recorded by Jascha Heifetz for Victor.

For the past several years in Woodstock, where he has been a summer resident for more than 20 years, professional musicians from various parts of the United States have been instructed by Kroll in the art of chamber music. The Maverick Chamber Music concerts have long been of special interest to him.

Enlarged Policy

The school which opens June 30 for six weeks will have a much enlarged scholarship policy. It will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard to their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. Also important, is the new feature of the summer session which will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music, the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be permitted to enroll for two or four weeks.

Faculty

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera.

Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Itay to teach composition.

Additional information may be obtained by addressing Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
FEB 26 1952

Tanglewood Additions

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, plans several additions for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks, beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs.

Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera.

Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 13, Massachusetts.

[76]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 26 1952

Munch Announces New School Features

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as Assistant Director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 26 1952

Munch Announces New School Features

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as Assistant Director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 26 1952

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, has announced a new and much enlarged scholarship policy for the Berkshire center, which will open its 10th season June 30.

The new scholarship policy will make it possible to award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. Pre-professional students may now be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another innovation is that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs, to be called the Tanglewood Study Group, will be headed by Ingolf Dahl. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The faculty will include 20 members of the Boston Symphony with Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition. Leonard Bernstein will be in charge of conducting and the student orchestra and William Kroll will head the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence. Hugh Ross will be in charge of chorus and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

Karol Fairchild and Frances Delfs of this city will sing with the Hope College Chapel Choir in a program to be presented Feb. 27 at Kalamazoo College at Kalamazoo, Mich. The event is being presented by six of Michigan's church related colleges.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 26 1952

New Features At Tanglewood Next Season

Scholarship Policy Broadened—Study Group Planned

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be new and much enenlarged scholarship policy which will award tutition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. A new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
FEB 27 1952

Tanglewood Will Have Many New Developments

One of the surest signs that spring is near is the annual arrival of bulletins from Boston announcing plans for the coming season at Tanglewood. The 1952 Berkshire Music Festival is rapidly taking shape, with every sign that the great musical establishment started by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is going to live on and grow under the leadership of his successors. The Berkshire Music Center, the summer school which Dr. Koussevitzky started in conjunction with the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood, is celebrating its 10th anniversary this summer with a new enlarged scholarship program.

For the first time some parts of the school will be placed on an all-scholarship basis, so that pre-professional students may attend without paying tuition. Any student accepted for active work in the advanced departments will receive tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Fund. They will have to pay only their living expenses.

Another new development at the Music Center will be the Tanglewood Study Group for the intelligent amateur and music enthusiast as well as the general music student and educator. This group will be headed by Ingolf Dahl of California. It will take students for two, four or six weeks, to study and perform together just for the joy of it.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 37,697)

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
FEB 28 1952

NICE GOING!

Boston, Feb. 28—(UP)—A letter from Germany addressed to Charles Munch, Commonwealth 6-1492, Boston, Mass., U. S. A." was delivered promptly to Munch who is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Commonwealth 6-1492 is the telephone number at Symphony Hall.

Charles Munch Announces Berkshire Festival Plans

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces his plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from his recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concerts next month.

The Berkshire Festival will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the Theatre - Concert Hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the Festival Chorus.

The concerts in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; eries B on July 31, August 2, 3; Series C on August 7, 9, 10).

Charles Munch will conduct two concerts in each week, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert each in Series A and B. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Mr. Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

Mr. Munch has accepted the invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30 to August 10, will be the tenth, and will be marked by several new features which are to be announced shortly.

Bernstein, Newey, At Open Rehearsal

At the open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening, starting at 7:30 P. M., Leonard Bernstein will conduct and appear as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in E-flat major, and Patricia Neway will be soloist in Alban Berg's "Der Wein." Miss Newey, born in New York, studied at the Mannes School and in the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center in 1946. The following year she sang the part of the chorus in Benjamin Britten's opera, "The Rape of Lucretia," on Broadway; and in 1950 she created the role of Magda Sorel in Menotti's "The Consul," a role which she sang later in London and in Paris. Her most recent New York appearances have been in "The Dybbuk" and "Cavaleria Rusticana" with the New York City Opera Company.

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony Concerts find Charles Munch back on the job. A week ago last Wednesday at a meeting of the Friends of the Orchestra Mr. Munch made his actual return to Symphony Hall. But this was not a whole concert nor was it a whole audience. The piece that he played then was the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Ariadne" and that stands as the second number on the current program, flanked by the Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

The "Redemption" excerpt had not been heard here since 1922, the Roussel and Berlioz pieces were both performed at the Concerts of Nov. 3 and 4, 1950. In repeating them this week Mr. Munch has gone back on the half-promise he made at the beginning of the season, that he would not play anything that he had done in the two seasons previous. But since then there have been changes in the situation: his own illness, for one, the impending visit to Europe for another. It is quite possible that for his first concert after so many months, Mr. Munch did not wish to undertake the burden of rehearsing new music. It is also a strong possibility that both of these pieces will be taken on the European tour, since they are things in which conductor and orchestra excell.

The orchestral middle-part of Franck's otherwise forgotten oratorio begins, and for some time continues, with the utmost suavity. After that there are lapses into bombast and the end, that would depict the regeneration and redemption of the world, has a touch of theatricality.

It was Mr. Munch who introduced the Roussel Suite to us five years ago and the wonder was at the time that Dr. Koussevitzky had overlooked so good a bet. With its obvious leanings on the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale and the "Daphnis and Chole" of Ravel, this Suite is not music of the highest originality but it is extremely effective, the work of a composer who knows all the tricks. Like most ballet music transferred to the concert hall, it would be even more effective with the explanatory action.

On the other hand, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz has been turned into a ballet, and unnecessarily, since it explains itself quite fully. In listening to it we can never forget, nor should we forget, that it was composed in 1829-30. That was and still is the most amazing thing about it. Today it is in large measure a curiosity, a museum piece, a sort of exhibit of the romantic movement. It is still a piece that challenges both conductors and orchestras and if it has empty spots and passages that do not say much to us today, it is still not deficient in musical interest, while its descriptive powers are almost unrivaled. One might object to the speed at which Mr. Munch takes the conclusion of the final movement, otherwise, his is a definite performance. Though outwardly calmer than of yore, Mr. Munch conducted with his wonted fire, and yesterday, from first to last, the orchestra was at the top of its form.

Number Rings Bell

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 29— A letter from Germany addressed to "Charles Munch, Commonwealth 6-1492, Boston, Mass., U.S.A." was delivered promptly to Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Commonwealth 6-1492 is the telephone number at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON DAILY

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstei
Conducts at Sym

By CYRUS DURGI

Leonard Bernstein is guest conductor of the Bos phony Orchestra, his first pearance with this org
since December of 1949.
gram of yesterday afterr tonight brings two scores zart: the Overture to "Th tion from the Seraglio" ar flat Piano Concerto (K. which he is both soloist
ductor; Berg's concert a Wein," with Patricia New loist, and the Fifth Sym Sibelius.

The late Alban Berg's a posed in 1929, is a musica ity, a setting in 12-tone
Stefan George's German
tion of Baudelaire's "Le could be added that "D is more curiosity than go or good wine. It could b added that a Frenchma have made a much more ate setting of these verses age to the powers of w could a Viennese, especia
ciple of the 12-tone syste

The piece, in sum, is ponderous, with not a scra ody as melody is consti side the tortured artifici the 12-tone system, and and thankless piece to si are three sections: "The Wine" (a delineation of
of wine to escape from
and warm the throat and man); "The Wine of Lo
"The Wine of Solitude," the precious fluid become tion of poets. Not one sounds anything like wi effects.

I consulted two friend them wine connoisseurs.
first: "The wine has (spoiled)." Said the sec ing in mind the singing well as the music: "A lo
ment in an attractive ne
At any rate, Miss Newa mired heroine of Menc Consul" last season, did against Berg's oftentime noisy orchestra. She sho vited back again, and to thing which would give notion of her considerab

The interpretive gifts
Bernstein, continuing to over the years, were on display yesterday. Th Overture substituted, fo of running time, for the announced "Eine Kleine
sik") was admirably do fleet and properly styled.
certo went well, too, tho convinced that when a also plays a solo part, o
other is bound to be sca Bernstein played with co
yet the opening of the th
ment was poorly phrased this performance seemed would have been better w person to oversee the p
the whole.

The biggest interpreti
Mr. Bernstein came in t
Fifth Symphony, a w work, and one which ha heard here since the las ance by Serge Koussev

Wein
curre to "T lio," Sibel
Be back dient
Die entu
c"; run oyr en
Co
I a irt en rd
Re
It
he
the wh pla ate see B lair fun me cur to sin
Ma

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstein Conducts at Symphony

BY CYRUS DURGIN

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As the sixth conductor to lead the Boston Symphony in this, the most unsettled of its many seasons, Leonard Bernstein took over yesterday. He indulged in his pet practice of both playing and conducting a piano concerto, choosing for his vehicle Mozart's in E-flat (K. 271). There was another soloist in the person of Patricia Neway, known to Boston theatre-goers through her vivid enactment of the part of Magda Sorel in Menotti's "The Consul." Miss Neway is slated to sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," next April, when the New York City Opera performs that disputed work, and at this week's concerts she is introducing to Boston a Berg composition, the "concert aria," "Der Wein." The other numbers on the current list are Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio," and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

Because of the opera's Turkish background, Mozart found it expedient to use in the Overture to "Die Entfuehrung" what in the 18th century was called "Turkish music"; the triangle, cymbals and bass drum. Through the plentiful employment of the first-named instrument, glitter is here added to gaiety, and yesterday's concert began on a very pleasant note.

Considering that he wrote it at 21, Mozart's rarely heard Concerto is a work of surprising maturity, particularly in the grave slow movement. Mr. Bernstein's playing yesterday was deft and sensitive, if here and there a little mannered. It has been noted before, when he assumed this dual role, that the orchestra gets along so well when Mr. Bernstein is too busy playing to conduct, that his elaborate hand-waving at other times seems a bit superfluous.

Berg's version of three Baudelaire poems celebrating different functions and aspects of the fermented juice of the grape is a curious and troubling music, hardly to be taken in completely at a single hearing. The indebtedness to Mahler's "Song of the Earth" is obvious, and when Berg submits to this influence, the music, for all its 12-tone basis, has considerable appeal. When he relies on the somewhat arbitrary methods of his teacher, Schoenberg, Berg is less convincing, though always interesting to hear. Our thanks to Mr. Bernstein, Miss Neway and the orchestra for a superb performance.

Possibly the Sibelius Fifth was included as a tribute to Koussevitzky, who conducted it here so often, and, for the last time, a year ago last November. Mr. Bernstein's reading was patently a Koussevitzky copy. At times it seemed almost a Koussevitsky caricature. And his elaborate conducting gestures suggested Koussevitzsky's without having the same naturalness, eloquence and inevitability.

had made the score peculiarly his own.

Much it is to Mr. Bernstein's credit that he gave an engrossing and mostly admirable reading of it. Though there were a few seemingly nervous moments, there were also some legitimate details which he brought out, not conspicious in the Koussevitzky reading, after which Mr. Bernstein's performance obviously was modeled.

The orchestra played excellently for Mr. Bernstein, and although the tone was inclined to be dry in Mozart, there was a superb richness and depth throughout the Sibelius Symphony.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 1 - 1952

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As the sixth conductor to lead the Boston Symphony in this, the most unsettled of its many seasons, Leonard Bernstein took over yesterday. He indulged in his pet practice of both playing and conducting a piano concerto, choosing for his vehicle Mozart's in E-flat (K. 271). There was another soloist in the person of Patricia Neway, known to Boston theatre-goers through her vivid enactment of the part of Magda Sorel in Menotti's "The Consul." Miss Neway is slated to sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," next April, when the New York City Opera performs that disputed work, and at this week's concerts she is introducing to Boston a Berg composition, the "concert aria," "Der Wein." The other numbers on the current list are Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio," and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

Because of the opera's Turkish background, Mozart found it expedient to use in the Overture to "Die Entfuehrung" what in the 18th century was called "Turkish music"; the triangle, cymbals and bass drum. Through the plentiful employment of the first-named instrument, glitter is here added to gaiety, and yesterday's concert began on a very pleasant note.

Considering that he wrote it at 21, Mozart's rarely heard Concerto is a work of surprising maturity, particularly in the grave slow movement. Mr. Bernstein's playing yesterday was deft and sensitive, if here and there a little mannered. It has been noted before, when he assumed this dual role, that the orchestra gets along so well when Mr. Bernstein is too busy playing to conduct, that his elaborate hand-waving at other times seems a bit superfluous.

Berg's version of three Baudelaire poems celebrating different functions and aspects of the fermented juice of the grape is a curious and troubling music, hardly to be taken in completely at a single hearing. The indebtedness to Mahler's "Song of the Earth" is obvious, and when Berg submits to this influence, the music, for all its 12-tone basis, has considerable appeal. When he relies on the somewhat arbitrary methods of his teacher, Schoenberg, Berg is less convincing, though always interesting to hear. Our thanks to Mr. Bernstein, Miss Neway and the orchestra for a superb performance.

Possibly the Sibelius Fifth was included as a tribute to Koussevitzky, who conducted it here so often, and, for the last time, a year ago last November. Mr. Bernstein's reading was patently a Koussevitzky copy. At times it seemed almost a Koussevitsky caricature. And his elaborate conducting gestures suggested Koussevitzsky's without having the same naturalness, eloquence and inevitability.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 1 - 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the 17th program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Bernstein was the soloist in the Mozart concerto. Patricia Neway, soprano, was soloist in the Berg. The program:

Overture to "Die Entfuehrung." Concerto No. 9 in E flat (K.271)...Mozart
"Der Wein".....Berg
Symphony No. 5 in E flat, Op. 82.....Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE RETURN of Leonard Bernstein as conductor and soloist, after a season away from us, may be described as a pleasant change of pace. He took over yesterday—and to say that he took over is putting it pallidly—and gave us a thoroughly good time.

Mr. Bernstein's style is, as had long been remarked, Koussevitzkyesque in the extreme, which is hardly surprising considering that Koussevitzky was both his mentor and his idol. His approach is that of the virtuoso conductor whose mission is the recreation of music by means of inspiring his men through gesture, exhortation and a virtual choreographic pantomime of the music he conducts. It is interesting to watch, when he doesn't overdo it, and the results are exciting to listen to, especially in music that makes much of romantic excess.

Yesterday it was the Sibelius that gave Mr. Bernstein his particular opportunity in that respect and he made the most of it. The work has long since, in Koussevitzky's repeated performances of it, been especially established in Boston. In so incandescent a reading as it got yesterday, with all the soaring string tone that was the late conductor's crowning glory, with the ever-increasing intensity of the finale and with the chord sequence at the end, it reminded the listener of old times.

* * *

But if this sort of thing is Mr. Bernstein's forte, there is no denying him an almost equal capacity to do the more refined, more elegant and more reposed subtleties of Mozart. His reading of the Overture was exquisite, though his conducting often seemed needlessly showy. In the Concerto, which is one of Mozart's earlier but by no means lesser works in the form, Mr. Bernstein essayed the role of both soloist and conductor, leading the orchestra from the piano bench in a way that has become inimitable with him. He does this sort of thing about as well as any conductor today, seldom making too much of a fuss of conducting or too much of a display piece of the keyboard role.

* * *

Berg's "Der Wein," an extended song set for soprano and orchestra, made its first appearance on these programs yesterday afternoon with Patricia Neway singing the part. The work is one of those 12-tone double-acrostic things put together with a slide rule, calipers and T squares and sounds perfectly horrid from beginning to end. In it the late disciple of Schoenberg sings a rhapsody for that invaluable institution known as wine, first as to its soul, next as to its role in love and finally as to its qualities of poetic inspiration, the whole lasting about 15 minutes and providing a singer with one of the most terrible and thankless tasks imaginable.

Although there is no doubt that the wine Mr. Berg speaks of is a vintage that was blended with nux vomica and faultily corked the curious thing is that it makes as much effect as it does. It is easy enough to see how this music were it heard within the frame of an operatic performance (as for instance in "Wozzeck"), would prove far more significant and be more gripping. The concert aria, however, finds an audience with no alternative but to listen; its theatrical emotions are not aroused and it consequently evaluates what it hears a good deal more acutely than it does in the opera house.

EXAMINED ON THESE terms, Berg's "Der Wein" is a total failure, though this is not to say it isn't interesting or that it doesn't deserve an outing. Now that it has had it, however, it may be put back on the shelf until another soprano has the technique and the conviction to do. Miss Neway, whose role in "The Consul" lifted her to deserved eminence, is clearly one of our most gifted singing musicians. Her voice is powerful and dramatic, her musicianship so acute that she sang this incredibly unvocal piece with unerring pitch despite the sounds attacking her from every direction. This is not to say anybody would have known the difference had she made it all up as she went along, but it's quite a trick just the same.

The program next week, Mr. Bernstein conducting, offers Beethoven's C minor Quartet (played by the string orchestra) and the Fourth Concerto with Artur Rubinstein.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 1 - 1952

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstein Conducts at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein is back as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his first local appearance with this organization since December of 1949. His program of yesterday afternoon and tonight brings two scores of Mozart: the Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and the E-flat Piano Concerto (K. 271) in which he is both soloist and conductor; Berg's concert aria, "Der Wein," with Patricia Neway as soloist, and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

The late Alban Berg's aria, composed in 1929, is a musical curiosity, a setting in 12-tone style of Stefan George's German translation of Baudelaire's "Le Vin." It could be added that "Der Wein" is more curiosity than good music or good wine. It could be further added that a Frenchman would have made a much more appropriate setting of these verses in homage to the powers of wine than could a Viennese, especially a disciple of the 12-tone system.

The piece, in sum, is long and ponderous, with not a scrap of melody as melody is construed outside the tortured artificialities of the 12-tone system, and a difficult and thankless piece to sing. There are three sections: "The Soul of Wine" (a delineation of the desire of wine to escape from the bottle and warm the throat and heart of man); "The Wine of Lovers" and "The Wine of Solitude," wherein the precious fluid becomes inspiration of poets. Not one of them sounds anything like wine or its effects.

I consulted two friends, both of them wine connoisseurs. Said the first: "The wine has maderized (spoiled)." Said the second, having in mind the singing artist as well as the music: "A lot of sediment in an attractive new bottle." At any rate, Miss Neway, the admired heroine of Menotti's "The Consul" last season, did her best against Berg's oftentimes ragingly noisy orchestra. She should be invited back again, and to sing something which would give a better notion of her considerable talents.

The interpretive gifts of Mr. Bernstein, continuing to increase over the years, were on exacting display yesterday. The Mozart Overture (substituted, for reasons of running time, for the previously announced "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik") was admirably done, crisp, fleet and properly styled. The Concerto went well, too, though I am convinced that when a conductor also plays a solo part, one or the other is bound to be scamped. Mr. Bernstein played with competence, yet the opening of the third movement was poorly phrased. Good as this performance seemed, it surely would have been better with a third person to oversee the progress of the whole.

Bernstein conducting, offers Beethoven's C minor Quartet (played by the string orchestra) and the Fourth Concerto with Artur Rubinstein.

[98]

Which brings to mind an article shown in the Wall Street Journal some weeks ago about "serious" music and its financial results. It starts out by saying that "America, land of jazz, turns out to be lover of symphony, too; $45 million-a-year receipts of the 'long-haired' events surpass baseball gate."

All over the country devotees of such related types of art as opera and ballet are appearing in ever-growing numbers. In 1951 more than 30,000,000 folks paid money to attend performances of "serious" music. This is about 30 percent more than five years ago and nearly double the number in 1941.

Columbia Concerts—who gives us our Community Concerts—estimates that three times as many concerts were given in the United States during 1951 as in the rest of the world combined.

Further evidence of the way serious music is spreading geographically may be seen in the growth of the number of symphony orchestras identified with a specific town. Some, like the New York Philharmonic and the Boston, St. Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati symphonies, have been in business since the 19th century. But in the last ten years orchestras have sprung up in much smaller places—to mention a few—Phœnix, Ariz., Austin, Texas; Bridgeport, Conn.; Jackson, Miss., etc.

Among the reasons given for making America into a land of lovers of great music, comes a statement from John Woolford, manager of the Baltimore Symphony, who thinks concerts for school children, such as those given by his orchestra over the past decade, have helped deveop a taste for sylmphonic music. Increased music education in the public schools has helped, too. Sol Hurok, independent, and famous, impressario, thinks program reform has been in part responsible for the upturn in serious music listening.

TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

Berkshire Music Festival Planned

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced his plans for the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from a recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concert next month.

The Berkshire festival will consist of two concert series, one in the theater-concert hall with Munch conducting, and programs drawn from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

Munch will conduct two concerts each week in the music shed series, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert in each series. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN-REVIEW

Orchestra's Trip Poses Problem

That European visit of the Boston symphony has posed an incidental problem of no small magnitude, for the orchestra will be away from Boston for the month of May, when the traditional and vastly popular "Pops" series takes place. Most communities, one imagines, would just suspend the "Pops" for a month, but Bostonians don't solve difficulties by evading them.

Arthur Fiedler, "Pops" specialist, has undertaken to organize a new orchestra, drawing on a large pool of Boston-trained musicians who belong to the American Federation of Musicians local but spend the winters playing in orchestras all over the county. Such seasons are universally over by mid-April, and Fiedler expects to have a very good No. 2 orchestra when the first cork pops at the "Pops."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1952

U. S. Represented In Arts Exposition

New York — (UP)—The United States will be well-represented at the forthcoming Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom and scheduled for Paris in May.

The theme of the congress is the intellectual and artistic achievements by men of the free world in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

* * *

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera on May 6. The entire orchestra will be transported abroad and in addition to its engagements during the Paris festival, will be heard in The Hague, Amsterdam, various cities in western Germany and possibly in Belgium and Italy. The orchestra is headed by Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, associate conductor.

The New York City Ballet Company also will attend the exposition, which is called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Igor Stravinsky will conduct two ballets based on his scores.

* * *

BRUNO WALTER, who will lead the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, also will represent the United States, as will the Hall Johnston Choir.

Orchestras from England, Switzerland and Italy will be heard. There will be a group of operas, including Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" by the Vienna State Opera and Benjamin Britten's "Billy Budd" in the Covent Garden production.

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Plans Changed At Berkshires

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire music center, Tanglewood, Mass., announces several additions in plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy. The school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six week session will be able to enrol for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire music center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Ladies Music Club will present the University of Oklahoma String Trio in concert at 8:15 p. m. Friday at the Oklahoma City University Auditorium. The trio is composed of Robert Gerle, violinist; Gabriel Magyar, cellist, and Keith Wallingford, pianist.

The program will be as follows:

Trio in E flat Major ..... Beethoven
Trio in C Major, Op. 87 ..... Brahms
Intermission
Trio in A minor ..... Ravel

At 10 a. m. Saturday a Master class fo rstring students will be presented. These classes will be held in the Oriole Room of the Fine Arts Building of Oklahoma City University.

The idea for the Master class was conceived in order to benefit all string students throughout the state, and also to promote study of string instruments in the public schools.

The trio will also teach the class. These classes and the Friday night concert are free to all string students.

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 1 - 1952

Ernest Ansermet's continuing substitution for Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony brought several unscheduled events to the total of February music-making, including the debuts of Monique de la Bruchollerie and Arthur Grumiaux, together with the first performance of Honegger's "Monopartita." Bruchollerie is plainly a pianist of consequence, with a fine even finger strength, a finesse and tonal definition that would have been interesting in Mozart. That she played the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff suggests that life among the artists is far from simple. This was better than academic Rachmaninoff, but wanting the authority, the substance, the drive inherent in the music. Grumiaux, of Belgium, did play Mozart (G major Concerto, No. 3) with a suavity, a sweetness, and yet a robustness of style that put one in mind of Jacques Thibaud in his great days. For Mozart his tone was sensuously broad and full, yet controlled by a bow arm marvelously disciplined to a total always appropriate. Grumiaux, who is thirtyish, should be with us for years to come.

Honegger's "Monopartita," for all its science and propulsion, added to no more than another demonstration of the limited stature of even today's most respected composers. It compresses five tempo changes into a single consecutive movement lasting about fifteen minutes, in a rather lifeless pattern of busy rhythms not too well integrated.

Also new during this week was a Dohnányi Concerto for Violin (No. 2 in C minor), introduced at a Philharmonic-Symphony seance by Frances Magnes, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. It runs to four movements, and ventures new territory by subtracting the violins from the orchestral strings, with the intent to give the soloist more prominence. To my ear, the odd prominence of the lower strings—violas, cellos, and basses—was more of a distraction than any conventional scoring, hence a double disservice to the soloist. Miss Magnes played powerfully, if a little crudely, with a big tone not notable for warmth.

—Irving Kolodin.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
MAR 2 - 1952

France Opens Its Arms To Americans in Spring

Spring, like thousands of Americans, soon will be arriving in France. The fruit trees will burst into bloom in Normandy, wild flowers will blossom in the fields of Auvergne and the Loire region, and the sunlight will flash in the fountains of the Place de la Concorde in Paris.

Spring is something extra-special in France, and for that reason the French observe the season with extraordinary events that never fail to excite the attention of Americans. A headline attraction this year, and one of major interest to Americans, is to be the Paris Arts Festival. Titled, Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century, this epic month-long program of music, drama, art and literature will open April 30th.

Performing groups will include the Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux conducting, the Paris Opera, the New York City Ballet, the Vienna State Opera, and the Orchestra and Chorus of the Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the world premiere of Oedipus Rex, an opera he recently completed with Jean Cocteau. The Paris Festival of the Arts will also include an exhibition of 200 European and American paintings of the 20th century.

Also scheduled for 2000-year-old Paris in the Spring is the Second International Salon du Jazz, March 29th-April 6th. A show of photography and cinema will be held March 30th and 31st at the Parc des Expositions.

Elsewhere in France, saluting the Spring season, there will be agricultural and international fairs. Toulouse has one from March 22d to April 6th. It also has its great music festival from May 27th to June 10th. Nantes will have a fair April 3d-16th and Lyon April 19th-28th. The Spring Fair at Avignon, where the Palace of the Popes is located, will be held this year from May 3d to 12th. The Ham Fair of Bayonne in the Basque country will take place April 10th, 11th and 12th. The Fair of Flowers of Bordeaux is scheduled for May 16th-17th.

After Spring has had its way in France, Summer will come in for its fair share of fun and excitement. From Paris, with its continual round of gayety, the pattern of pleasure will stretch to Prades for the Casals Music Festival June 15th-29th, to Vichy for a season of opera in July, to Menton on the Riviera for a music festival August 1st-12th, and to Besancon for its 5th International Festival of Music September 4th-14th.

Countless other resorts and areas of France are also ready to put their best foot forward and welcome visitors with hospitality. Normandy, Brittany, the chateaux country, the Dordogne Valley, the bracing Pyrenees all will have the welcome mat out.

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
MAR 2 - 1952

Orchestra To Tour

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, TEXAS
PROGRESS

Charles Munch, music d... of the Boston Symp... tra, has announced plans ... Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival ... in two parts. There will be ... concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall ... day evenings and Sat... noons, July 5-6, 12-13 ... will conduct, and will ... his

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

Tanglewood On Tour 10th Season

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will have its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood study group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival of concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

This Clipping From NEWARK, N...
NEWS
MAR 2 - 1...

Berkshire M... Center's

Charles Munch, mu... of the Boston Symph... and director of the ... Music Center, the Orch... mer school at Tang... nounces several addit... plans for the school, ... hold its tenth session f... beginning June 30. T... a new and much enla... ship policy.

The Center is maint... Boston Symphony Or... with its Berkshire ... certs. The faculty, in... 20 members of the ... include Aaron Copland ... director and teacher ... tion, Leonard Bernste... of conducting and th... chestra, William Kro... the chamber music ... while Gregor Piatig... leave of absence, Hu... charge of chorus, and ... ovsky of opera. Luig... will again come fro... composition. The B... Center may be ad... phony Hall, Boston

[99]

3/1/52

Which brings to mind an article shown in the Wall Street Journal some weeks ago about "serious" music and its financial results. It starts out by saying that "America, land of jazz, turns out to be lover of symphony, too; $45 million-a-year receipts of the 'long-haired' events surpass baseball gate."

All over the country devotees of such related types of art as opera and ballet are appearing in ever-growing numbers. In 1951 more than 30,000,000 folks paid money to attend performances of "serious" music. This is about 30 percent more than five years ago and nearly double the number in 1941.

Columbia Concerts—who gives us our Community Concerts—estimates that three times as many concerts were given in the United States during 1951 as in the rest of the world combined.

Further evidence of the way serious music is spreading geographically may be seen in the growth of the number of symphony orchestras identified with a specific town. Some, like the New York Philharmonic and the Boston, St. Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati symphonies, have been in business since the 19th century. But in the last ten years orchestras have sprung up in much smaller places—to mention a few—Phœnix, Ariz., Austin, Texas; Bridgeport, Conn.; Jackson, Miss., etc.

Among the reasons given for making America into a land of lovers of great music, comes a statement from John Woolford, manager of the Baltimore Symphony, who thinks concerts for school children, such as those given by his orchestra over the past decade, have helped deveop a taste for symphonic music. Increased music education in the public schools has helped, too. Sol Hurok, independent, and famous, impressario, thinks program reform has been in part responsible for the upturn in serious music listening.

TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

Berkshire Music Festival Planned

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced his plans for the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He is now in Havana to recuperate from a recent illness, and will resume his leadership of the Boston concert next month.

The Berkshire festival will consist of two concert series, one in the theater-concert hall with Munch conducting, and programs drawn from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

Munch will conduct two concerts each week in the music shed series, while Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at Tanglewood, will conduct one concert in each series. Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week. Choral projects announced by Munch will include Honegger's "Dance of Death," and Berlioz' Requiem, for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN-REVIEW

Orchestra's Trip Poses Problem

That European visit of the Boston symphony has posed an incidental problem of no small magnitude, for the orchestra will be away from Boston for the month of May, when the traditional and vastly popular "Pops" series takes place. Most communities, one imagines, would just suspend the "Pops" for a month, but Bostonians don't solve difficulties by evading them.

Arthur Fiedler, "Pops" specialist, has undertaken to organize a new orchestra, drawing on a large pool of Boston-trained musicians who belong to the American Federation of Musicians local but spend the winters playing in orchestras all over the county. Such seasons are universally over by mid-April, and Fiedler expects to have a very good No. 2 orchestra when the first cork pops at the "Pops."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1952

U. S. Represented In Arts Exposition

New York — (UP)—The United States will be well-represented at the forthcoming Exposition of the Arts sponsored by the Congress for Cultural Freedom and scheduled for Paris in May.

The theme of the congress is the intellectual and artistic achievements by men of the free world in the past 50 years in the fields of music, ballet, painting and other art forms.

* * *

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will make its European debut at the Paris Opera on May 6. The entire orchestra will be transported abroad and in addition to its engagements during the Paris festival, will be heard in The Hague, Amsterdam, various cities in western Germany and possibly. in Belgium and Italy The orchestra is headed by Charles Munch, musical director, and Pierre Monteux, associate conductor.

The New York City Ballet Company also will attend the exposition, which is called "Masterpieces of the 20th Century." Igor Stravinsky will conduct two ballets based on his scores.

* * *

BRUNO WALTER, who will lead the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, also will represent the United States, as will the Hall Johnston Choir.

Orchestras from England, Switzerland and Italy will be heard. There will be a group of operas, including Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" by the Vienna State Opera and Benjamin Britten's "Billy Budd" in the Covent Garden production.

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Plans Changed At Berkshires

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire music center, Tanglewood, Mass., announces several additions in plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy. The school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six week session will be able to enrol for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire music center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Ladies Music Club will present the University of Oklahoma String Trio in concert at 8:15 p. m. Friday at the Oklahoma City University Auditorium. The trio is composed of Robert Gerle, violinist; Gabriel Magyar, cellist, and Keith Wallingford, pianist.

The program will be as follows:

Trio in E flat Major ..... Beethoven
Trio in C Major, Op. 87 ..... Brahms
Intermission
Trio in A minor ..... Ravel

At 10 a. m. Saturday a Master class fo rstring students will be presented. These classes will be held in the Oriole Room of the Fine Arts Building of Oklahoma City University.

The idea for the Master class was conceived in order to benefit all string students throughout the state, and also to promote study of string instruments in the public schools.

The trio will also teach the class. These classes and the Friday night concert are free to all string students.

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 1 - 1952

Ernest Ansermet's continuing substitution for Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony brought several unscheduled events to the total of February music-making, including the debuts of Monique de la Bruchollerie and Arthur Grumiaux, together with the first performance of Honegger's "Monopartita." Bruchollerie is plainly a pianist of consequence, with a fine even finger strength, a finesse and tonal definition that would have been interesting in Mozart. That she played the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff suggests that life among the artists is far from simple. This was better than academic Rachmaninoff, but wanting the authority, the substance, the drive inherent in the music. Grumiaux, of Belgium, did play Mozart (G major Concerto, No. 3) with a suavity, a sweetness, and yet a robustness of style that put one in mind of Jacques Thibaud in his great days. For Mozart his tone was sensuously broad and full, yet controlled by a bow arm marvelously disciplined to a total always appropriate. Grumiaux, who is thirtyish, should be with us for years to come.

Honegger's "Monopartita," for all its science and propulsion, added to no more than another demonstration of the limited stature of even today's most respected composers. It compresses five tempo changes into a single consecutive movement lasting about fifteen minutes, in a rather lifeless pattern of busy rhythms not too well integrated.

Also new during this week was a Dohnányi Concerto for Violin (No. 2 in C minor), introduced at a Philharmonic-Symphony seance by Frances Magnes, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. It runs to four movements, and ventures new territory by subtracting the violins from the orchestral strings, with the intent to give the soloist more prominence. To my ear, the odd prominence of the lower strings—violas, cellos, and basses—was more of a distraction than any conventional scoring, hence a double disservice to the soloist. Miss Magnes played powerfully, if a little crudely, with a big tone not notable for warmth.

—IRVING KOLODIN.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
MAR 2 - 1952

France Opens Its A[illegible] To Americans in S[illegible]

Spring, like thousands of Americans, soon will be a[illegible] The fruit trees will burst into bloom in Normandy, wild flo[illegible] in the fields of Auvergne and the Loire region, and the s[illegible] in the fountains of the Place de la Concorde in Paris.

Spring is something extra-special in France, and for that reason the French observe the season with extraordinary events that never fail to excite the attention of Americans. A headline attraction this year, and one of major interest to Americans, is to be the Paris Arts Festival. Titled, Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century, this epic month-long program of music, drama, art and literature will open April 30th.

Performing groups will include the Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux conducting, the Paris Opera, the New York City Ballet, the Vienna State Opera, and the Orchestra and Chorus of the Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. Igor Stravinsky will conduct the world premiere of Oedipus Rex, an opera he recently completed with Jean Cocteau. The Paris Festival of the Arts will also include an exhibition of 200 European and American paintings of the 20th century.

Also scheduled for 2000-year-old Paris in the Spring is the Second International Salon du [illegible] 29th-April 6th. A s[illegible] phy and cinema wil[illegible] 30th and 31st at the [illegible] tions.

Elsewhere in France, Spring season, there wil[illegible] tural and international louse has one from Ma[illegible] April 6th. It also has its g[illegible] festival from May 27th to J[illegible] Nantes will have a fair Apri[illegible] and Lyon April 19th-28th. Th[illegible] Fair at Avignon, where the P[illegible] the Popes is located, will b[illegible] this year from May 3d to 12th. Ham Fair of Bayonne in the Basque country will take place April 10th, 11th and 12th. The Fair of Flowers of Bordeaux is scheduled for May 16th-17th.

After Spring has had its way in France, Summer will come in for its fair share of fun and excitement. From Paris, with its continual round of gayety, the pattern of pleasure will stretch to Prades for the Casals Music Festival June 15th-29th, to Vichy for a season of opera in July, to Menton on the Riviera for a music festival August 1st-12th, and to Besancon for its 5th International Festival of Music September 4th-14th.

Countless other resorts and areas of France are also ready to put their best foot forward and welcome visitors with hospitality. Normandy, Brittany, the chateaux country, the Dordogne Valley, the bracing Pyrenees all will have the welcome mat out.

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
MAR 2 - 1952

Orchestra To Tour

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, TEXAS
PROGRESS

Charles Munch, music di[illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible]tra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchstra [illegible].

The Berkshire Festival will [illegible] in two parts. There will be [illegible] concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Sunday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, [illegible] will conduct, and will [illegible] his

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

Tanglewood On Tour 10th Season

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will have its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which always has been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood study group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence; Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

This Clipping Fro
NEWARK, N.
NEWS
MAR 2 - 19

Berkshire Mu[illegible] Center's

Charles Munch, musi[illegible] of the Boston Symphony and director of the Music Center, the Orches[illegible] mer school at Tangle[illegible] nounces several additio[illegible] plans for the school, [illegible] hold its tenth session fo[illegible] beginning June 30. The[illegible] a new and much enlarg[illegible] ship policy.

The Center is maintai[illegible] Boston Symphony in [illegible] with its Berkshire Fe[illegible] certs. The faculty, in [illegible] 20 members of the orc[illegible] include Aaron Copland [illegible] director and teacher [illegible] tion, Leonard Bernstei[illegible] of conducting and the [illegible] chestra, William Kroll [illegible] the chamber music [illegible] while Gregor Piatigor[illegible] leave of absence, Hug[illegible] charge of chorus, and [illegible] ovsky of opera. Luigi [illegible] will again come from I[illegible] composition. The Ber[illegible] Center may be addr[illegible] phony Hall, Boston [illegible]

[99]

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
MAR 2 - 1952

Chestra To Tour
Conducting assignments on the thcoming European tour of the ston Symphony Orchestra will divided between Charles Munch, orchestra's musical director
o is now recovering from a gthy illness, and Pierre Mon-
x, the retiring conductor of the Francisco Symphony. Visits planned to 13 cities in six coun-
s.

rs. Naff says don't forget Spike
es at the Ryman on the 12th!

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, TEXAS
PROGRESS
MAR

harles Munch, music directo
he Boston Symphony Orches
has announced plans for th
kshire Festival at Tanglewood
, this summer. Munch ha
in Havana recuperating fro
recent illness but will resum
ership of the orchstra shortly
e Berkshire Festival will b wo parts. There will be si
erts in the smaller auditorium
heater-concert hall, on Satur
evenings and Sunday after s, July 5-6, 12-13, 1920. Munc conduct, and will draw hi

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

nglewood
Tour
h Season
es Munch, music director
Boston Symphony Or-
and director of the re Music Center, the a's summer school at wood, announces several
in the plans for the
which will have its 10th
for six weeks beginning

will be a new and much scholarship policy
ill award tuition grants
Tanglewood revolving ip fund to all active in the advanced depart-
The school's scholarship
which always has been
is now broadened to
ke it possible for pre-
nal students to be ad-
n considerations of mu-
mise alone, without re-
their present ability to
ion. Another develop-
the arrangement that
students may concenchamber music or song
alone.
portant new feature of
er session will be an ex-
department for general
dents, music educators ateurs. Called the
od study group, it will
d by Ingolf Dahl and
into the field of con-
music the idea of
formance for the pleas-participants. Students
partment who are not ttend the full six-week
ll be able to enroll for
ur weeks.
rkshire Music Center is
d by the Boston Sym-
chestra in connection
Berkshire Festival con-
faculty, in addition
mbers of the Boston
, will include Aaron
assistant director and composition; Leonard
in charge of conducting udent orchestra; Wil-
as head of the cham-
c department while
atigorsky is on leave
; Hugh Ross in charge
and Boris Goldovsky
Luigi Dallapiccola will
from Italy to teach

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

Tanglewood Announces New Plans

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions to the plans for the school which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department, while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

Berkshire Music Center's Plans

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy.

The Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the orchestra, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence. Hugh Ross is in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 3 - 1952

MUSIC

Monique de la Musique

Monique de la Bruchollerie, young French pianist who has scored a series of remarkable successes in the United States since her American debut in Boston last December, admits to terrible stage fright. "It doesn't do any good to console me," she says. "The more people tell me to relax, the worse I get." For years, she always brought a little doll to her concerts for good luck, but during the past year, the doll disappeared. Before her appearance with the Boston Symphony, however, her aunt presented her with a little stuffed dog as a mascot.

The Boston debut was a smash hit. Hence, Miss de la Bruchollerie adopted the dog as her new good-luck charm, and christened him Master Boston. He has gone with her to every American concert she has played, and Master Boston was very much in evidence last week when Miss de la Bruchollerie made her Carnegie Hall recital debut in New York. A New York solo appearance was not planned when the French pianist first came to the United States, for she was already scheduled to play in New York with both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. But after her stunning reception in Boston, she was immediately booked for a Carnegie Hall concert.

"A striking, even spectacular, event of the music season," was the opinion of Cyrus Durgin of The Boston Daily Globe on her showing in the Hub. If Mlle. de la Bruchollerie was not back within six weeks to give a solo concert, "someone will have been asleep at the switch," he wrote. Nobody fell asleep, for the pianist was back in Boston to present a recital at Jordan Hall on Jan. 29—just over the six-week deadline.

Same Verdict: When Miss de la Bruchollerie played in New York with the Boston Symphony—in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, the vehicle for her Boston debut—the verdict was essentially the same. "An immense triumph," said Olin Downes in The New York Times. "Musicianship and imagination all too unusual in these days of bang-bang concerto playing," wrote Virgil Thomson in The New York Herald Tribune.

In her Carnegie Hall recital, Miss de la Bruchollerie showed once again that she was no bang-banger. But she was nonetheless a lady of remarkable technique and virtuosity. In spite of a badly selected program which featured hackneyed works of Chopin (Sonata in B flat minor and Debussy ("La Cathédrale engloutie" and "Jardins sous la pluie"), she displayed sensitivity and style, with varying levels of interpretative powers. As Durgin had put it in Boston, she was "that rarity, a musicians' and the public's artist."

Miss de la Bruchollerie lives, she says,

Newsweek—Ed Wergeles

Monique and Master Boston

"in a perpetual state of arrested progress." The wife of an engineer—Armand du Roselle—she is the mother of two young daughters who claim a great deal of her attention. She admits her name is a tongue-twister to Americans, and is flattered that she already has a Yankee nickname: Monique de la Musique.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
MAR 4 - 1952

Efficient Uncle Sam

A letter from Germany addressed to "Charles Munch, Commonwealth 6-1492, Boston, Mass., U.S.A." was delivered promptly to Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Commonwealth 6-1492 is the telephone number at Symphony Hall.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
MAR 4 - 1952

Tanglewood Music School to Boost Scholarship Fund

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school in western Massachusetts, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-weeks session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berksire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with its Berksire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 5 - 1952

Children's Concert

The Zimbler Sinfonietta and assisting members of the Boston Symphony under Malcolm Holmes will give the final Children's Concert of the season in Sanders Theatre next Saturday afternoon at 3. The concert is open to the public and tickets will be on sale at the box office.

The program will include works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Slonimsky and others.

Cir. (D 311,466) (S 270,024)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
- 1952

Berkshire Festival Concerts

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts, beginning Saturday, July 5. Programs will be drawn from early French music and from works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

[102]

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
MAR 2 - 1952

Chestra To Tour
Conducting assignments on the thcoming European tour of the ston Symphony Orchestra will ivided between Charles Munch,
orchestra's musical director
o is now recovering from a gthy illness, and Pierre Mon-
x, the retiring conductor of the Francisco Symphony. Visits planned to 13 cities in six coun-
s.

rs. Naff says don't forget Spike
es at the Ryman on the 12th!

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, TEXAS
PROGRESS
MAR 2 1952

harles Munch, music directo
he Boston Symphony Orches
has announced plans for th
kshire Festival at Tanglewood
s., this summer. Munch ha
in Havana recuperating fro
recent illness but will resum
ership of the orchstra shortly
e Berkshire Festival will b
wo parts. There will be si
erts in the smaller auditorium
heater-concert hall, on Satur
evenings and Sunday after s, July 5-6, 12-13, 1920. Munch
conduct, and will draw hi

This Clipping From
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
ARIZ. REPUBLIC

nglewood
Tour
th Season
es Munch, music director
Boston Symphony Or-
and director of the e Music Center, the a's summer school at wood, announces several
in the plans for the
which will have its 10th
for six weeks beginning

will be a new and much scholarship policy
ill award tuition grants
e Tanglewood revolving hip fund to all active in the advanced depart-
The school's scholarship
which always has been
, is now broadened to
ke it possible for pre-
nal students to be ad-
n considerations of mu-
mise alone, without re-
their present ability to
ion. Another develop-
the arrangement that
students may concen-
chamber music or song
alone.
portant new feature of
er session will be an ex-
department for general
dents, music educators nateurs. Called the
od study group, it will
d by Ingolf Dahl and
into the field of con-
music the idea of
formance for the pleas-participants. Students
partment who are not tend the full six-week
ll be able to enroll for
ur weeks.
rkshire Music Center is
d by the Boston Sym-
chestra in connection
Berkshire Festival con-
faculty, in addition mbers of the Boston
will include Aaron
assistant director and composition; Leonard
in charge of conducting tudent orchestra; Wil-
as head of the cham-
c department while
atigorsky is on leave
Hugh Ross in charge
and Boris Goldovsky
Luigi Dallapiccola will
from Italy to teach

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
MAR - 1952

Tanglewood Announces New Plans

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions to the plans for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments.

The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition. Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department, while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

Berkshire Music Center's Plans

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30. There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy.

The Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the orchestra, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition. Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross is in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
MAR 3 - 1952

MUSIC

Monique de la Musique

Monique de la Bruchollerie, young French pianist who has scored a series of remarkable successes in the United States since her American debut in Boston last December, admits to terrible stage fright. "It doesn't do any good to console me," she says. "The more people tell me to relax, the worse I get." For years, she always brought a little doll to her concerts for good luck, but during the past year, the doll disappeared. Before her appearance with the Boston Symphony, however, her aunt presented her with a little stuffed dog as a mascot.

The Boston debut was a smash hit. Hence, Miss de la Bruchollerie adopted the dog as her new good-luck charm, and christened him Master Boston. He has gone with her to every American concert she has played, and Master Boston was very much in evidence last week when Miss de la Bruchollerie made her Carnegie Hall recital debut in New York. A New York solo appearance was not planned when the French pianist first came to the United States, for she was already scheduled to play in New York with both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. But after her stunning reception in Boston, she was immediately booked for a Carnegie Hall concert.

"A striking, even spectacular, event of the music season," was the opinion of Cyrus Durgin of The Boston Daily Globe on her showing in the Hub. If Mlle. de la Bruchollerie was not back within six weeks to give a solo concert, "someone will have been asleep at the switch," he wrote. Nobody fell asleep, for the pianist was back in Boston to present a recital at Jordan Hall on Jan. 29—just over the six-week deadline.

Same Verdict: When Miss de la Bruchollerie played in New York with the Boston Symphony—in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, the vehicle for her Boston debut—the verdict was essentially the same. "An immense triumph," said Olin Downes in The New York Times. "Musicianship and imagination all too unusual in these days of bang-bang concerto playing," wrote Virgil Thomson in The New York Herald Tribune.

In her Carnegie Hall recital, Miss de la Bruchollerie showed once again that she was no bang-banger. But she was nonetheless a lady of remarkable technique and virtuosity. In spite of a badly selected program which featured hackneyed works of Chopin (Sonata in B flat minor and Debussy ("La Cathédrale engloutie" and "Jardins sous la pluie"), she displayed sensitivity and style, with varying levels of interpretative powers. As Durgin had put it in Boston, she was "that rarity, a musicians' and the public's artist."

Miss de la Bruchollerie lives, she says,

Newsweek—Ed Wergeles

Monique and Master Boston

"in a perpetual state of arrested progress." The wife of an engineer—Armand du Roselle—she is the mother of two young daughters who claim a great deal of her attention. She admits her name is a tongue-twister to Americans, and is flattered that she already has a Yankee nickname: Monique de la Musique.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
MAR 4 - 1952

Efficient Uncle Sam

A letter from Germany addressed to "Charles Munch, Commonwealth 6-1492, Boston, Mass., U.S.A." was delivered promptly to Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Commonwealth 6-1492 is the telephone number at Symphony Hall.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
MAR 4 - 1952

Tanglewood Music School to Boost Scholarship Fund

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school in western Massachusetts, which will hold its tenth session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy, which has always been generous, is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone.

An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-weeks session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berksire Music Center is maintained by the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with its Berksire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to twenty members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus, and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition. The Berkshire Music Center may be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 5 - 1952

Children's Concert

The Zimbler Sinfonietta and assisting members of the Boston Symphony under Malcolm Holmes will give the final Children's Concert of the season in Sanders Theatre next Saturday afternoon at 3. The concert is open to the public and tickets will be on sale at the box office.

The program will include works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Slonimsky and others.

Cir. (D 311,466) (S 270,024)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 4 - 1952

Berkshire Festival Concerts

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts, beginning Saturday, July 5. Programs will be drawn from early French music and from works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert.

[100]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 7 - 1952

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

A New Piano Concerto

The euphoniously named French lady pianist, Monique de la Bruchollerie, was last evening's soloist with George Szell and the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall, playing the first performance in this country of a concerto by her countryman, Jean Rivier.

Miss De la Bruchollerie appeared with the Boston Symphony not long ago, playing one of the Rachmaninoff concerti—the Third, if I am not mistaken—and was a little overpowered by that taxing work. At that time I made a mental note that Miss De la Bruchollerie was a refined, sensitive and musical performer, but hardly an exciting one.

Last evening, however, the artiste revealed another facet of her musical personality. The Rivier concerto is nothing except display, and Miss De la Bruchollerie made the most of that fact.

The new work is a big, percussive composition wth plenty of fireworks. It sounds as if the composer is himself a pianist. He knows all the tricks. There are brilliant, interlocking octaves, glissandi, and pianistic embellishments of every description. It is a thoroughly up-to-date work (it was written in 1943), with touches of polytonality and similar innovations. Its scoring is loud, and audacious in a good-humored sort of way.

For me the concerto dragged during the second movement, because to create a successful slow movement it is necessary to write music rather than sound effects. But virtuosi will love the work if they are looking for a brisk, showy piece with plenty of opportunity for technical display, ending with a dramatic flourish calculated to wring applause from the most recalcitrant audience.

Mr. Szell and the orchestra began the business of the evening with a sound, well-paced interpretation of the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, and ended with Elgar's "Enigma" variations.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 8 - 1952

MUSIC

Artur Rubinstein Soloist in Beethoven Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

Artur Rubinstein is soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, playing the Beethoven Piano Concerto in G major. There is one other number upon the program conducted by Leonard Bernstein, and that, too, is by Beethoven: the String Quartet in C-sharp minor, performed by the massed string sections. All of which proves, among other things, that it is possible to present a substantial all-Beethoven program with an orchestra and not include one of the symphonies.

I doubt that Mr. Rubinstein ever played with more delicacy, grace and loving poetry than he did yesterday afternoon. The G major Concerto, though beloved of the keyboard brethren and sistern, is no thundering battlesteed of the virtuosi. It is a relatively intimate masterpiece, of comparatively subdued communication, requiring precise, clear and gentle treatment. If a pianist begins to thunder he is violating the style of this work, and there is no greater crime in the decalog except, perhaps, murdering one's sweetheart, or putting tomatoes in New England clam chowder.

Mr. Rubinstein's performance seemed flawless. Technically it was magnificent: even of articulation, exact in rhythm and tempo, superbly phrased. The piano was a fine instrument and was tuned to the fractionally higher pitch which the Boston Symphony uses.

The fact that Mr. Rubinstein played not the Beethoven, but the Saint-Saens, cadenzas, is a transgression which may keep him out of Heaven if the academic purists have their way. To be sure, these cadenzas are not pure Beethoven in style, for they are rippling arabesques with a suggestion of Schumann and Liszt. But they do sound well.

Mr. Bernstein managed the orchestral accompaniment creditably, even though some of the orchestral detail did not come out, and though there were a few places where orchestra and soloist were not exactly together. But his reading of Beethoven's C-sharp minor Quartet was splendid. It followed the score exactly; the tempi were well chosen, and the whole of this vast and super-terrestrial masterwork lacked nothing of musicianship and eloquence.

This Quartet had been essayed by massed strings only once before at these concerts, when Dimitri Mitropoulos gave a memorable reading of it in 1937. Technically, such a performance is an unabashed "stunt," for sustained playing of four voices by multiple strings is not easy. But there were few spots where the ensemble got so much as a hair out of absolute precision.

Tonight's audience had best be reminded that this work opens the program and goes on for nearly 45 minutes without a break, for there is no place where it can be interrupted without ruining the continuity. So, unless you are on time, you'll miss the whole of it!

The essential heroic stature of the last Beethoven String Quartets is traditional and proverbial. The C-sharp minor, one of musical history's greatest masterpieces, does not suffer at all when transferred to massed strings, and its cello line occasionally reinforced by a half-dozen double-basses. The texture remains the same, the balance of part-writing is not affected. The only difference is that the volume of sound is increased, and the effect is to make the score seem even bigger.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 8 - 1952

Boston Symphony to Play In Germany On Spring Tour

Frankfurt, March 7 (INS)—The U. S. High Commissioner's office announced today that the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two concerts in Frankfurt May 13-14 and one in Berlin May 15.

The trip to Germany will be part of a spring tour which will take the 104-member orchestra to London, Amsterdam, The Hague, Brussels and Paris.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
MAR 8 - 1952

CONCERTS DUE IN REICH

FRANKFURT, March 7 (INS).—The U. S. High Commissioner's Office announced today the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two concerts in Frankfurt May 13-14 and one in Berlin May 15.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 8 - 1952

SYMPHONY TO VISIT BERLIN

Boston Group Will Play Also at Frankfurt on May Trip

Germany has been included on the itinerary of the Boston Symphony's tour of Europe, which opens with a concert in Paris on May 6. The orchestra will play at Frankfurt on May 13 and 14 and in Berlin on May 15, the American Committee for Cultural Freedom announced yesterday.

The Netherlands, Italy, Belgium and England are other countries that will be visited by the orchestra, which will participate in the month-long May Exposition of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will share the podium. It will be the Boston Symphony's first visit to Europe.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 8 - 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the 19th program of the 7-st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Beethoven program offered the C sharp Minor Quartet, Op. 131 (played by the string orchestra) and the Piano Concerto No. 4, Op. 58 (Arthur Rubinstein, soloist).

By RUDOLPH ELIE

All in all, this was one of the very finest concerts of the season so far; everything contributed to make it so.

There was, in the first place, Beethoven in two contrasted but towering moods. For another there was Artur Rubinstein at the very peak of his art. For another there was Leonard Bernstein in the most maturely eloquent vein I have ever seen him in, and for still another there was the string section of the orchestra in all its tonal and technical glory.

Real Outing

Indeed, it seems to me that the performance of the C sharp minor Quartet, a work of nearly unparalleled elevation of spirit, was one of the most salutary events of the entire season for the orchestra itself. This is not to say the string section has declined in any way in the last season or so, but I think nearly everyone has been aware that it has undergone a subtle change in character. Although a string player himself, Munch's attitude to the strings is typically French; he prefers the drier, lighter, more detached approach that sacrifices tonal opulence to exactitude and response. The string orchestra, consequently, though neither better nor worse, is different.

Under Bernstein, who is not a string player but who yesterday demonstrated a remarkable mastery of the strings (a special thing all its own), the string band had a real outing. It started off a little stiffly, a little tentatively as if afraid to let itself go as of old, but by the time it arrived at the presto movement it was playing its collective head off. Obeying, with that curious intuition developed by a string orchestra, every least inflexion of rhythm, dynamic shading and nuance of phrase demanded by the conductor, its flight to the last bar was absolutely magical. And so, too, was the esprit de corps; one got the happy feeling that there was joy in the playing in every desk.

To be sure this joy was created by the music itself; even the most jaded string player comes alive in the exultation of overcoming both the musical and technical problems this immense quartet generates. But there was more to it than that; there was the overall atmosphere created by Bernstein himself, and he is to be congratulated beyond words not only for giving us this work in this form, but for giving the string section itself a much-needed lift of spirit. If it can sound like that in Europe this spring, there is no doubt as to its reception anywhere.

Standard for Years

Rubinstein's performance of Beethoven's Fourth set, I think, the standard for us for many years to come. Supported by a truly beautiful orchestral accompaniment that demonstrated Bernstein's utter command in that special field, he achieved a nobility of style coupled with a technique of such crystalline purity that not a single note nor a single phrase escaped the listeners. The audience, which is a lot more acute in its perception than most people give it credit for, sensed that this was The performance from the outset and maintained a quite incredible hush throughout.

For his part, Rubinstein never played better or with more dignity though I was puzzled by the cadenzas which, unless I am horribly mistaken, were not Beethoven's at all. Admittedly they were more brilliant, but entirely out of character, and I see no reason why a man of Rubinstein's stature should employ them. Be that as it may, however, it was a performance of the first order and one to be long remembered.

ARTHUR FIEDLER conducts the 50-piano orchestra which will be one of the highlights at the Boston Piano Fair in Symphony Hall March 14 and 15.

Incidentally, in case you're a Saturday nighter at the Symphony, promptness is especially necessary for this concert as the Quartet is done without breaks, so latecomers will miss the whole thing. It is not a thing to be missed. The orchestra is in town next week, repeating on March 21 with G. Wallace Woodworth doing Mozart's Symphony No. 34, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the 104th Psalm, and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." Assisting will be the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society with soloists.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Tour

3 Concerts in Germany Slated on First European Trip

During its first European trip this spring the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three concerts in Germany at Frankfurt-am-Main on May 13 and 14 and at the Titania Palace in Berlin May 15. The second Frankfurt concert will be free for members of the armed forces. The trip to and from Berlin will be made in United States Air Force planes. Charles Munch, its present music director, and Pierre Monteux, of the San Francisco Symphony, will conduct.

The Boston musicians will sail from New York April 28 on the Ile de France and return on the same liner, sailing from Southampton May 27. The orchestra will give three Paris concerts, May 6 at the Opéra and May 8 and 21 at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees. The other dates on the tour are May 10, The Hague; 11, Amsterdam; 12, Brussels; 17, Strasbourg; 19, Turin; 23 and 24, Bordeaux; 25, London, in the new Royal Festival Hall.

[10]

EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

MAR 9 - 1952

Munch Makes Festival Plans For Berkshire

New York. (UP)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for his and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10.)

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 9 - 1952

Boston Symphony Now on Final Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final tour of the season this week, and return to Boston to perform the next to last concert of the Tuesday Evening series in Symphony Hall on March 18 and the 19th pair of Friday and Saturday concerts on March 21-22.

At the Tuesday concert, Richard Burgin will conduct Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, and Mahler's Ninth Symphony.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts, G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct. His program will consist of Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338), Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune, for Piano solo accompanied by Chorus and Orchestra. The soloist will be Richard Sogg. The closing number will be Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." In this work the soloists will be Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Paul Tibbetts, bass, and Wesley Addy, speaker. The Harvard Glee Club will assist and will be joined in the Vaughan Williams work by the Radcliffe Choral Society.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
MAR 9 - 1952

Willie Suttons.

Munch Announces Plans For Tanglewood

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, has announced several additions to the plans for the school, which will open its 10th session for six weeks on June 30.

Most important of the additions will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. Furthermore, the school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another important new development (one that ought to interest many local musicians and educators) will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland, as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein, in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll, as head of the chamber music department during the absence of Gregor Piatigorsky; Hugh Ross, who will direct the chorus, and Boris Goldovsky, who will return to head the opera department. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

Bernstein

Incidentally, all correspondence concerning the Berkshire Music Center should be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

THE TRAVEL AGENT
NEW YORK, N.Y.
3/10/52

French Line should have no trouble staging ship concert during April 28th voyage of Ile de France. The entire Boston Symphony orchestra is booked to sail on that date.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Latecomers at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert were out of luck; they missed half the show. The all-Beethoven program prepared by Leonard Bernstein consisted of the C-sharp minor String Quartet, Opus 131, performed by the string orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist. Beethoven planned to have the seven divisions of his quartet connected without pause, and while breaks are possible, they are inadvisable, and Mr. Bernstein did not make them. Those who are attending this evening's concert are hereby warned.

Since the program is not particularly long, Mr. Bernstein might have started off with an overture, but he evidently felt that the musical effect was better without it. The C-sharp minor, like the other four "last" Quartets, is perhaps not as well known as it should be, and there is that excuse for playing it on an orchestral concert. Nor was it a first time that it has been so performed at Symphony Hall, Dmitri Mitropoulos conducted it as guest in 1937. Orchestrally played, there is a loss of intimacy, but there is a gain in grandeur and excitement. We can hardly quarrel with Mr. Bernstein for giving us a chance to hear this wonderful music, and his conducting of it disclosed both appreciation and understanding. The only suggestion to be made here is that, with the full body of strings, the Andante might have been played a shade more slowly.

The passage from quartet to concerto worked two ways. Musically there was a decline in interest, since charming as the G major is, the great quartet towers far above it, so far above it, indeed, that yesterday it sounded almost trite by comparison, at least, until the second movement was reached. This, of course, is one of the most imaginative movements in all Beethoven and it received its due yesterday. There was demurring in some quarters at the cadenza played by Mr. Rubinstein, which may not be identified here. As Tovey puts it, Beethoven scribbled a couple of bad ones, that by Clara Schumann is better, but any musician is justified in making his own best. Mr. Rubinstein's performance of the first movement was always tasteful and the final Rondo was delivered in brilliant fashion. It was still possible to feel that, while, outwardly satisfactory and sometimes a little more, this was not what you would characterize as a memorable disclosure of the music.

The programs in this most curious of Symphony seasons have tended toward the conventional. Even young Mr. Bernstein, aside from a few moments of Alban Berg, stuck to Mozart and Beethoven, plus shopworn Sibelius. Next week the orchestra goes to New York, and on its return it will be led by G. Wallace Woodworth, the major offering being Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN PATRIOT
MAR 10 1952

The World of Music

BY WILLIAM J. SWANK

Charles Munch, director of music for the Boston Symphony orchestra, and director of the Berkshire Music center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., announces several additions in the plans for the school which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy now is broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on consideration of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session, will be permited to enroll for two or four weeks.

will make her first orchestra appearance in New York Jan. 5 . . . The other soloists selected by Thomas Scherman, leader of the group, include Rudolf Serkin, piano; Isaac Stern, violin; Winifred Cecil, soprano, and William Kroll, violin director of the Kroll quartet . . . Weber's "Euranthe" has been chosen as one of the operas to be given in concert during the spring, with Eileen Farrell in the leading role.

EL PASO, TEX.
TIMES

MAR 9 - 1952

Munch Makes Festival Plans For Berkshire

New York. (UP)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. Choral works for his and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10.)

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct one concert in the final week.

THE TRAVEL AGENT
NEW YORK, N.Y
3/10/52

French Line should have no trouble staging ship concert during April 28th voyage of Ile de France. The entire Boston Symphony orchestra is booked to sail on that date.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 9 - 1952

Boston Symphony Now on Final Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its final tour of the season this week, and return to Boston to perform the next to last concert of the Tuesday Evening series in Symphony Hall on March 18 and the 19th pair of Friday and Saturday concerts on March 21-22.

At the Tuesday concert, Richard Burgin will conduct Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, and Mahler's Ninth Symphony.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts, G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct. His program will consist of Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338), Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune, for Piano solo accompanied by Chorus and Orchestra. The soloist will be Richard Sogg. The closing number will be Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." In this work the soloists will be Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Paul Tibbetts, bass, and Wesley Addy, speaker. The Harvard Glee Club will assist and will be joined in the Vaughan Williams work by the Radcliffe Choral Society.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAR 9 - 1952

Willie Suttons.

Munch Announces Plans For Tanglewood

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, has announced several additions to the plans for the school, which will open its 10th session for six weeks on June 30.

Most important of the additions will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. Furthermore, the school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another important new development (one that ought to interest many local musicians and educators) will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Center faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland, as assistant director and teacher of composition; Leonard Bernstein, in charge of conducting and the student orchestra; William Kroll, as head of the chamber music department during the absence of Gregor Piatigorsky; Hugh Ross, who will direct the chorus, and Boris Goldovsky, who will return to head the opera department. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

Bernstein

Incidentally, all correspondence concerning the Berkshire Music Center should be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Latecomers at yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert were out of luck; they missed half the show. The all-Beethoven program prepared by Leonard Bernstein consisted of the C-sharp minor String Quartet, Opus 131, performed by the string orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist. Beethoven planned to have the seven divisions of his quartet connected without pause, and while breaks are possible, they are inadvisable, and Mr. Bernstein did not make them. Those who are attending this evening's concert are hereby warned.

Since the program is not particularly long, Mr. Bernstein might have started off with an overture, but he evidently felt that the musical effect was better without it. The C-sharp minor, like the other four "last" Quartets, is perhaps not as well known as it should be, and there is that excuse for playing it at an orchestral concert. Nor was this the first time that it has been so performed at Symphony Hall, since Mr. Mitropoulos conducted it as guest in 1937. Orchestrally played, there is a loss of intimacy, but there is a gain in grandeur and excitement. We can hardly quarrel with Mr. Bernstein for giving us a chance to hear this wonderful music, and his conducting of it disclosed both appreciation and understanding. The only suggestion to be made here is that, with the full body of strings, the Andante might have been played a shade more slowly.

The passage from quartet to concerto worked two ways. Musically there was a decline in interest, since charming as the G major is, the great quartet towers far above it, so far above it, indeed, that yesterday it sounded almost trite by comparison, at least, until the second movement was reached. This, of course, is one of the most imaginative movements in all Beethoven and it received its due yesterday. There was demurring in some quarters at the cadenza played by Mr. Rubinstein, which may not be identified here. As Tovey puts it, Beethoven scribbled a couple of bad ones, that by Clara Schumann is better, but any musician is justified in making his own best. Mr. Rubinstein's performance of the first movement was always tasteful and the final Rondo was delivered in brilliant fashion. It was still possible to feel that, while, outwardly satisfactory and sometimes a little more, this was not what you would characterize as a memorable disclosure of the music.

The programs in this most curious of Symphony seasons have tended toward the conventional. Even young Mr. Bernstein, aside from a few moments of Alban Berg, stuck to Mozart and Beethoven, plus shopworn Sibelius. Next week the orchestra goes to New York, and on its return it will be led by G. Wallace Woodworth, the major offering being Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN PATRIOT

MAR 10 1952

The World of Music

BY WILLIAM J. SWANK

Charles Munch, director of music for the Boston Symphony orchestra, and director of the Berkshire Music center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., announces several additions in the plans for the school which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy now is broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on consideration of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertoire alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session, will be permited to enroll for two or four weeks.

will make her first orchestra appearance in New York Jan. 5 . . . The other soloists selected by Thomas Scherman, leader of the group, include Rudolf Serkin, piano; Isaac Stern, violin; Winifred Cecil, soprano, and William Kroll, violin director of the Kroll quartet . . . Weber's "Euranthe" has been chosen as one of the operas to be given in concert during the spring, with Eileen Farrell in the leading role.

---

[102]

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 12 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY STARS BERNSTEIN IN CONCERT HERE

The Boston Symphony usually puts on a good "show" here and last evening's concert in Woolsey Hall was all of that, even if it was something of a "one man" affair.

Acting as both conductor and soloist, Leonard Bernstein centered audience attention pretty much on himself with his dramatic podium antics and his featured role at the piano.

There is no mistaking the fact that youthful Mr. Bernstein is a most talented musician, for he has long since established himself as composer, conductor, and pianist. He is not equally adept at all three of his principal musical endeavors, being perhaps a better conductor than anything else. As a protege of the late Serge Koussevitzky, he certainly had the best of instruction in conducting and in a musical sense, we might call him a "chip off the old block." He has copied many of Koussevitzky's conducting mannerisms and he has the same flair for the dramatic as his mentor, as well as a similar interpretive approach.

However, last evening's conductor is no mean shakes either as a composer or a pianist. His solo role in Mozart's Concerto for Pianoforte in E-Flat major, considering that he also had to conduct the performance from the piano bench, was most creditable if a bit heavy handed for this composer's work. Mr. Bernstein's hurried tempi, particularly in the final movement's two Rondos, showed off a well developed technique even if it had an adverse effect on the Boston strings. Antiphonal passages here, cleanly executed on the part of the soloist, made the violin portions at times sound like glissandos.

Personally, I am of the belief that performing and conducting should be done "one at a time." It is true that Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has achieved some success in this double role but it is not to be recommended as a general practice but should be considered in the nature of a "stunt."

Though less well known as a composer, Mr. Bernstein has great ability in this field too. His First Symphony ("Jeremiah") won the award of the Music Critics Circle in New York City as the most distinguished new American work of the 1943-44 season.

To get back to the program, the writer missed what, I am told, was a program highlight—the opening "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," by Mozart. The Sibelius Fifth Symphony, though the orchestra "gave it everything." didn't win a convert in this listener, though the Berlioz, particularly the final Hungarian March in the excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," put me as well as the other listeners in a "flag waving mood." Berlioz and Bernstein are, in more ways than one, "birds of a feather."

G. E. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

MAR 13 1952

Boston Symphony at Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Leonard Bernstein came as conductor-soloist of the Boston Symphony for its final Wednesday night concert of the season. He chose a Mozart-Sibelius program, appearing as the pianist in Mozart's E-flat major concerto K. 271. His conducting of the Sibelius Fifth Symphony marked the high point of the evening.

A fondess for Mozart may have led him to program the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the concerto, but these works apparently did not inspire him last night. The performances were dull.

Aside from the orchestra's clean-cut playing that sounded well neither work offered any special enchantment. The serenade was too business-like to yield any of its ingratiating qualities. The performance was less communicative than that of the concerto.

But even this lacked personality. Conducting from the piano produced some inflexibility on both sides last night. Bernstein's tone was a bit dry and his manner stiff. There was some style but little elegance or sparkle in his playing.

In Sibelius, Bernstein could throw off some of the restraint noted in the Mozart and give himself more to the music. Characteristically the music directed him. He nevertheless had the orchestra under admirable control and showed a certain command of the score.

He gave the brasses their head and let them glorify Sibelius's music. Some exaggerated posturing, some deliberate pacing, and an overdramatized finale robbed him of a distinguished interpretation. Though he still gets in the way of the music, what he does accomplish still proclaims exceptional talent.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MAR 13 1952

Munch Will Return To Podium Next Week

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the Podium next week after a three-month absence because of a virus infection.

Munch, successor to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, became ill last December after an extensive symphony tour and rested in Havana, Cuba, for several months. He returned to his Milton home yesterday.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAR 13 1952

BSO Friends To Meet Wednesday

The 18th annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday afternoon at 4. Charles Munch music director of the orchestra will conduct Beethoven's eighth symphony following a brief business session when Oliver Wolcott chairman of the Friends society and Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, will speak.

The orchestra's trustees will meet the members at tea in the upper foyer of the hall following the symphony. The meeting a year ago was attended by more than 800 contributors, whose donations help to finance the orchestra.

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

MAR 13 1952

Conductor Munch Recovers

Boston, March 13 (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium next week after a three-months absence because of a virus infection.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 13 1952

Munch Returns to Podium

BOSTON, March 12 (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium next week after a three-months' absence because of a virus infection, a symphony official said tonight.

Munch, successor to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, became ill last December after an extensive symphony tour and rested in Havana, Cuba, for several months.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAR 13 1952

Munch, Recovered, Back on Job Announces Festival Programs

BOSTON — Charles Munch has returned from Cuba to his home in Milton recovered from his illness and ready to resume his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has drafted his programs for the remainder of the season in Boston, for this orchestra's European tour next May, and for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5 to Aug. 10.

The programs for Tanglewood will be as follows:

Chamber orchestra concerts in the theatre, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons, Mr. Munch to conduct two concerts in each weekend.

Series A: Thursday July 24, Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Eroica"; Brahms, Symphony No. ; Saturday, July 26 (Pierre Monteux conducting), Cimarosa, overture "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; travinsky, "The Rites of Spring"; unday, July 27, Franck, symphonic iece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, symphony; Dallapiccola, chorus, "Savonarola"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B: Thursday, July 31, Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Schumann, piano concerto; Hindemith, "Metamorphosis"; D'Indy, "Symphony on a Mountain Air"; Saturday, Aug. 2 (Pierre Monteuv conducting), excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists); Sunday, Aug. 3, Beethoven, overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus), first performance in America.

Series C: Thursday, Aug. 7, Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; Saturday, Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting), Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Sunday, Aug. 10, Charles Munch will close the Festival with a performance of Berlioz' "Requiem" for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

The season sale is being held at the subscription office in Symphony Hall. The Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's school at Tanglewood, will have its 10th season through the six Festival weeks.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 13 1952

BERNSTEIN DOUBLES FOR CONCERT HERE

Conducts, Boston Symphony and Is Soloist in Mozart Work at Carnegie Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conductor and piano soloist, Leonard Bernstein. At Carnegie Hall.

Eine kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
Concerto in E flat (K. 271).....Mozart
Symphony No. 5.....Sibelius

By OLIN DOWNES

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall in music by Mozart and Sibelius. He was pianist as well as conductor in the performance of the E-flat concerto numbered 271 in Koechel's catalogue. Rather curiously, and contrary to what one might have expected, Mr. Bernstein reached his height as an interpreter with Sibelius and not with Mozart. His performance of the "Kleine Nachtmusik" was pedestrian, dry in tone and in spirit, and the involuntary comparison with other performances of this same "Nachtmusik" with another conductor than Mr. Bernstein was not flattering to last night's interpretation.

Mr. Bernstein's performance of the concerto was neat, suave and unnecessarily miniature. He would seem to belong to that school of thought which conceives that Mozart must be played softly and small-scaled to reproduce his style. One might ascribe the closing of the piano lid to modesty, but that was a false modesty where this concerto is concerned. It should sound brilliantly from the piano as well as the ensemble, and it need not be played with its shoes quite so smoothly polished to communicate the effervescence and pulse of the music.

The ensemble was good, the delicate balances well judged, but there is more than discretion in this concerto, even in the finale, which on the whole is a weak and over-extended movement. Mr. Bernstein's performance of another Mozart concerto, last February in this city, was of far finer texture and more technically precise than the one he gave last night, and the G major, K. 453, is certainly a finer concerto.

The performance of the Sibelius symphony was a far more sizable achievement. One could take exceptions to a tempo here, an accent or other detail there. This was Mr. Bernstein's performance and he missed nothing that was in the score. The big spaces and magnificent solitudes, the passionate and solitary broodings were there.

The first movement is really the combination of two movements, and the changes of rhythm and pace and firm joining together of the two parts were admirably accomplished. The middle movement is thematically in the nature of a chaconne based upon a theme as simple as a nursery rhyme.

The development of this theme is technically resourceful and richly imaginative, and these attributes were not lost upon Mr. Bernstein. He took the beginning of the finale pretty fast, but again he integrated the movement and his finale climax was one of shattering magnificence. It was furthermore noticeable that he played the great anvil blows of the final B flats, set in irregular accents, apart from each other, exactly as written by the composer—which happens rarely, and is very important for the effect of the symphony.

It is the symphony of the single living composer who can say the great elemental things as one to the manner born, and achieve sublimity. There is no other contemporary composer of nearly his stature, and every year that passes by confirms the fact. Mr. Bernstein reminded us of it eloquently.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Sibelius and Mozart

[illegible] in recent [illegible] of the [illegible] of Sibelius [illegible] Carnegie Hall in [illegible] Mozart's music. [illegible] quite like [illegible] master to [illegible] fortify it for [illegible] Nordic world [illegible] temporary Finnish [illegible] On this occasion, a [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] Leonard Bern- [illegible] the combination [illegible] again, and the clear- [illegible] approach of this ad- [illegible] conductor to the sprawl- [illegible] structure of the Fifth Sym- phony of Sibelius went quite a [illegible] toward holding the at- [illegible] observer, who is [illegible] partial to the [illegible] work.

Whatever any of us may think, [illegible] Sibelius orchestra will go [illegible] fascination on con- [illegible] as a means of spreading [illegible] out, working wonders [illegible] sonorities and indulging [illegible] ego. I find myself bothered by sections in which the composer seems on his way somewhere for a needlessly long time or worrying material beyond its capacity. But the music has its moments, and Bernstein made the most of them. He wasted no time stretching the line out more than the composer has himself stretched it out. He concluded the second movement powerfully, stated the Andante theme with an exceptionally sharp-edged tone, and spaced the final chords with stunning effect.

The Sibelius Fifth was the last work the late Serge Koussevitzky conducted with the Boston Symphony. That was in Boston, in December, 1950. It was ever one of his favorites and Bernstein had a fine model for its interpretation, since he grew up under Koussevitzky's wing. But while benefiting from his model, Bernstein has reconstructed it along quite new lines, and these make it considerably more palatable for one of my predispositions.

Though Bernstein has been on a sabbatical only since last summer, it seems a much longer time - too long - since we last heard him conduct. His maturity of recent years places him in the front line of conductors, and it may take a while for his full stature to be realized, since the memory of his indiscretions of youth is still fresh. His thoroughgoing musicianship, an all-embracing, fluid musicianship, was further demonstrated last night by his performance of Mozart's earlier Concerto in E-flat, in which he was both pianist and conductor. I have always enjoyed Bernstein in this dual role of conductor-soloist. Unlike other conductors in this tour de force, he has more than one or two vehicles for such [illegible]. This concerto is, per- [illegible] a bit too new for him to carry off the difficult stunt with ultimate perfection. But I found the chamber music effect he achieves completely engaging, natural and unforced, and in the Andantino in particular my attention was held throughout by the sensitivity, poetry and unflagging impulse.

Ruth Diehl

Ruth Diehl, soprano, was heard in recital last night in Town Hall. Miss Diehl, who is known locally as a leading church soloist, presented a program which included opera and cantata airs by Handel, Bach, Cesti and Vivaldi, the "Brautlieder" of Peter Cornelius and divers songs by Celius Dougherty, Harold Friedell and Benjamin Britten. Edward Hart was the piano accompanist and Eugenie Dengel, violinist, assisted in the Bach and Cesti.

Miss Diehlh has a bright, dramatic and well schooled voice. Her soprano is large, rounded, and throughout its range steady and firm. Only in the very top register is there any sign of tautness, and even here tones were placed squarely on pitch and made to ring. Miss Diehl's most admirable vocal feature is the sweep with which she administers long and flowing phrases. Her breath supply is seemingly endless and her melodic lines were floated in space, turned with striking precision and colored with shades pure and luminous. Her technical prowess, in sum, is of the highest order.

Less convincing, however, were the strictly musical aspects of her singing. The soprano appeared more concerned with the beauty of her tones than the meaning which these tones brought to her text. Several of the Cornelius "Brautlieder," for this reason, seemed inappropriate in sentiment and atmosphere. But this was a minor flaw. Artistry such as that possessed by Miss Diehl is welcome in spite of its shortcomings.

J. S. H.

Beethoven Program

Edward Steuermann, pianist, is well known for his beautiful and authoritative performances of Schoenberg's piano works, so it was especially interesting to hear him in an all-Beethoven program last night at the Ninety-second Street Y.M.H.A.

Mr. Steuermann is a formidable musician indeed. His ideas about Beethoven are mature, noble, warm, and patiently unfolded. The listener is never rushed headlong into the great composer's moods. Every note is prepared and justified, revealing the full cumulative power of each work. It would be a pleasure to report that Mr. Steuermann's technical control last night equaled the high standards he attains for his specialty, Schoenberg, but unfortunately, discrepancies in rhythm, occasional harsh tones and indistinct textures interfered with the development of the pianist's grand musical concepts. He was heard to best advantage in the slow movements of the F minor sonata, Opus 57 and the E major sonata, Opus 109. The variations, Opus 35, and the C major sonata, Opus 53, completed the program. T. M. S.

e integrated inale climax g magnifi-more notice-great anvil flats, set in from each ten by the
ens rarely,
for the ef-

f the single an say the
as one to chieve suber contem-nearly his that passes
Mr. Berneloquently.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

MAR 13 1952

Music

Bernstein Doubles in Strings

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Boston Symphony's last-but-one concert of their New York season was given in Carnegie Hall last evening. At its helm, as he will be again on Saturday afternoon, was Leonard Bernstein. Nor was that all that Mr. Bernstein did, for he played the solo part in the Mozart Piano Concerto in E-flat major K. 271. Other works were the Mozart "Eine kleine Nacht Musik," and the Sibelius Fifth Symphony.

This was not the first time, certainly, that Mr. Bernstein has given us the benefit of batonistic and keyboard talents at one sitting, as it were. Nor was it the last time for that sort of doubling.

One really has nothing against the practice—it is a practice, and of long and rich history. Dimitri Mitropoulos has served his muse likewise, as has Jose Iturbi, and also Bruno Walter, to mention a few in recent years.

Serene Sailing.

At any rate, Mr. Bernstein did not pick for himself some technical tarter to do it with, for the Mozart Concerto in question is anything but technically difficult. In other words, the young conductor could play the piano and he could give considerable attention to the other matter of leading the orchestra. All that with a better than reasonable expectation of serene sailing through the Mozartian seas.

Serene the performance was, serene but uneventful. There was clean piano playing, clean orchestral playing, a clean line throughout. However, there should have been more of vividness and color and variety.

Up to the conclusion that piece Mr. Bernstein had not yet regaled us with his well-known podium emotionalism. He did not in the Mozart Serenade and he could scarcely do that in the Concerto.

Episodic Is the Word.

It was the Sibelius, as things turned out, to become the anointed in that respect. Mr. Bernstein has a graceful figure on the conductor's stand. He has a magnificent bea[illegible]hat can be seen, I'm sure, by e[illegible] musician on the stage, as we[illegible] every other one in the house, [illegible]t counting the nonmusicians present. And just why he deems it important to give us the posturings, the tragedian's suffering, is more than I can understand. And I wish he wouldn't do it, because all that is just pure corn.

Moreover it was scarcely any help to his interpretation of Sibelius which — whether his Lou Tellegen acting had anything to do with it or not—hardly came up to some of the concise, beautifully integrated readings to which I have become accustomed. His version lacked tension, it lacked fluidity. In a word, it was episodic with thick walls to separate passages in each movement.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
MAR 14 1952

Boston Symphony

Orchestra, Under Leonard Bernstein, Heard by Enthusiastic Audience at Mosque

BY CHARLES HAUFLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its second visit to town this season in a concert at the Mosque last night and once again regaled a large audience by its superb performing. This time it was under the direction of Leonard Bernstein and had as a soloist Eugene Istomin, young pianist making his first appearance here.

The program was not over diversified but was of marked contrast, juxtaposing the conventional measures of Mozart and Beethoven with the broad surges of Sibelius. Both sides were well liked, with a tremendous show of applause following the performance of Beethoven's G Major Concerto by Istomin and wave after wave of enthusiasm evoked by the Finn's Fifth Symphony.

Delicacy

The Mozart number was his serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which opened the concert, and a delightful offering it was, its rippling, engaging melodies played with the utmost delicacy and clarity. The Beethoven Concerto was next, and unlike the "Emperor," was somewhat of a novelty here. Despite not being played too often, it has its moments, particularly its stimulating final vivace, which was brought to the audience by Istomin with a fine flair.

The pianist has an excellent technique and is an earnest performer. There were times last night when his tone, it seemed, partook more of hardness than power, but he played in the main expressively and smoothly and made so favorable an impression on listeners that he was recalled to loud applause several times.

The full resources and artistry of the orchestra came into play in the Sibelius work and quite a display it was. Strings and brasses fairly outdid themselves in sonorities and colorful effects as the tides of the somber, foreboding composition slowly rose and fell. Bernstein controlled the vaunting tonal developments admirably, as he also did with the more easily confined passages of the earlier numbers. It would have been a completely satisfying performance, for us at least, but for his distracting, hard to understand podium stomping.

A welcome improvement in the visual aspect of the concert was the use of another stage setting to replace the eye-offending flats of many past occasions at the Mosque. However, we may not have known when we were well off—musically. There was a certain dimness in the tone of the orchestra not heretofore noticed which may have been caused by the new velvet drapes.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

Berkshire Festival Plans Taking Shape

New York, March 14 (UP).—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer. Munch has been in Havana recuperating from his recent illness but will resume leadership of the orchestra shortly.

The Berkshire Festival will be in two parts. There will be six concerts in the smaller auditorium, the theater-concert hall, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Munch will conduct, and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. Choral works for this and the larger concerts will be prepared by Hugh Ross, leader of the festival chorus.

The concerts in the music shed will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks (Series A on July 24, 26, 27; Series B on July 31, Aug. 2, 3; Series C on Aug. 7, 9, 10).

Munch will conduct two concerts in each week. Pierre Monteux will conduct one concert each in Series A and B; Leonard Bernstein will conduct in the final week.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor and piano soloist. The program: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, K. 525; Piano Concerto in E-flat major, K. 271.....Mozart Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82 Sibelius

Sibelius and Mozart

For the second time in recent months, Wednesday night, one of the massive symphonies of Sibelius was presented in Carnegie Hall in the company of Mozart's music, and there is nothing quite like this eighteenth century master to refresh the spirit and fortify it for entering the dark, Nordic world of the contemporary Finnish composer. On this occasion, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein's direction, the combination worked well again, and the clear, controlled approach of this admirable conductor to the sprawling structure of the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius went quite a long way toward holding the attention of this observer, who is not particularly partial to the Finnish bard.

Whatever any of us may think, the full Sibelius orchestra will go on exerting its fascination on conductors as a means of spreading themselves out, working wonders with huge sonorities and indulging their ego. I find myself bothered by sections in which the composer seems on his way somewhere for a needlessly long time or worrying material beyond its capacity. But the music has its moments, and Bernstein made the most of them. He wasted no time stretching the line out more than the composer has himself stretched it out. He concluded the second movement powerfully, stated the Andante theme with an exceptionally sharp-edged tone, and spaced the final chords with stunning effect.

The Sibelius Fifth was the last work the late Serge Koussevitzky conducted with the Boston Symphony. That was in Boston, in December, 1950. It was ever one of his favorites and Bernstein had a fine model for its interpretation, since he grew up under Koussevitzky's wing. But while benefiting from his model, Bernstein has reconstructed it along quite new lines, and these make it considerably more palatable for one of my predispositions.

Though Bernstein has been on sabbatical only since last summer, it seems a much longer time -too long—since we last heard m conduct. His maturity of recent years places him in the front line of conductors, and it may take a while for his full stature to be realized, since the memory of his indiscretions of youth is still fresh. His thoroughgoing musicianship, an all-embracing, fluid musicianship, was further demonstrated Wednesday night by his performance of Mozart's earlier Concerto in E-flat, in which he was both pianist and conductor. I have always enjoyed Bernstein in this dual role of conductor-soloist. Unlike other conductors in this tour de force, he has more than one or two vehicles for such occasions. This concerto is, perhaps, still a bit too new for him to carry off the difficult stunt with ultimate perfection. But I found the chamber music effect he achieves compietely engaging, natural and unforced, and in the Andantino in particular my attention was held throughout by sensitivity, poetry and un impulse.

Boston Symphony Lists Tanglewood Progr

Charles Munch ha the programs to full Boston in this va

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1952

Boston Symphony Lists Tanglewood Programs

Charles Munch has announced the programs to be played by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in this summer's Berkshire Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will conduct six of the nine concerts to be given in three series on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons. Two concerts will be conducted by Pierre Monteux and one by Leonard Bernstein. The programs are:

Series A: July 24, Beethoven, "Eroica" Symphony and Brahms, Symphony No. 1. July 26 (Mr. Monteux conducting), Cimarosa, Overture to "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." July 27, Franck, "Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, choral work, Ravel, Suites from "Daphnis and Chloe."

Series B: July 31, Beethoven, "Leonore" Overture No. 3; Schumann, Piano Concerto; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Aug. 2 (Mr. Monteux conducting), Wagner, excerpts from "Ring" cycle, with soloists. Aug. 3, Beethoven, "Egmont" Overture and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Morts," with chorus (first American performance).

Series C: Aug. 7, Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Swanson, Short Symphony; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4. Aug. 9 (Mr. Bernstein conducting). Copland, Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5. Aug. 10, Berlioz, Requiem.

Mr. Munch will also conduct six chamber orchestra concerts on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall, offering works of Bach and early French composers July 5-6, of Mozart July 12-13, and of Haydn and Schubert July 19-20. Tickets can be obtained from the Boston Symphony's office in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 14 1952

MUNCH SUBMITS HIS PROGRAM FOR MUSIC FESTIVAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Be at Tanglewood July 5-Aug. 10

Charles Munch has returned from Cuba to his home in Milton recovered from his illness and ready to resume his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has drafted his programs for the rest of the season in Boston, for this orchestra's European tour next May and for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 5 to Aug. 10.

The programs for Tanglewood will be as follows:

Chamber orchestra concerts in the theater, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Mr. Munch to conduct two concerts in each week end.

Series A: Thursday, July 24, Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, July 26 (Pierre Monteux conducting), Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Sunday, July 27, Frank, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savonarola"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B: Thursday, July 31, Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Schumann, piano concerto; Hindemith Metamorphosis; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Saturday, Aug. 2 (Pierre Monteux conducting). Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists). Sunday, Aug. 3, Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus). First performance in America.

Series C: Thursday, Aug. 7, Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4. Saturday, Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting). Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5. Sunday, Aug. 10, Charles Munch will close the festival with a performance of Berlioz "Requiem" for Chorus and Orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

The season sale is being held at the subscription office in Symphony Hall. The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's School at Tanglewood, will have its 10th season through the si festival weeks.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
MAR 14 1962

Charles Munch Drafts Programs For Tanglewood

Charles Munch has returned from Cuba to his home in Milton, recovered from his illness and ready to resume his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has drafted his programs for the remainder of the season in Boston, for this orchestra's European tour next May, and for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5 to Aug. 10.

The programs for Tanglewood will be as follows:

Chamber orchestra concerts in the theater, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony orchestra in the music shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, Mr. Munch to conduct two concerts in each week end.

Series A—Thursday, July 24: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, July 26: (Pierre Monteux conducting) Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Sunday, July 27: Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savonarola"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B—Thursday, July 31: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Schumann, Piano Concerto; Hindemith Metamorphosis; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Saturday, Aug. 2: (Pierre Monteux conducting) Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists).

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BERNSTEIN DOUBLES FOR CONCERT HERE

Conducts Boston Symphony and Is Soloist in Mozart Work at Carnegie Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conductor and piano soloist, Leonard Bernstein. At Carnegie Hall.
Eine kleine Nachtmusik.....Mozart
Concerto in E flat (K. 271).....Mozart
Symphony No. 5 .....Sibelius

By OLIN DOWNES

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall in music by Mozart and Sibelius. He was pianist as well as conductor in the performance of the E-flat concerto numbered 271 in Koechel's catalogue. Rather curiously, and contrary to what one might have expected, Mr. Bernstein reached his height as an interpreter with Sibelius and not with Mozart. His performance of the "Kleine Nachtmusik" was pedestrian, dry in tone and in spirit, and the involuntary comparison with other performances of this same "Nachtmusik" with another conductor than Mr. Bernstein was not flattering to last night's interpretation.

Mr. Bernstein's performance of the concerto was neat, suave and unnecessarily miniature. He would seem to belong to that school of thought which conceives that Mozart must be played softly and small-scaled to reproduce his style. One might ascribe the closing of the piano lid to modesty, but that was a false modesty where this concerto is concerned. It should sound brilliantly from the piano as well as the ensemble, and it need not be played with its shoes quite so smoothly polished to communicate the effervescence and pulse of the music.

The ensemble was good, the delicate balances well judged, but there is more than discretion in this concerto, even in the finale, which on the whole is a weak and over-extended movement. Mr. Bernstein's performance of another Mozart concerto, last February in this city, was of far finer texture and more technically precise than the one he gave last night, and the G major, K. 453, is certainly a finer concerto.

The performance of the Sibelius symphony was a far more sizable achievement. One could take exceptions to a tempo here, an accent or other detail there. This was Mr. Bernstein's performance and he missed nothing that was in the score. The big spaces and magnificent solitudes, the passionate and solitary broodings were there.

The first movement is really the combination of two movements, and the changes of rhythm and pace and firm joining together of the two parts were admirably accomplished. The middle movement is thematically in the nature of a chaconne based upon a theme as simple as a nursery rhyme.

The development of this theme is technically resourceful and richly imaginative, and these attributes were not lost upon Mr. Bernstein. He took the beginning of the finale pretty fast, but again he integrated the movement and his finale climax was one of shattering magnificence. It was furthermore noticeable that he played the great anvil blows of the final B-flats, set in irregular accents, apart from each other, exactly as written by the composer—which happens rarely, and is very important for the effect of the symphony.

It is the symphony of the single living composer who can say the great elemental things as one to the manner born, and achieve sublimity. There is no other contemporary composer of nearly his stature, and every year that passes by confirms the fact. Mr. Bernstein reminded us of it eloquently.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music

by PAUL AFFELDER

Bernstein Appears as Pianist-Conductor At Boston Orchestra's Last Visit Here

Leonard Bernstein doubled as conductor and solo pianist last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its final visit of the season to the Academy of Music.

The entire first half of the program was devoted to a performance by the full string section of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp Minor, Op. 131. Though no credit was given on the program, the arrangement used was probably that of Dimitri Mitropoulos, which he used with both the Boston and Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestras some 15 years ago.

In our opinion, blowing up Beethoven quartets in this fashion is a musical disservice. True, the sonority is increased and made richer—especially when the magnificent Boston strings are playing—but as soon as a conductor takes hold of chamber music, and a large group begins to play it simultaneously, it loses its sense of completeness, its intimacy and, most important of all, its flexibility.

Showed Understanding

Mr. Bernstein conducted with evident understanding of the music and its implications, but he and 60 fine string players couldn't do what four good chamber musicians could—that is, makes this soul-searching music personal and communicative.

After intermission, Mr. Bernstein again tried his hand at playing a piano concerto and conducting from the keyboard. This time it was the Mozart Concerto in E flat Major (K. 271). As we have remarked on previous occasions, this is another experiment which just doesn't come off. With the top off the piano, most of the tone quality is lost, and with the soloist obliged to divide his attention between playing and conducting, the music loses much of its meaning. His was a fairly neat performance, except in the overly fast finale where many passages were blurred; but the overall interpretation was completely bloodless.

A Pallid Berlioz

We expected things to pick up in the concert's final number, the three familiar excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." This is the sort of music which would allow Mr. Bernstein to display his talent for colorful interpretations. Yet what we heard was entirely lacking in richness of texture, dynamic shadings or brilliance—characteristics so painstakingly included in the composer's imaginative orchestration.

A notice in the program informed us that, as usual, the orchestra will return for five more Friday evening concerts next season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 15 1952

Mrs. Olivia Luetcke [harpist] is the only woman in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She has another distinction in the B.S.O. She is one of the shortest—if not the shortest—players—five and one-quarter inches tall.—Boston Globe.

You ought to see her swan-dive glissando from the top of the harp!

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

PROGRAMS LISTED IN BERKSHIRE FETE

Boston Symphony Announces Concert Series to Be Led by Munch and Monteux

Programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., has been announced by the Boston Symphony. As in previous years, the main concerts in the Music Shed will be divided into Series A, B and C. There also will be concerts by a chamber orchestra in the Tanglewood Theatre.

Series A will open Thursday, July 24, with Pierre Monteux conducting Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Brahms First. On Saturday evening Charles Munch will conduct Cimarosa's "Secret Marriage" Overture, Schubert's Ninth Symphony in C major and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

The following afternoon Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in Franck's "Redemption," the Bizet Symphony, "Savonarola" by Dallapiccola and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suites.

The opening concert on Series B, on July 31, conducted by Mr. Monteux, will consist of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, the Schumann Piano Concerto, Hindemith's "Metamorphosis" and D'Indy's "French Mountain" Symphony. The program on Saturday night, with Mr. Munch at the helm, will be devoted to excerpts from Wagner's "Ring."

Sunday afternoon's program, again conducted by Mr. Munch, will contain Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Eighth Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and the first American performance of Honegger's "Danse des Morts."

Mr. Munch will open Series C on Aug 7 with Schumann's "First Symphony, Swanson's "Short Symphony" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth. Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Saturday evening concert—Copland's Third Symphony and Sibelius' Fifth. The festival will close with Mr. Munch's program on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10. Berlioz' Requiem will be the only work.

Chamber orchestra concerts in the theatre will be given Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. On July 5-6 Bach and early French composers will be featured. The programs on July 12-13 will be all-Mozart, and on July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 1952

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By VIRGIL THOMSON

CARNEGIE HALL

Last New York afternoon concert of the season; guest conductor, Leonard Bernstein; soloist, Patricia Neway, soprano. The program: String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131 ..... Beethoven
"Der Wein," concert aria ..... Berg
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 ..... Berlioz

Sombre Ceremony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Leonard Bernstein, gave a sombre program. A Beethoven String Quartet (Opus 131), played by the full string section, was but dimly illuminated by this multiplication. A concert aria (or solo cantata) by Alban Berg proved, in spite of its subject, which was the delights of wine, to be a sober, even sobering, experience. Only the Berlioz excerpts—the familiar "Will-o-the-Wisps," "Sylph Dance" and Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust"—savored of joy in the making of music.

* * *

These last were admirably conducted, deliciously played. Mr. Bernstein seemed happy in them. Also, in control of his orchestral balances in a way that has not always been his custom. First class in every way was their performance and deeply satisfactory. All the more satisfactory, indeed, coming after two not at all happy musical events.

* * *

The first of these, a Beethoven Quartet blown up to sixteen times life size, was doomed to failure beforehand. Designed for linear interest and not at all for great volume variation, any string quartet loses some of the former when the latter is imposed upon it. The sound of string parts composed for solo execution loses life, moreover, when subjected to mass execution. And the substitution of a unified command for the spontaneous flexibilities of chamber-music performance gives ever a coarse result. There has never been any justification in artistic effect or in popular appeal for playing the great quartet literature in symphonic version. It does not sound well, and it does not please. Yesterday the only moment that came to life was one on which no instrumental doubling had been imposed. Audible foot-patting from the conductor was of no help to the music, either.

* * *

Alban Berg's "Der Wein" is based on three poems by Baudelaire (called "Le Vin") translated into German by Stefan Georg. It is a twelve-tone piece for soprano and orchestra and, like most twelve-tone music, more apt in its communication of sorrow than of joy, of confused states than of clear delight. Actually it sounds very much like any other well composed twelve-tone work. Its vocal line is less hysterical than Schoenberg's; but it is jumpy, all the same. Patricia Neway's expert musicianship coped with its written notes expertly, but her monotonous of color and none too lovely voice was not shown off to advantage. The whole piece seemed gloomy and banal to me, its execution careful but far from happy.

Patricia Neway

Soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS 'DER WEIN'

Patricia Neway Is Soloist in Berg Concert Aria as Unit Closes Carnegie Season

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Patricia Neway, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.
String Quartet, Op. 131 ..... Beethoven
Der Wein, concert aria ..... Alban Berg
Excerpts from The Damnation of Faust ..... Berlioz

Alban Berg's extended concert aria, "Der Wein," was the highlight of the Boston Symphony's final Carnegie Hall concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Patricia Neway was the soprano soloist, and the orchestra was conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Berg's evocation of the subtle spirit of wine was composed in 1929, after the successful opera "Wozzek" and before his uncompleted "Lulu." Available records indicate that it had not been performed here since a League of Composers concert sixteen years ago, and Mr. Bernstein deserves credit for a significant revival.

Yesterday's event gives a hint as to reasons for the neglect, for the music not only is complicated for all concerned, but it makes heavy demands on the soloist's dramatic and emotional resources—demands whose fulfillment can mean the difference between its success or failure.

Miss Neway has remarkable vocal and dramatic assets, and she gave a performance that was practically note-perfect. The exciting sound of her voice rose above the tense, introverted comments of the orchestra in a pure and revealing line. It was apparent that she understood and felt the varying moods and expressions of the aria's three sections, although this was not always conveyed so distinctly in sound.

In the same way, one felt that the orchestra, whether because of the composition or performance, lacked the luminous clarity that one would expect after hearing "Wozzek." It was, nevertheless, a stirring experience, and the performers were warmly applauded.

The concert opened with the entire string section playing an arrangement of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131. There is precedent for this procedure (both Toscanini and Mitropoulous have done it), which is conceivably justified by the grand and elevated scale of the composer's last quartets.

But those musical thoughts are essentially intimate, and demand more personal expression than half a hundred men—no matter how expert, no matter how unanimous their spirit—can produce. The tone inevitably becomes thickened, dulled and sweentened, the communication becomes generalized and, especially where basses are used to help out the 'cellos, blunted. That wonderful string section could be used to better advantage.

C. H.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 1952

Music

by PAUL AFFELDER

Bernstein Appears as Pianist-Conductor At Boston Orchestra's Last Visit Here

Leonard Bernstein doubled as conductor and solo pianist last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its final visit of the season to the Academy of Music.

The entire first half of the program was devoted to a performance by the full string section of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp Minor, Op. 131. Though no credit was given on the program, the arrangement used was probably that of Dimitri Mitropoulos, which he used with both the Boston and Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestras some 15 years ago.

In our opinion, blowing up Beethoven quartets in this fashion is a musical disservice. True, the sonority is increased and made richer—especially when the magnificent Boston strings are playing—but as soon as a conductor takes hold of chamber music, and a large group begins to play it simultaneously, it loses its sense of completeness, its intimacy and, most important of all, its flexibility.

Showed Understanding

Mr. Bernstein conducted with evident understanding of the music and its implications, but he and 60 fine string players couldn't do what four good chamber musicians could—that is, make this soul-searching music personal and communicative.

After intermission, Mr. Bernstein again tried his hand at playing a piano concerto and conducting from the keyboard. This time it was the Mozart Concerto in E flat Major (K. 271). As we have remarked on previous occasions, this is another experiment which just doesn't come off. With the top off the piano, most of the tone quality is lost, and with the soloist obliged to divide his attention between playing and conducting, the music loses much of its meaning. His was a fairly neat performance, except in the overly fast finale where many passages were blurred; but the overall interpretation was completely bloodless.

A Pallid Berlioz

We expected things to pick up in the concert's final number, the three familiar excerpts from Berlioz's 'Damnation of Faust." This is the sort of music which would allow Mr. Bernstein to display his talent for colorful interpretations. Yet what we heard was entirely lacking in richness of texture, dynamic shadings or brilliance—characteristics so painstakingly included in the composer's imaginative orchestration.

A notice in the program informed us that, as usual, the orchestra will return for five more Friday evening concerts next season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 15 1952

Mrs. Olivia Luetcke [harpist] is the only woman in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

She has another distinction in the B.S.O. She is one of the shortest—if not the shortest—players—five and one-quarter inches tall.—Boston Globe.

You ought to see her swan-dive glissando from the top of the harp!

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
1952

PROGRAMS LISTED IN BERKSHIRE FETE

Boston Symphony Announces Concert Series to Be Led by Munch and Monteux

Programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., has been announced by the Boston Symphony. As in previous years, the main concerts in the Music Shed will be divided into Series A, B and C. There also will be concerts by a chamber orchestra in the Tanglewood Theatre.

Series A will open Thursday, July 24, with Pierre Monteux conducting Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Brahms First. On Saturday evening Charles Munch will conduct Cimarosa's "Secret Marriage" Overture, Schubert's Ninth Symphony in C major and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

The following afternoon Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in Franck's "Redemption," the Bizet Symphony, "Savonarola" by Dallapiccola and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suites.

The opening concert on Series B, on July 31, conducted by Mr. Monteux, will consist of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, the Schumann Piano Concerto, Hindemith's "Metamorphosis" and D'Indy's "French Mountain" Symphony. The program on Saturday night, with Mr. Munch at the helm, will be devoted to excerpts from Wagner's "Ring."

Sunday afternoon's program, again conducted by Mr. Munch, will contain Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Eighth Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia" and the first American performance of Honegger's "Danse des Morts."

Mr. Munch will open Series C on Aug. 7 with Schumann's "First Symphony, Swanson's "Short Symphony" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth. Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Saturday evening concert—Copland's Third Symphony and Sibelius' Fifth. The festival will close with Mr. Munch's program on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10. Berlioz' Requiem will be the only work.

Chamber orchestra concerts in the theatre will be given Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. On July 5-6 Bach and early French composers will be featured. The programs on July 12-13 will be all-Mozart, and on July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 16 1952

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By VIRGIL THOMSON

CARNEGIE HALL

Last New York afternoon concert of the season; guest conductor, Leonard Bernstein; soloist, Patricia Neway, soprano. The program:
String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131 ..... Beethoven
"Der Wein," concert aria ..... Berg
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24 ..... Berlioz

Sombre Ceremony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Leonard Bernstein, gave a sombre program. A Beethoven String Quartet (Opus 131), played by the full string section, was but dimly illuminated by this multiplication. A concert aria (or solo cantata) by Alban Berg proved, in spite of its subject, which was the delights of wine, to be a sober, even sobering, experience. Only the Berlioz excerpts—the familiar "Will-o-the-Wisps," "Sylph Dance" and Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust"—savored of joy in the making of music.

* * *

These last were admirably conducted, deliciously played. Mr. Bernstein seemed happy in them. Also, in control of his orchestral balances in a way that has not always been his custom. First class in every way was their performance and deeply satisfactory. All the more satisfactory, indeed, coming after two not at all happy musical events.

* * *

The first of these, a Beethoven Quartet blown up to sixteen times life size, was doomed to failure beforehand. Designed for linear interest and not at all for great volume variation, any string quartet loses some of the former when the latter is imposed upon it. The sound of string parts composed for solo execution loses life, moreover, when subjected to mass execution. [illegible] the substitution of a unified [illegible]mand for the spontaneous [illegible]f ch[illegible]r-music per-[illegible], coarse result. [illegible]d any justifica-[illegible]ct or in popular [illegible], the great quar-[illegible] symphonic ver-[illegible]t sound well, and [illegible]ease. Yesterday the [illegible] that came to life [illegible]which no instrumental [illegible]d been imposed. Au-[illegible]patting from the con-[illegible]gs of no help to the music.

* * *

[illegible]n Berg's "Der Wein" is [illegible] on three poems by Baude-[illegible] (called "Le Vin") translated [illegible]o German by Stefan Georg. It [illegible]a twelve-tone piece for soprano [illegible]nd orchestra and, like most twelve-tone music, more apt in its communication of sorrow than of joy, of confused states than of clear delight. Actually it sounds very much like any other well composed twelve-tone work. Its vocal line is less hysterical than Schoenberg's; but it is jumpy, all the same. Patricia Neway's expert musicianship coped with its written notes expertly, but her monotonous of color and none too lovely voice was not shown off to advantage. The whole piece seemed gloomy and banal to me, its execution careful but far from happy.

Patricia Neway

Soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 16 1952

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS 'DER WEIN'

Patricia Neway Is Soloist in Berg Concert Aria as Unit Closes Carnegie Season

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Patricia Neway, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.
String Quartet, Op. 131 ..... Beethoven
Der Wein, concert aria ..... Alban Berg
Excerpts from The Damnation of Faust ..... Berlioz

Alban Berg's extended concert aria, "Der Wein," was the highlight of the Boston Symphony's final Carnegie Hall concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Patricia Neway was the soprano soloist, and the orchestra was conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Berg's evocation of the subtle spirit of wine was composed in 1929, after the successful opera "Wozzek" and before his uncompleted "Lulu." Available records indicate that it had not been performed here since a League of Composers concert sixteen years ago, and Mr. Bernstein deserves credit for a significant revival.

Yesterday's event gives a hint as to reasons for the neglect, for the music not only is complicated for all concerned, but it makes heavy demands on the soloist's dramatic and emotional resources—demands whose fulfillment can mean the difference between its success or failure.

Miss Neway has remarkable vocal and dramatic assets, and she gave a performance that was practically note-perfect. The exciting sound of her voice rose above the tense, introverted comments of the orchestra in a pure and revealing line. It was apparent that she understood and felt the varying moods and expressions of the aria's three sections, although this was not always conveyed so distinctly in sound.

In the same way, one felt that the orchestra, whether because of the composition or performance, lacked the luminous clarity that one would expect after hearing "Wozzek." It was, nevertheless, a stirring experience, and the performers were warmly applauded.

The concert opened with the entire string section playing an arrangement of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131. There is precedent for this procedure (both Toscanini and Mitropoulous have done it), which is conceivably justified by the grand and elevated scale of the composer's last quartets.

But those musical thoughts are essentially intimate, and demand more personal expression than half a hundred men—no matter how expert, no matter how unanimous their spirit—can produce. The tone inevitably becomes thickened, dulled and sweetened. the communication becomes generalized and, especially where basses are used to help out the 'cellos, blunted. That wonderful string section could be used to better advantage.

C. H.

This Clipping From Boston Mass Guardian
FEB 16 1952

THE BOSTON POPS

By WALTER J. STEVENS

I recall reading an article in a prominent magazine some months ago that told of the "promenade concerts" in London in 1838. The writer described the Lyceum as "a small concert hall, cleared of seats, so that the audience could leisurely stroll about while the music played". A little later the audience sat, listened and drank glasses of beer and wine. These were called Pop concerts.

Whether the name "Pop" derived from the word popular or from the sound made by opening a bottle of wine, on one knows. The "Pops" however started in Boston in 1885 when the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra attempted to give its players a longer season and a larger income. At first the "Pops" was made up of only light music, but after a few weeks the programme became more elaborate Tables were installed in the old Music Hall, sandwiches were served, lobster salad at 40 cents an order, and even champagne was on tap. The idea of music and light refreshments combined met with immediate favor, according to the write up in the old Boston Transcript.

TheBoston "Pops" have now increased this popularity. Their recordings of light music ranging from the Grand March of Aida to heavier overtures, are best sellers. I have read that the ticket sales to these concerts amount to more than $175,000 a season.

With this extremely successful example one would think that long ago other cities would have adopted this type of concert. New York tried it in Carnegie Hall and failed. The venture was a commercial flop. Only in Boston of all the cities in America is the "Pops" a huge success. It is a Boston specialty. To begin with we have the Boston Symphony orchestra, and no other cit yhas this. Next we have Arthur Fiedler who for 21 seasons has conducted this great musical aggregation, and no other city has a conductor to equal him. A writer states, "He is the perfect example of the right man in the right spot." Fiedler is a native Bostonian. This man is serious and forceful. He believes in himself and the orchestra, and the audience believes in him. He is absolutly free of being a snob. He will grant an audition to any aspiring musician or singer regardless of race or color.

In a recent article about Mr. Fiedler, the writer describes him as a "debonair Bostonian, with the energy of a New Yorker and the humor of a Parisian". At fifty seven, Mr. Fiedler impresses one with his dash and fire. In fact we have heard that he will leave his house at any time to join in some volunteer fire fighting, and he also carries the Fire Department insignia on his car. He is a married man and a father, and meeting him for the first time at a gathering of colored folk, I thought him one of the most courteous gentlemen I had ever met.

Let us pass on to our summer visitors the information that Boston is the only city in America that satisfies the musical appetite of all its citizens.

IE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS 'DER WEIN'

Patricia Neway Is Soloist in Berg Concert Aria as Unit Closes Carnegie Season

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Patricia Neway, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.
String Quartet, Op. 131.....Beethoven
Der Wein, concert aria.....Alban Berg
Excerpts from The Damnation of Faust.....Berlioz

Alban Berg's extended concert area, "Der Wein," was the highlight of the Boston Symphony's final Carnegie Hall concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Patricia Neway was the soprano soloist, and the orchestra was conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

Berg's evocation of the subtle spirit of wine was composed in 1929, after the successful opera "Wozzek" and before his uncompleted "Lulu." Available records indicate that it has not been performed here since a League of Composers concert sixteen years ago, and Mr. Bernstein deserves credit for a significant revival.

one would expect after hearing "Wozzek." It was, nevertheless, a stirring experience, and the performers were warmly applauded.

The concert opened with the entire string section playing an arrangement of Beethoven's String Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131. There is precedent for this procedure (both Toscanini and Mitropoulous have done it), which is conceivably justified by the grand and elevated scale of the composer's last quartets.

But those musical thoughts are essentially intimate, and demand more personal expression than half a hundred men—no matter how expert, no matter how unanimous their spirit—can produce. The tone inevitably becomes thickened, dulled and sweentened. the communication becomes generalized and, especially where basses are used to help out the 'cellos, blunted. That wonderful string section could be used to better advantage.

C. H.

Makes Heavy Demands

Yesterday's event gives a hint as to reasons for the neglect, for the music not only is complicated for all concerned, but it makes heavy demands on the soloist's dramatic and emotional resources—demands whose fulfillment can mean the difference between its success or failure.

Miss Neway has remarkable vocal and dramatic assets, and she gave a performance that was practically note-perfect. The exciting sound of her voice rose above the tense, introverted comments of the orchestra in a pure and revealing line. It was apparent that she understood and felt the varying moods and expressions of the aria's three sections, although this was not always conveyed so distinctly in sound.

A Stirring Experience

In the same way, one felt that the orchestra, whether because of the composition or performance, lacked the lumin-

[107]

N.Y. Times Mar

Section 4 9

Music: Dallapiccola Work For Tanglewood Festival

By ARTHUR BERGER

When the Italian composer, Luigi Dallapiccola, comes to Tanglewood for his second summer as visiting instructor at the Berkshire Music Center, he will enjoy the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony perform his "Savanarola" for chorus and orchestra at the first Sunday afternoon concert of the Berkshire Music Festival in the shed, July 27. It has long seemed to some observers that it would be appropriate to make a regular policy of presenting in the major series a work by the visiting European composer.

The Boston Symphony's summer school chooses its visiting composer on the basis of his stature and international reputation. It seems to follow almost as a corollary, that having granted him this distinction and having brought him so far from home to teach in its school, the Boston Symphony should seize the occasion to honor him with a performance.

Charles Munch will conduct the Dallapiccola work on a program with Franck's "Redemption," Bizet's Symphony and both of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suites. It is no surprise to find that the other unfamiliar work to be given at the festival will be by Honegger, to whom Mr. Munch has shown himself on several occasions to be profoundly devoted. The contemporary French composer will be represented on the second Sunday by "Danse des Morts," which is also for chorus and orchestra.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia" are among the works to be heard with the Honegger. The final Sunday concert, Aug. 7, concluding the festival, will be the occasion for a major undertaking on the part of the Boston Symphony director, for he will conduct the Berlioz Requiem at that time.

Two contemporary American symphonies are also on the schedule. One of these, Copland's Third, will be given at the single program under Leonard Bernstein's direction, along with the Sibelius Fifth, on the final Saturday night program. The other American work, Howard Swanson's Short Symphony, will be conducted by Mr. Munch at his last Thursday program, along with Schumann's First Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Fourth.

The three weekends of concerts in the shed by the full orchestra will open conservatively Thursday night, July 24, with Mr. Munch conducting Beethoven's Third Symphony and Brahms' Fourth The second Thursday concert, also under Mr. Munch, will include Schumann's Piano Concerto. No soloist has been announced yet. This program will also include Hindemith's "Metamorphosis."

Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor for the first and second Saturday nights. Schubert's Ninth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre" will be his principal offerings July 26, and excerpts from Wagner's "Ring," with soloists, will be the fare on Aug. 2. All in all, the proportion of contemporary music is substantial and promises to establish closer contact between the festival and the school, which places its emphasis on the here and now.

Preceding the major series, there will be the usual chamber orchestra concerts, conducted by Mr. Munch in the Tanglewood Theater. Those on Saturday night, July 5, and Sunday afternoon, July 6, will be devoted to Bach and early French composers. A Mozart weekend is planned for July 12 and 13, while Haydn and Schubert will be the composers for the final concerts by the reduced Boston Symphony, July 19 and 20.

* * *

Schumann Devotee: Benno Moiseiwitsch, returning to the local concert platform after an absence of two seasons, has devised as his project for this occasion a series of two Schumann programs, the first of which will be given Friday night in Town Hall. The British pianist confesses to a policy of evasion when he is pressed by fans or interviewers to name his favorite composer. He tries, if he can, so he says, to "guard my secret that in the depths of my heart Schumann is and always was my favorite composer." Reminiscing over forty years of concertizing, Mr. Moiseiwitsch retains as one of his most cherished memories a series of three Schumann recitals he gave in one week in Wigmore Hall, London, some thirty years ago. Mr. Moiseiwitsch will give his second local Schumann recital Sunday night, March 30.

* * *

Various Items: Grant Johannesen will play Aaron Copland's Piano Variations of 1930 at his recital tonight (Town Hall). . . . Copland will also be represented on Vadim Hrenoff's program next Sunday (Town Hall, 5:30) by his early passacaglia which will be part of a first half entirely devoted to this and the related form of the chaconne. . . . The University of Texas is the latest of our institutions of higher learning to adopt the policy of the annual festival of contemporary American music. The three-day period of concerts will begin there Thursday. It is described as a symposium and includes both prepared concerts and reading sessions. . . . William Walton's opera, "Troilus and Cressida," will not be ready for mounting at Covent Garden next fall as originally planned, but the composer reports from Ischia that the work is progressing and its premiere may be expected next year.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN
MAR 17 1952

'Die Meistersinc

By MILES K

BOSTON MATINEE.

Neither the program nor Leonard Bernstein's conducting brought any lift to the final Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

Beethoven's string quartet, Opus 131, emerged only as a transcribed work instead of something in its own right.

In its garb for full string orchestra, Berg's Aria "Der Wein" sounded dated and rather colorlessly interpreted by Patricia Neway as soloist. Berlioz's excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" lacked crisp brilliance and color.

The lack of exhilaration could be traced to Bernstein's peculiar concept of the Beethoven. The Berg sounded much more alive. The Berlioz needed more lustre in spite of the Bostonians' excellent coloration.

WALL St. Journal, Dec. 18, 1951

VOL. XXXII No. 54

"Serious" Music

America, Land of Jazz, Turns Out to Be Lover Of the Symphony, Too

$45 Million-a-Year Receipts of The "Long-Haired" Events Surpasses Baseball Gate

Ballet Boom in Clarksdale

BY STANLEY KLIGFELD
Staff Correspondent of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

NEW YORK—Americans, who gave birth to such forms of music as be-bop, jazz and jive, are now becoming the world's most avid consumers of symphonies.

They're also becoming devotees of such other related types of art as opera and ballet in ever-growing numbers. This year more than 30 million folks have paid money to attend performances of "serious" music—about 30% more than five years ago and nearly double the number in 1941.

Columbia Concerts, Inc., big musical booking concern, estimates three times as many concerts will be given in the U.S. this year as in the rest of the world combined. O. O. Bottorff, president of National Concert & Artists Corp., another big booking company, notes U.S.-born singers and instrumentalists outnumber their foreign-born counterparts here by more than two-to-one. "Twenty years ago," he adds, "the figure was the other way around."

$45 Million a Year Business

This boom in demand for what one man who manages and stages the events calls his "product of cultural maturity" will push box-office receipts to the $45 million mark this year.

That figure is, of course, relatively small potatoes as U.S. industries go. A comparable business, for example, is the sale of popcorn in movie theatres, which also runs about $45 million annually. But it's more than the $40 million spent by the public at stadiums to see professional baseball games this year.

Impresarios (managers of musical events) take particular joy in the way their business has been growing in the smaller U.S. towns and cities. This year, for example, more than 2,100 towns have featured the "long haired" musicians, compared with only about 1,000 in 1940. Big Springs, Neb., (population 600) and Clarksdale, Miss., (population around 13,000) are among those which have taken to serious music in recent years.

Ballet Hunger in Clarksdale

"A few years back," recalls David Libidins, manager of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, "some Clarksdale people asked me before performance time what language ballet was spoken in. Today, people there are just as enthusiastic about ballet as the so-called sophisticated audiences in New York or Chicago."

Further evidence of the way serious music is spreading geographically may be seen in the growth of the number of symphony orchestras, identified with a specific town. Some, like the New York Philharmonic and the Boston, St. Louis, Chicago and Cincinnati symphonies have been in business since the 19th century. But in the last decade orchestras have sprung up, too, in such smaller places as Phoenix, Ariz.; San Jose, Calif.; Bridgeport, Conn.; Jackson, Miss.; Great Falls, Mont.; Casper, Wyo.; and the atomic town of Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Theories and Savages

Several reasons are given for the making of America into a land of lovers of great music.

Julian Olney, spokesman for the National Association of Concert Managers—sort of a trade association for impresarios—is partial to the theory that the U.S. is reaching "cultural maturity."

John Woolford, manager of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, thinks concerts for school children, such as those given by his orchestra over the last 10 years, have helped develop a taste for symphony. Increased music education in the public schools has probably helped too.

"Don't forget movies, the radio and recordings," say such bookers of talent as Elmer Wilson of Pasadena, Cecelia Schultz of Seattle, and Marvin McDonald of Atlanta. But one cynical European impresario, who arrived here a decade ago to find himself surrounded by "savages," put it this way: "Americans are still savages. Only now they've hit on supporting fine music as the most ostentatious way of displaying their wealth and playing they aren't savages."

The Program Revolution

Perhaps the most important reason for the increased popularity of serious music is the relatively recent revolution in programs. Time was when an impresario would aim an artist's program at a relatively small group of people educated to understand the technical fine points of music. The average man was about as much at home in a concert hall as in a convention of atomic scientists. He might like music, or be interested in the atom, but was in the wrong place to get the satisfaction he wanted.

Says Mr. Bottorff of National Concert & Artists: "The mass musical audience wants 'music for enjoyment'; it wants to be entertained. Top-flight artists can meet that demand as well as hill-billy singers. And that's what many are doing."

Sol Hurok, independent impresario who books through Mr. Bottorff's concern, agrees program reform has been in part responsible for the serious music spree. Donald Nugent of Columbia Concerts adds only a few artists today would dare to present, for instance, a series of piano sonatos arranged in the order they were composed, as once was a general custom. Few people are able, or interested

Please turn to Page 11, Column 2

"Serious" Music: U.S. Turns Out To Be a Lover of the Symphony

Continued from First Page

enough, to enjoy listening to the development of a composer's technique through the years as is supposedly revealed in such an arrangement.

"They'd just as soon read the Koran, whose chapters are arranged in order of length," comments one music-lover.

The Organized Audience Plan

Bringing the new-type programs to audiences throughout the country has been done primarily by two groups which have their roots in the 1920's—Community Concerts, a Columbia Concerts affiliate, and N.C.A.C.'s Civic Concerts. These two organizations work almost entirely in towns with populations of less than 500,000. Together, they presented last year more than 8,000 concerts, with the two groups dividing the field about 50-50.

These organizations operate on what is known as the "organized audience plan." Memberships are sold in a city on a season basis for $5 and include four or five concerts. With all tickets sold before any artists are booked or the season opens, there's little gamble, either by impresario or artist. And some local music lover isn't forced to make up deficits as used to be the case in smaller cities before the organized audience plan began.

Biggest city under the organized audience plan is St. Louis; the smallest: Big Spring, Neb. In between are roughly 2,000 other cities including such smaller places as LaPorte, Ind.; Glen Burnie, Md.; Magnolia, Ark.; Chester, Calif.; Olney, Ill.; and Goodland, Kansas. Among larger cities participating are Seattle, Oakland, Calif., and Worcester, Mass.

While the organized audience concert continues to thrive, the men who book attractions on an independent basis in the larger cities are one part of the industry who find their business in something of a slump. Typical of these is James A. Davidson, New York impresario and manager of Miss Margaret Truman. He attributes the current dip to the same decline which has hit movies, baseball and other entertainments in the last year.

How is Miss Truman doing? Pretty well. "She's an exception, of course," Mr. Davidson asserts. This impresario, formerly with the New York brokerage firm of Hayden, Stone & Co., got into the business of handling musicians through a connection with the motion picture industry.

Miss Truman gets about $1,500 per concert—very good for a relatively new artist. Performers starting out in the business usually get $50 to $100 a performance. Many beginners work for nothing, too, in the hope they'll be discovered.

Outstanding artists, like Artur Rubenstein, the pianist, earn as much as $100,000 a year—an amount comparable to the salary of Ted Williams, ace Boston Red Sox baseball player, or that of Ralph H. Tapscott, chairman of Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc., the nation's largest gas and electric utility company.

Pinza and Heifitz

Jascha Heifitz, one of the premier violinists, ordinarily receives $3,500 a concert, plus a percentage of the gate. Near the top financially is Ezio Pinza, Metropolitan Opera bass-baritone, who gained even greater fame as the romantic lead in the Broadway hit musical, South Pacific. Mr. Pinza gets $5,000 to $8,000 a concert.

The huge increase in the number of symphony orchestras in the nation has come despite the fact that few of them make money. Today there are close to 200 professional ones in the U.S., about 80% more than in 1940 and 900% more than in 1920. However, they earn only about 50% of their aggregate $16 million-plus a year expenses through sales of tickets and radio and recording incomes.

The rest comes from contributions from music-minded citizens—such gifts are deductible on the federal income tax—and symphony experts think one reason for the continued growth is in large part a matter of local pride.

Says Hans Heinsheimer of G. Schirmer, Inc., New York City music publishers: "Orchestras add glamour in any community." Arthur See, manager of the Rochester (N.Y.) Philharmonic Orchestra, a particularly successful one, adds: "Radio, recordings and motion pictures have let Americans everywhere—not only in the larger cities—know what a wonderful thing is symphonic music. They hear it on radio or records; they want it in the form of a 'live' orchestra at home."

Measure of the Boom

In Rochester, an average of 2,500 people show up at each concert in the huge auditorium built by the late George Eastman, founder of Eastman Kodak Co. In Oklahoma City it's almost impossible to buy a single ticket at a performance of the Oklahoma State Symphony. Each year the Utah Symphony Orchestra, located in Salt Lake City, visits Logan, a Rocky Mountain community of 12,000. Some 4,000 children show up at the afternoon concert; some 4,000 adults at night.

The growth of ballet and opera—while less spectacular is impressive.

The Sadler's Wells Ballet is perhaps the most successful of the ballet companies. In its 1950-1951 tour of 32 U.S. and Canadian cities it gave 153 performances and grossed $2,500,000. At a recent week's run of three days in Seattle and four days in Portland, Ore., the troupe's sister company—the Sadler's Wells Theatre Ballet—grossed $74,000. During the same seven days in New York such top Broadway musical shows as South Pacific and Top Banana pulled in only $50,000 each.

Ten years ago the nation had only two major opera companies—New York's Metropolitan and the San Francisco Opera. Today there's a third major company—the New York City Center Opera Company. In addition there are about 12 minor companies including the New Orleans Opera, the Lascala in Philadelphia and such touring troupes as the Charles Wagner Touring Opera Company.

This Clipping From ATLANTA, GA.
DAILY WORLD
MAR 16 1952

Gantt Featured On Top Program

With over 4,000 in attendance and several hundreds turned away, bass-baritone Hermann Gantt, recent Marian Anderson Scholarship Award winner, was a featured artist on the "Big Day Celebration," in conjunction with the National Bonds for Israel Campaign last Sunday evening in the Grand Ballroom and Lobby Salon of Boston's Hotel Bradford. Also on the program were Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis famed comedy team of stage, screen, radio and television. Also stars of "Bagels and Yox" the Yiddish-American hit revue at the Shubert Theatre.

Because of the overwhelming success of his appearance, Gantt is being asked by the Bond Committee to appear at a Rally at Madison Square Garden in New York.

Present to hear him was Leonard Bernstein, pianist-composer - conductor soon to be guest director of the Boston Symphony. Of Gantt's performance he said, "Beautiful, simply beautiful!"

Mr. Gantt will sing on June 14 under Berstein's direction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first Eastern performance of Stravinsky's intricate work "Les Noces" (The Wedding) at Brandeis University's Creative Arts Festival in its new amphitheatre at Waltham, Mass.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 20 1952

CONDUCTOR RETURNS AFTER ILLNESS—Charles Munch (left) with Cyrus Durgin, Globe music critic, as he made unexpected appearance yesterday at meeting of Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Munch Recovers From Illness, Resumes Conducting Next Week

By CYRUS DURGIN

The annual Symphony Hall meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always an interesting and pleasant occasion. But the one yesterday afternoon had a further aspect that gave a lift to everyone present. That was the return of conductor Charles Munch after an illness which had kept him away for nearly five months.

Accordingly, everyone, orchestra and audience, rose when Mr. Munch stepped out upon the stage to begin the short musical part of the meeting. They stood applauding him until he made a gestured request for silence.

"One cannot live without friends," said Mr. Munch. "What would life be without friends? What would this orchestra, these wonderful musicians be without the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony?"

Then the conductor announced that he would resume his activities with a piece which the orchestra will play in Paris, Brussels and Bordeaux, during the coming European trip, as well as at Symphony Hall next week: the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane."

The instant he had begun conducting, you knew Charles Munch was back at the head of his orchestra. They played for him as, I think, they have not quite played since last October. You would not have known, however, had you not been told, that Mr. Munch had suffered illness. His manner, his intensity of conducting, seemed much the same. He looked trim and well.

Mr. Munch will resume his public appearances next Thursday at an open rehearsal and at the concerts of March 28 and 29.

During the business meeting, Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Society of Friends, stated that, thanks largely to the contribution to the orchestra, by the subscribers, of the money representing the amount of the now repealed Federal admissions tax, there will be no deficit this season. He added, however, that a deficit is in prospect next season.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, said that tickets next season will revert to the original price before the former tax was computed. That is, a subscription costing $120, tax included, would be $100. Mr. Cabot thanked the orchestra for their understanding and patience in financial matters and added that negotiations are being conducted with the aim of salary increases for the players.

The audience was one of the largest since the society was founded. Tea was served in the upper foyer after the meeting.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 20 1952

SYMPHO... BUDGET IS BALANCED

Increase in Radio and Recording Royalties

BY ROSE WALSH

Oliver Wolcott had good news for friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday afternoon's annual meeting at Symphony Hall.

MUNCH CONDUCTS

After his announcement that due to individual contributions bequests and an increase in record royalties and radio receipts the B. S. O. will balance its budget this year came the news that Charles Munch, who has been absent through illness for some time, would conduct the afternoon's concert.

Among those applauding his return were Mrs. Allan Forbes, Dr. and Mrs. Lewis Perry, Mrs. Alexander Steinert and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Frederick J. Leviseur, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Louis Speyer, Mrs. Richard Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Laughlin, Mrs. Arthur M. Beale, Mrs. W. E. Leuchbenberg and Miss Florence Garrity who had as guests, Lady Valerie Goulding and Mrs. Cedric C. Callaghan.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 20 1952

Munch Announces Tanglewood Slate

Programs for the 1952 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., have just been announced by Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch, in a series of six concerts to be given in the theater Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13 and 19-20, will conduct music by the following composers:

In the first week, Bach; in the second, Mozart, and in the third, Haydn and Schubert.

In a series of nine concerts to be given in the shed, Mr. Munch will share the conducting honors with Pierre Monteux. The concerts will be divided into three series, each series consisting of three performances.

* * *

SERIES A will consist of concerts on July 24, 26 and 27. On the 24th, Mr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica;" and Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor. On 26th, Mr. Monteux will con the overture, "The Se riage," by Cimaro Symphony No. 9 Stravinsky's "Rit On July 27, Mr. M duct Franck's sy from "The Redem phony by Bizet, "Da "The Release of Savonar chorus, and Ravel's Daph Chloe Suites 1 and 2, also with chorus.

Series B will fall on July 31, Aug. 2 and Aug. 3. On the 31st, Mr. Munch will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Lenore No 3," a Schumann piano concerto, "Metamorphosis" by Hindemith and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air."

In the second concert of Series B, August 2, Mr. Monteux will conduct an all-Wagnerian program with soloists whose names are to be announced later.

* * *

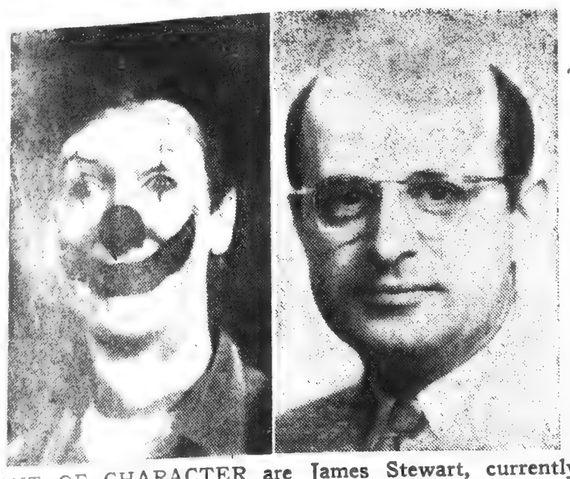
ON AUG. 3, Mr. Munch will direct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8, Debussy's "Iberia" and "Danse des Morts" by Honegger, with chorus.

Aug. 7, 9 and 10 are the dates of the final series, Series C. on the 7th Mr. Munch will conduct Schumann's Symphony No. 1, "Spring;" Swanson's Short Symphony, and Symphony No. 4 by Tchaikovsky.

Leonard Bernstein will be guest conductor on the 9th, when Aaron Copland's Symphony No. 3 and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 will be performed.

In the final concert of the season, Aug. 10 Mr. Munch will direct Berlioz' "Requiem" with chorus.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 21 1952



OUT OF CHARACTER are James Stewart, currently clowning in "The Greatest Show on Earth," and Norman Shirk, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony, who's taking a fling onstage.

Theatre Talk

It's Getting Hard to Tell Who's Who These Days

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Everybody's trying to get into the act. The managers want to be actors, and the actors want to be singers. The comedians want to play Hamlet and the tragedians long to be comics.

Take Jimmy Stewart, who is noted for playing serious roles. They've got him doing a clown in "The Greatest Show on Earth," De Mille's epic at the Metropolitan.

Audiences are used to Jimmy as a friendly casual fellow, the guy who usually misses the girl, or who undergoes great mental torture with stoic calm. See, he's a serious actor who plays a funnyman.

And then there's Norman Shirk, in another walk of life, an assistant manager of the Boston Symphony. He's going to get into the act as a performer when Harry Dubbs and a company of Boston Symphony players put on a concert for kids in the Brookline High School come Saturday. Once a concert artist in Pennsylvania, Shirk is going back to his old trade, this time as a narrator of Don Gillis' musical story, "The Man Who Invented Music."

Now there's still another character who's trying to get into the act. Gillis is a New York radio executive. But he composes on the side. In fact, some of his pieces, like the Symphony No. 3½ (I think that's the title), have been performed by Toscanini.

Maybe you guessed, noting Shirk's name and that he comes from Pennsylvania, that he might be one of the Pennsylvania Dutch folk. You were right. The dialect is natural to him, and when he was confronted by a reporter, he fell into the dialect the other day, as natural as pie. And here's how he described what goes on in "The Man Who Invented Music."

* * *

"You want mebbe I schut tell you whatfer zing ziss iss, anyhow yet? Now mind I tell you. It's like diss. Ay lj'l nixnootz makes laht tell her grampop sess a choke. He makes aht he's de gink what startet mew-sick. He sess he went by de woods aht, and stratet to make a tree dahn wiss his axe, and venn he hit de tree, it mate a nice tune.

"Den he sought, 'Vel, if woot makes so nice, I wanded vat stones vil do.' Den he hit a stone and it sorendet rite like a bell. Aht uf sticks and stones came mew-sick rite like marches, end dences, end sings like dat-dare. Asz he talks, de tunes what he makes iss made-like by de dypes, de boss-gykes, de floss-hahns, de tswarich-pifes, de drooms and deckers. . . ."

* * *

Well, you see what I mean. For this there should be a special glossary. But by this time the reporter was so exhausted taking down notes that in the confusion he fled.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the [illegible] of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: Richard Sogg, piano; David Lloyd, tenor; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Oscar Henry, baritone; Wesley Addy, speaker; Assistant Conductor, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The program:

Symphony in C, K.338 ..... Mozart
Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune for Piano Solo, Chorus and Orchestra ..... Vaughan Williams
Oedipus Rex ..... Stravinsky

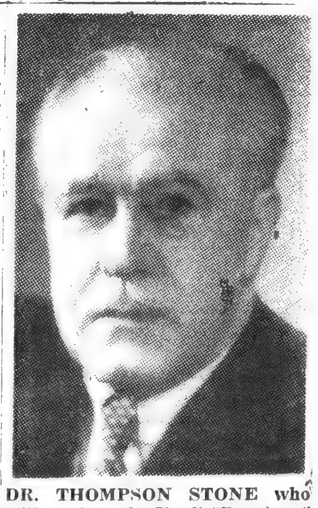
By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE FEATURE of G. Wallace Woodworth as a choral conductor has often been remarked: his work and his musical standards as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society has long since placed him among the foremost leaders in that special field.

He has conducted the Boston Symphony before, too, and he conducted it equally at home with very different baton technique as orchestral leader. But to the full extent of his true esteem he did the [illegible] beautiful [illegible] and in the best possible [illegible] I don't ever [illegible] finale go [illegible] really [illegible] in the presentation of works, one of [illegible] unseen quality, [illegible] the ranking choruses [illegible] so far. [illegible] an attractive and [illegible] Mr. Woodworth's actual baton technique [illegible] Koussevitzky's. In many ways his gestures and movements recall those of the late conductor, though he never overdoes it. His beat is precise and clearly defined (as a choral conductor's has always to be), but it is flexible, too; an dhis musical conceptions are clean, and strong yet filled with warmth and humanity. He is, in short, a musical leader who, had he wished to, might have become a virtuoso conductor of the first rank.

IT WAS GIVEN the finest performance in my experience. David Lloyd, after a slow start, gave the role of Oedipus with breadth and emotional vigor while Eunice Alberts, never in better form vocally, sang Jocasta with queenly nobility. Mr. Tibbets sang well, too, though his conceptions might have been a little more vivid, and Oscar Henry did the bit of the shepherd very well. Wesley Addy, who has narrated the work here before, enunciated excellently but with a little too much theatrical emphasis here and there. The chorus, meantime, never sang so splendidly or with such phonetic and musical precision, while the orchestra gave the whole brilliant support. Mr. Woodworth, in short, who has so often prepared these choral works but so seldom had the opportunity to realize them, made the afternoon one of exceptional interest.

Charles Munch, fully recovered, returns next week to a Symphonic piece of Fracnck, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.



DR. THOMPSON STONE who will conduct the Verdi "Requiem," with the Handel and Haydn Society in Symphony Hall tomorrow night.

nsky's 'Oedipus' at Symphony

Woodworth Guest Conductor for Oratorio

By Harold Rogers

The program this week end by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unusual for a variety of reasons, all of which are fused—in Stravinsky's Opera Oratorio "Oedipus Rex"—into a climax of deepened tragedy, exciting sound, and choral splendor.

These contributing elements, as evident in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, are provided by the guest conductor G. Wallace Woodworth, genial and energetic director of the Harvard Glee Club; by a trio of superb soloists, Paul Tibbetts, David Lloyd, and Eunice Alberts; and by the Harvard Glee Club itself, one of America's leading undergraduate choral organizations.

* * *

Stravinsky composed his masterly oratorio in 1926-27 and selected as his text Daniélou's Latin translation of Jean Cocteau's rendition of the Sophoclean tragedy. Cocteau, whose specialty is the transformation of classic stories and plays into modern terms, has also made excellent use of the Oedipus legend in his drama, "The Infernal Machine."

Stravinsky is said to have preferred a Latin translation because he wished to think in purely phonetic terms, in terms of the syllable. In this he was remarkably successful; the syllables fairly crackle in their forthrightness. But Stravinsky never forgot the underlying emotion of Cocteau's abbreviated text; indeed, the emotional impact of the music compensates for the information that such a shortened text cannot provide.

But "a certain monumental aspect of its various scenes" is preserved, as a speaker tells us in a prologue. Candidly wishing to spare our ears and our memories, he tells the story as it unfolds, thus making the use of a dead language by the singers of no obstacle to modern listeners. Wesley Addy was the poised speaker, enunciating the lines in a clipped, dramatic, and ringing manner.

* * *

While portions of Mr. Tibbett's opening solo were covered by the agitation of the orchestra, his baritone voice was otherwise heard to dynamic and compelling effect. He carried the roles of Creon, Tiresias, and the Messenger.

David Lloyd, who sang the Oedipus solos four years ago in Symphony Hall, was again heard in this role, singing with his high standard of clarity and eloquence. Miss Alberts carried the long Jocasta solo with a dark, magnificent power. Oscar Henry sang the Shepherd's short air in a fine lyrical tenor.

Though occasionally there was a slight lack of precision between the chorus and orchestra, the chorus itself sang as one voice, a voice that drove its message home with elemental force. Stravinsky's neo-classic score, spare and often brutal, effectively underlined the action through Mr. Woodworth's intense direction. The minor third, pounded out again and again by the timpani, lent a particularly ominous note.

Prior to "Oedipus" Mr. Woodworth presented the first performance at these concerts of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune for Piano Solo, accompanied by Orchestra, Organ, and Chorus. Richard Sogg, Harvard pianist who was heard in this work a month ago in Sanders Theater, is again the soloist. His conception and command of this work has meanwhile grown remarkably.

Mr. Woodworth opened the concert with a fine Anglo-Saxon impression of Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34.

Verdi Requiem Scheduled

The Handel and Haydn Society, under the conductorship of Thompson Stone, will present Verdi's Requiem and Zalton Kodály's Psalmus Hungaricus in Symphony Hall Sunday evening.

The Verdi Requiem was given by the Society last spring and is to be repeated this season by request of many patrons. In view of this request the same quartet heard in the performance last spring will be soloists for the coming presentation. These are Alice Farnsworth, soprano; Lillian Chookasian, contralto; Paul Knowles, tenor; and Paul King, bass.

An orchestra of 70 players will assist the chorus and soloists.

Entertainment Timetable on Page 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Those who heard the Conservatory's performance of Honegger's "King David" on Thursday night and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," as directed by G. Wallace Woodworth at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, could make interesting comparisons between these two works, so alike in some respects and so dissimilar in others. Both came from that stormy musical period, the 1920s. The setting of one is Biblical, that of the other, Greek. Each piece is available for either stage or concert presentation and in the latter form, at least, each requires a chorus, soloists, orchestra and speaker. Honegger adds an organ to his forces, and Stravinsky a piano.

It seems to me, despite the power of Stravinsky's music and its more distinctive idiom, that the advantage lies with "King David." Honegger's work has a color and variety, a richness of treatment, a melodiousness that Stravinsky's lacks. The Frenchman rises to every occasion, the Russian is master here of only one element in his oratorio-opera, the relentless fate that has Oedipus in its clutches at the outset and that carries him to his dreadful doom. In the delineation of this aspect of the drama, Stravinsky is superb, but when the human element enters he is less successful. Jocasta's big air, sung yesterday by Eunice Alberts, is a relief from the prevailing somberness and it has about it a touch of grandeur but Stravinsky can find for the chorus of Oedipus' subjects, near the end of the piece, no more fitting expression of their pity than a jaunty passage that sounds like something out of the early Verdi.

Nobody has ever equalled, in the role of Jocasta, Mme. Matzenauer, who first sang it here in 1928, but Miss Alberts was decidedly better than her immediate predecessor. David Lloyd was again effective as Oedipus, and Wesley Addy once more did his best with the stilted passages assigned to the Speaker. Paul Tibbetts ably assumed the three baritone roles and Oscar Henry was satisfactory as the Shepherd. Once more the Harvard Glee Club covered itself with glory in this difficult music.

Mr. Woodworth's program opens with Mozart's C major Symphony, No. 34, which is one of the better ones, if not one of the best. Yesterday it received a performance that was completely in the Mozartean spirit. The remaining item on this 19th list is Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune, that was heard for the first time in this vicinity at an all-Vaughan Williams concert that the forces of Harvard and Radcliffe gave in Sanders Theatre on Feb. 15, last. Yesterday, as before, Richard Sogg gave a capable account of the piano part. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society sang the music lustily, under Mr. Woodworth's direction, as they had before, and this time they had the Boston Symphony to help them out. The work itself is effective in an obvious sort of way, though the interrupting cadenzas for the piano do not seem to have much point to them. England's foremost living composer has given us better things than this product of his 78th year.

[110]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 22 1952

MUSIC

G. Wallace Woodworth Leads Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

G. Wallace Woodworth is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. Since he is also conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, it is natural that he has chosen a largely choral program in which those organizations take part. The two choral scores are Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm Tune, and Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." The one purely orchestral number is the C Major Symphony (one of the Salzburg group, and K. 338) by Mozart.

Bearing in mind the traditional injunction about the dentures of proffered steeds, nonetheless one may observe that the choral Vaughan Williams and Stravinsky, in large quantity, are decidedly dry. So it proved yesterday, though the performance of each appeared to be admirable.

Vaughan Williams' curious work, which had been presented by Mr. Woodworth in Cambridge about a month ago, is for "piano solo, accompanied by orchestra, organ and chorus." It is music of rugged stature, of power and thoroughly craftsmanlike facture. It truly "sounds." But in its monumental grandeur, like "Oedipus Rex," it is but intermittently and slightly moving. One can hear it, admire its worth and otherwise remain untouched. The piano solo was most ably taken by Richard Sogg.

The soloists for "Oedipus Rex" were tenor David Lloyd, in the title role; contralto Eunice Alberts as Jocasta; Paul Tibbett as Creon, Tiresias and The Messenger; Oscar Henry as The Shepherd, and Wesley Addy, very eloquent and clearly-spoken, indeed, as The Narrator.

Mr. Woodworth and the Harvard Glee Club obviously had made this work a labor of love, and from first to last the whole performance was tense, dramatic, and massive. Mr. Lloyd's singing, truly operatic, and that of Miss Alberts and Mr. Tibbetts lacked nothing of tonal beauty or expressive impact. You are not likely to encounter a more forceful presentation of "Oedipus Rex."

I must confess, however, that I am in outer darkness so far as any feeling other than objective admiration is concerned. To me the idiom is impersonal (intentionally so) and its effect is to touch the mind but never the heart. The tragedy of Oedipus is here something awesome and remote, perceived darkly and distantly through the lens of a musical art intended to filter out emotion and leave only a sense of antique grandeur. To me, such music is as dead as the Latin upon which it is conveyed.

The Mozart Symphony went well, in a performance full-bodied and vigorous, cleanly detailed, rhythmically alive and tonally rich. Mr. Woodworth was most cordially received through the afternoon.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 23 1952

Munch Announces Berkshire Plans

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has drafted his programs for the remainder of the season in Boston, for his Orchestra's European tour next May, and for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5 to August 10.

The programs for Tanglewood will be as follows:

Chamber Orchestra concerts in the Theatre, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons, Mr. Munch to conduct two concerts in each weekend.

SERIES A:—Thursday, July 24—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, July 26 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage;" Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Sunday, July 27—Franck, symphonic piece from "The Redemption;" Bizet, symphony; Dallapiccola, chorus, "Savonarola"; Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe." Suites 1a nd 2 (with chorus).

SERIES B:—Thursday, July 31—Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Schumann, piano concerto; Hindemith Metamorphosis; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Saturday, Aug. 2 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists). Sunday, Aug. 3—Beethoven, overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia;" Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus)—first performance in America.

SERIES C:—Thursday, Aug. 7—Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony;" Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4. Saturday, Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting)—Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5. Sunday, Aug. 10—Charles Munch will close the festival with a performance of Berlioz' "Requiem" for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

The season sale is being held at the subscription office in Symphony Hall. The Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's school at Tanglewood, will have its 10th season through the six festival weeks.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the 19th concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Richard Sogg, piano; David Lloyd, tenor; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Paul Tibbetts, baritone; Oscar Henry, tenor; and Wesley Addy, speaker. Assisting were the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. The program: Symphony No. 34 in C (K.338) Mozart Fantasia on the Old 104th Psalm for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra ..... Vaughan Williams
Oedipus Rex ..... Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE STATURE of G. Wallace Woodworth as a choral conductor has often been remarked; his work—and his musical standards—as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society has long since placed him among the foremost leaders in that special field.

He has conducted the Boston Symphony before this, too, and demonstrated himself equally at home in the very different baton technic of the orchestral leader. But it remained for yesterday's concert to reveal the true extent of his musicianship. He did the Mozart symphony with a beautiful clarity of line and in the best possible taste (though I don't ever remember hearing the finale go quite that fast), but he really came into his own in the presentation of two choral works, one of them of pretty uneven quality, the other one of the ranking choral works of the century so far.

Presenting an attractive and modest appearance, Mr. Woodworth's actual baton technique derives from Koussevitzky's. In many ways his gestures and movements recall those of the late conductor, though he never overdoes it. His beat is precise and clearly defined (as a choral conductor's has always to be), but it is flexible, too; and his musical conceptions are clean, and strong yet filled with warmth and humanity. He is, in short, a musical leader who, had he wished to, might have become a virtuoso conductor of the first rank.

THE NEW WORK on the program yesterday was Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on the "Old 104th" Psalm. Grandiosely set for piano solo, orchestra, chorus and organ (the organ was omitted yesterday) it is a composition that produces a mingled reaction. Its accompanied choral parts are fine, reaching at times a nobilty of expression as well as a musico-religious emotion that is remarkably effective.

These choral parts occur in three stanzas, often against a chorale-like statement of the Psalm itself in the brasses, and achieve mounting tension with each stanza. Each is introduced by an extended cadenza for the solo piano, a device of considerable novelty.

And it may be said that these cadenzas, very improvisatory, in character, were brilliantly realized by Richard Sogg, a Harvard senior of remarkable musical ability. These cadenzas, however, are altogether too amorphous; they never come to grips with the thematic material in a way to catch and hold the musical attention. They do hold attention as pieces of keyboard virtuosity, of course, but they just never seem to be getting anywhere. Indeed, this peculiar quality of never getting anywhere really, seems to be present in much of Vaughan Williams' music. It's good, it's very good, it is sometimes remarkably good, but it seems contrived rather than inspired; it seems special rather than universal.

Contrasted with it, Stravinsky's "Oedipus," spoke with incredible musical tragectory; it was clear, from the first hushed cry of the men of Thebes to Oedipus to save the city from the pestilence that a towering giant of music knew exactly where he was going and knew exactly how to get there. The tragedy of Oedipus in Stravinsky's music, consequently, builds and grows and is fulfilled with the same crushing inevitability of the drama itself. And the wonderful thing is that with every hearing of this work, the essentially beautiful musical values in it—at first so hard to grasp—emerge more and more. This is the stuff of the classic; the music is there, it merely remains for the listener to grow to hear it.

IT WAS GIVEN the finest performance in my experience. David Lloyd, after a slow start, gave the role of Oedipus with breadth and emotional vigor while Eunice Alberts, never in better form vocally, sang Jocasta with queenly nobility. Mr. Tibbetts sang well, too, though his conceptions might have been a little more vivid, and Oscar Henry did the bit of the shepherd very well. Wesley Addy, who has narrated the work here before, enunciated excellently but with a little too much theatrical emphasis here and there. The chorus, meantime, never sang so splendidly or with such phonetic and musical precision, while the orchestra gave the whole brilliant support. Mr. Woodworth, in short, who has so often prepared these choral works but so seldom had the opportunity to realize them,

IN THE THEATERS
BRATTLE
Sheridan's
mances
a 20th
Kilts.
8:30 P. M.
COLONIAL—man Cas take m dred ers.
8:30 P. M.
PLYMOUTH
Broadw
love in Regine
capitol
P. M.
SHUBERT with th and D
P. M.
WILBUR—comedy
Teresa stars
P. M.

made the afternoon one of exceptional interest.

Charles Munch, fully recovered, returns next week to a Symphonic piece of Franck, Rousseau's Bacchus et Arianne and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
MAR 23 1952

Charles Munch Back Thursday

Charles Munch will make his public appearance as the conductor of the Boston Sym... Orchestra when the ref... at Symphony Hall is opened to the public next Thursday evening, March 27, at 7:30.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 23 1952

Charles Munch Back To Conduct Symphony

Charles Munch is again with his orchestra, and will resume conducting at the Boston Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. His program will open with Cesar Franck's Symphonic Piece from "Redemption," and include the second Suite from Roussel's Ballet, "Bacchus et Arianne." The closing number will be Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

This orchestra will give a concert in Sanders Theatre Cambridge, next Tuesday, March 25, when G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct. The program will consist of Mozart's Symphony in C, No. 34, Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, and Stravinsky's Oratorio "Oedipus Rex." The Harvard Glee Club will assist, and the following soloists: Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, Oscar Henry, Paul Tibbetts, and Wesley Addy (the speaker). On Sunday, April 30, Mr. Munch will conduct the last program but one of the Sunday afternoon series in Symphony Hall. The program: Franck's Symphonic Piece from "Redemption," Rouseel's Suite from "Bacchus and Arianne," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
MAR 23 1952

Berkshire Programs Now Announced

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5-Aug. 10. Chamber Orchestra concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, are: July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

Munch has accepted invitation of the Orchestra's trustees to serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. The 1952 session, June 30-Aug. 10, will be the tenth.

Pierre Monteux and Leonard Bernstein will be guest conductors in the Music Shed by the full Boston Symphony on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Munch to conduct two concerts in each weekend. The schedule:

Series A: July 24—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Brahms, Symphony No. 1; July 26—(Monteux) Cimarosa, Overture "The Secret Marriage", Schubert, Symphony No. 9 C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring"; July 27—Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savonarola"; Ravel, "Daphnic and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 with chorus.

Series B: July 31—Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Schumann, Piano Concerto; Hindemith "Metamorphosis"; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air; Aug. 2—(Monteux) Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," with soloists; Aug. 3—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Mortes," with chorus, first performance in America.

Series C: Aug. 7—Schumann, Symphony No. 1; Swanson, Short Symphony; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4; Aug. 9—(Bernstein) Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Aug. 10—Brelioz, "Requiem," chorus and orchestra and four supplementary brass choirs.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Charles Munch, musical director for the Berkshire festival has announced the program which will be held at Tanglewood, Mass., during the summer. Munch will share conducting for the season with Pierre Monteux and Leonard Bernstein.

Chamber orchestra concerts will be given in the theater on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoons during July.

Concerts by the full Boston Symphony orchestra will be held in the Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE KEPT BUSY

By RAYMOND MORIN

There was a time when symphony players rested during the Summer months, but it's a different story now for members of the Boston Symphony.

Under Charles Munch, the orchestra will close its Boston season on April 26. Two days later he will accompany the orchestra as it sails on its first trip to Europe for a tour under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

Their debut will be May 6 at the Theatre Des Champs-Elysees in Paris. This will be under the sponsorship and in the presence of Hon. Vincent Auriol, President of France.

'Fled From Theater'

Thursday, May 8 will be a special event. Pierre Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony in Igor Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." He conducted this work at its world premiere in 1913, and the audience reacted so violently that the composer, who had been backstage, fled from the theater.

On May 21, the orchestra will perform its last Paris concert under Mr. Munch, and the players will hasten back for the Esplanade and "Pops" concerts under Arthur Fiedler. Taking place every night for six weeks, these represent a season by themselves.

With these tasks completed, the symphony men then embark for Tanglewood, and here is the schedule that is lined up from July 5 through August 10 . . .

Chamber orchestra concerts in the Theater, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons—July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

Schedule of Concerts

The concerts by the full orchestra in the music shed will be given on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons, Mr. Munch to conduct two concerts each weekend.

Series A: July 24—Beethoven, Symphonny No. 3, "Eroica," Brahms, Symphony No. 1; July 26 (Mr. Monteux conducting) — Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage," Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major, Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring"; July 27 — Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Bizet, Symphony, Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savonarola," Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B: July 31—Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Schumann, Piano Concerto, Hindemith, Metamorphosis, D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air; Aug. 2 (Mr. Monteux conducting) — Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists); Aug. 3—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8, Debussy, "Iberia," Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus) —First performance in America.

Series C Concerts

Series C: Aug. 7—Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony"; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4; Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting) — Copland, Symphony No. 3, Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Aug. 10—Mr. Munch will close the festival with a performance of Berlioz' "Requiem" for chorus and orchestra with four supplementary brass choirs.

The season sale is being held at the subscription office in Symphony Hall, Boston 15. The Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's school at Tanglewood, will have its tenth season through the six festival weeks.

Lind Legends

In less than 24 hours, every seat in Worcester's old City Hall was sold for the Jenny Lind concert that began at 8 o'clock, the evening of December 10, 1851.

The following quotation from the Daily Morning Transcript will give you some idea of the polite enthusiasm with which she was received here:

"It was a splendid affair, and was a ended by one of the largest and most popular audiences ever seen in Worcester. Everyone who attended seemed delighted to the utmost. The pieces sung by Md'lle Lind were rendered in her pure, enraptured melody, eliciting expressions not only of hearty welcome and admiration, but partaking of feelings of a more sublime those which belong to applause."

According to an article in the current issue of Etude, Miss Lind caused a higher fever elsewhere. A Boston coachman, for five dollars, let people kiss the hand that had helped Jenny Lind out of the carriage.

Broke With Wife

A New Yorker collected two shillings from everyone who wanted to kiss a glove reputedly dropped by the singer . . . One New Englander attended her concert despite his wife's threat never to speak to him again if he did. He never heard a word from her until the day she died, 30 years later.

The Swedish Nightingale also experienced other forms of enthusiasm. A woman in Pittsburgh wrote that she had given birth to twins which she named P. T. Barnum and Jenny Lind. She asked for $5000 in cash and additional funds to cover their support and education.

I wonder how flattered she was when she learned that a Lynn, Mass. provision dealer named a sausage after her!

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
MAR 27 1952

CHARLES MUNCH, again conducting Boston Symphony, after his long illness, at concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. He also will "preview" his porgram at the Open Rehearsal tonight at 7:30 at Symphony.

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
MAR 27 1952

AUDITIONS SCHEDULED FOR TANGLEWOOD CLASS

ALBANY, March 26—Voice students planning on applying for admission to the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center for the summer session at Tanglewood will have their auditions at Carnegie Hall, New York City, Thursday, April 3, from 1 until 4 p. m. An accompanist will be present. If possible, they should notify the center in advance by mail at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The Berkshire Music Center will open this season June 30 and continue until August 10, under direction of Charles Munch, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Boris Goldovsky again will be in charge of the opera department.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR.

Cambridge—'Seme

Fred Fehl

Charles Munch will return to the Symphony Hall podium tonight when he will conduct the final open public rehearsal this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

SOPRANO Patricia Neway will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday in Alban Berg's concert aria, "Der Wein." She will also appear at tonight's open rehearsal.

Patricia Neway, soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its public rehearsal tonight and at its concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall.

2/28/52

[112]

Symphony Rehearsal

An open public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall Thursday evening at 7:30. Leonard Bernstein will be the guest conductor of the week, and Patricia Neway, who recently returned from a London engagement in Menotti's "The Consul," will be the soprano soloist. "The Wine," a concert aria by Alban Berg, will be rehearsed.

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 25 1952

Music to My Ears

CHESTERTONIAN "MEISTERSINGER"—BERNSTEIN AT THE BOSTON

Hans Hopf—"contribution of value."

RECALLING that G. K. Chesterton once admired the electric signs of Broadway as a marvelous sight for a man who couldn't read, one could cite the latest occurrence of Wagner's "Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan as a blessed experience for a man who couldn't see. The line in the program which read "Scenery designed and painted by Hans Kautsky in 1923" told one succinct story about it. Thanks to a well-balanced, well-directed cast, there is another and better story to report.

Nobody could contend that this first performance was a dream of beauty, but it had voices well suited to the assigned tasks in every major role, the action as devised by Dino Yannopolous moved smoothly, and the focal point was where it should be—at the conductor's desk, where Fritz Reiner maintained positive and propulsive control. Hans Hopf as Walther and Richard Holm as David were making debuts, while Walburga Wegner (Eva) and Alois Pernestorfer (Pogner) sang their roles for the first time. All had contributions of value to make.

Save for Torsten Ralf, Hopf is the aptest voice for Walther the Metropolitan has had in years, and Holm is obviously a master as David, if an apprentice in the story. Assuming that a debut diminishes a singer's output by 25 per cent at least, both are likely to be better next time—which should be very good indeed. Actually, Holm moved in and around the tricky vocal line of his part with surety and assertion; Hopf impressed one as the kind of singer still to learn how to get the best out of his voice.

Wegner looked well, and sang some phrases charmingly. She makes things difficult for herself with an odd kind of production, often throttling the tone before it is fully projected, but she is certainly the Eva type, which neither Steber nor Varnay of recent memory were. Beside such eminent Metropolitan Evas as Lehmann or Rethberg she is a mere beginner; but well worth watching develop. As Pogner, Pernestorfer offers a lighter voice than is traditional, or desirable. However, he sings the crucial top notes cleanly, makes a plausible sound for the low ones, and pontificates in the manner dear to Pogners. Herbert Janssen being indisposed for Kothner, it was adequately served by Kenneth Schon.

If the foregoing suggests that this was a Sachless "Meistersinger" or one lacking the foil of a proper Beckmesser, it merely respects the fact that Paul Schoeffler has become an accepted criterion for the big role, as Gerhard Pechner has for the somewhat lesser one. Schoeffler is not quite the endearing kind of Sachs, the voice lacking real sweetness—but it has unflagging power, intelligence, and keen attention to detail. Among Beckmessers, Pechner is quite as good as memory recalls, and the Met has had its share of good ones. Hertha Glaz was a smallish but well-sounding 'Lene.

What distinguished this "Meistersinger" from other recent ones with as much total vocal virtue—if not so evenly distributed—was the strong pulse and skilful integration provided by Reiner, the well-organized stage direction of Yannopoulos. Beginning with a spacious playing of the Prelude, Reiner's direction merged a clean articulation of the musical design with accent, emphasis, and contrast as one likes to hear it. One musical high spot was the choral finale of Act II, another the Prelude to Act III. The first profited by a reorganization of the choral ensemble (wider spacing of the scenery broadened the usual narrow alley between the homes of Sachs and Pogner), but the second was due wholly to Reiner's way with orchestral masses, functioning here with full efficiency. Welcome, too, was the reappearance of some choice matter in Acts I and II usually cut.

When the Met's budget permits a

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 29 1952

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony Concerts find Charles Munch back on the job. A week ago last Wednesday at a meeting of the Friends of the Orchestra Mr. Munch made his actual return to Symphony Hall. But this was not a whole concert nor was it a whole audience. The piece that he played then was the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Ariadne" and that stands as the second number on the current program, flanked by the Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

The "Redemption" excerpt had not been heard here since 1922, the Roussel and Berlioz pieces were both performed at the Concerts of Nov. 3 and 4, 1950. In repeating them this week Mr. Munch has gone back on the half-promise he made at the beginning of the season, that he would not play anything that he had done in the two seasons previous. But since then there have been changes in the situation: his own illness, for one, the impending visit to Europe for another. It is quite possible that for his first concert after so many months, Mr. Munch did not wish to undertake the burden of rehearsing new music. It is also a strong possibility that both of these pieces will be taken on the European tour, since they are things in which conductor and orchestra excell.

The orchestral middle-part of Franck's otherwise forgotten oratorio begins, and for some time continues, with the utmost suavity. After that there are lapses into bombast and the end, that would depict the regeneration and redemption of the world, has a touch of theatricality.

It was Mr. Munch who introduced the Roussel Suite to us five years ago and the wonder was at the time that Dr. Koussevitzky had overlooked so good a bet. With its obvious leanings on the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale and the "Daphnis and Chole" of Ravel, this Suite is not music of the highest originality but it is extremely effective, the work of a composer who knows all the tricks. Like most ballet music transferred to the concert hall, it would be even more effective with the explanatory action.

On the other hand, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz has been turned into a ballet, and unnecessarily since it explains itself quite fully. In listening to it we can never forget, nor should we forget, that it was composed in 1829-30. That was and still is the most amazing thing about it. Today it is in large measure a curiosity, a museum piece, a sort of exhibit A of the romantic movement. It is still a piece that challenges both conductors and orchestras and if it has empty spots and passages that do not say much to us today, it is still not deficient in musical interest, while its descriptive powers are almost unrivaled. One might object to the speed at which Mr. Munch takes the conclusion of the final movement, otherwise, his is a definite performance. Though outwardly calmer than of yore, Mr. Munch conducted with his wonted fire, and yesterday, from first to last, the orchestra was at the top of its form.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 29 1952

Tanglewood Series Will Open June 30; Auditions Thursday

Lenox, March 28—Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 p. m.

The music center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until Aug. 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland assistant.

Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15.

This Clipping From
Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 25 1952

Music to My Ears

CHESTERTONIAN "MEISTERSINGER"—BERNSTEIN AT THE BOSTON

Hans Hopf—"contribution of value."

RECALLING that G. K. Chesterton once admired the electric signs of Broadway as a marvelous sight for a man who couldn't read, one could cite the latest occurrence of Wagner's "Meistersinger" at the Metropolitan as a blessed experience for a man who couldn't see. The line in the program which read "Scenery designed and painted by Hans Kautsky in 1923" told one succinct story about it. Thanks to a well-balanced, well-directed cast, there is another and better story to report.

Nobody could contend that this first performance was a dream of beauty, but it had voices well suited to the assigned tasks in every major role, the action as devised by Dino Yannopolous moved smoothly, and the focal point was where it should be—at the conductor's desk, where Fritz Reiner maintained positive and propulsive control. Hans Hopf as Walther and Richard Holm as David were making debuts, while Walburga Wegner (Eva) and Alois Pernestorfer (Pogner) sang their roles for the first time. All had contributions of value to make.

Save for Torsten Ralf, Hopf is the aptest voice for Walther the Metropolitan has had in years, and Holm is obviously a master as David, if an apprentice in the story. Assuming that a debut diminishes a singer's output by 25 per cent at least, both are likely to be better next time—which should be very good indeed. Actually, Holm moved in and around the tricky vocal line of his part with surety and assertion; Hopf impressed one as the kind of singer still to learn how to get the best out of his voice.

Wegner looked well, and sang some phrases charmingly. She makes things difficult for herself with an odd kind of production, often throttling the tone before it is fully projected, but she is certainly the Eva type, which neither Steber nor Varnay of recent memory were. Beside such eminent Metropolitan Evas as Lehmann or Rethberg she is a mere beginner; but well worth watching develop. As Pogner, Pernestorfer offers a lighter voice than is traditional, or desirable. However, he sings the crucial top notes cleanly, makes a plausible sound for the low ones, and pontificates in the manner dear to Pogners. Herbert Janssen being indisposed for Kothner, it was adequately served by Kenneth Schon.

If the foregoing suggests that this was a Sachless "Meistersinger" or one lacking the foil of a proper Beckmesser, it merely respects the fact that Paul Schoeffler has become an accepted criterion for the big role, as Gerhard Pechner has for the somewhat lesser one. Schoeffler is not quite the endearing kind of Sachs, the voice lacking real sweetness—but it has unflagging power, intelligence, and keen attention to detail. Among Beckmessers, Pechner is quite as good as memory recalls, and the Met has had its share of good ones. Hertha Glaz was a smallish but well-sounding 'Lene.

What distinguished this "Meistersinger" from other recent ones with as much total vocal virtue—if not so evenly distributed—was the strong pulse and skilful integration provided by Reiner, the well-organized stage direction of Yannopoulos. Beginning with a spacious playing of the Prelude, Reiner's direction merged a clean articulation of the musical design with accent, emphasis, and contrast as one likes to hear it. One musical high spot was the choral finale of Act II, another the Prelude to Act III. The first profited by a reorganization of the choral ensemble (wider spacing of the scenery broadened the usual narrow alley between the homes of Sachs and Pogner), but the second was due wholly to Reiner's way with orchestral masses, functioning here with full efficiency. Welcome, too, was the reappearance of some choice matter in Acts I and II usually cut.

When the Met's budget permits a

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 29 1952

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony Concerts find Charles Munch back on the job. A week ago last Wednesday at a meeting of the Friends of the Orchestra Mr. Munch made his actual return to Symphony Hall. But this was not a whole concert nor was it a whole audience. The piece that he played then was the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Ariadne" and that stands as the second number on the current program, flanked by the Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

The "Redemption" excerpt had not been heard here since 1922, the Roussel and Berlioz pieces were both performed at the Concerts of Nov. 3 and 4, 1950. In repeating them this week Mr. Munch has gone back on the half-promise he made at the beginning of the season, that he would not play anything that he had done in the two seasons previous. But since then there have been changes in the situation: his own illness, for one, the impending visit to Europe for another. It is quite possible that for his first concert after so many months, Mr. Munch did not wish to undertake the burden of rehearsing new music. It is also a strong possibility that both of these pieces will be taken on the European tour since they are things in which conductor and orchestra excell.

The orchestral middle-part of Franck's otherwise forgotten oratorio begins, and for some time continues, with the utmost suavity. After that there are lapses into bombast and the end, that would depict the regeneration and redemption of the world, has a touch of theatricality.

It was Mr. Munch, who introduced the Roussel Suite to us five years ago and the wonder was at the time that Dr. Koussevitzky had overlooked so good a bet. With its obvious leanings on the "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale and the "Daphnis and Chole" of Ravel, this Suite is not music of the highest originality but it is extremely effective, the work of a composer who knows all the tricks. Like most ballet music transferred to the concert hall, it would be even more effective with the explanatory action.

On the other hand, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz has been turned into a ballet, and unnecessarily since it explains itself quite fully. In listening to it we can never forget, nor should we forget, that it was composed in 1829-30. That was and still is the most amazing thing about it. Today it is in large measure a curiosity, a museum piece, a sort of exhibit A of the romantic movement. It is still a piece that challenges both conductors and orchestras and if it has empty spots and passages that do not say much to us today, it is still not deficient in musical interest, while its descriptive powers are almost unrivaled. One might object to the speed at which Mr. Munch takes the conclusion of the final movement, otherwise, his is a definite performance. Though outwardly calmer than of yore, Mr. Munch conducted with his wonted fire, and yesterday, from first to last, the orchestra was at the top of its form.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 29 1952

Tanglewood Series Will Open June 30; Auditions Thursday

Lenox, March 28—Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 p. m.

The music center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until Aug. 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland assistant.

Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

BY RUDOLPH ELIE

Munch, bringing his ... by the ... ed ... ago ... con- ... with ... in- ... me ... reat ... au- ... is some ... but it ... day ... con- ... s been ... visual ... across ... mers ... a mu- ... be con- ... that ... only ... were ... be no ... ence ... ad- ... and ... sphere ... major ... ed is ... ation ... It is al- ... to widen the ... exists ... netic ... and hand ... them and let ... complete ... the new ... first woman ... member of the ... orchestra. ... communicate to ... fluent ... unanimity of the sawing of the ... string sections as it is to hear ... them. Indeed, even watching a ... violinist ... ten string ... tune up secretly and return unruffled to his part, as happened yesterday (along with the loud snapping of a harp string), is all part of the in-person experience. It is being there and hearing there and seeing there, and to deny that has anything to do with musical experience is untenable.

ACTUALLY, Mr. Munch once remarked that he wasn't concerned with the visual (I was arguing for the more sightly appearance of the orchestra on Koussevitzky's risers), but whether he is or not he is the exemplification of the interesting, the attractive, the stylish figure on the stage. His back, like Koussevitzky's, is handsome; his movements are at once virile and manly but informed with infinite shades of grace, elegance, refinement, propriety. What I am trying to say is that he looks well in everything he does and in looking well conveys the additional and very important esthetic sensation of style.

While Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony has long been one of his most brilliant essays with the orchestra (and one of our most thorough-going musical pleasures), the program was more interesting for another hearing of Roussel's ballet suite "Bacchus et Ariane." You know, somehow, that this music is French, but it has a more universal quality; you would be hard put to pin down the French elements. The suite, a late work dating from 1932, five years before the composer's death, is a blend of contrapuntal and impressionistic devices in which dissonant harmonies are so subtly used the contemporary ear hardly aware they are there. With this, a pseudo oriental quality, a highly individual coloristic texture, an ample melodic inspiration and a powerful sense of climax, it makes a great effect. Although it has none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it is laid out along parallel lines and comes to just as exciting a conclusion.

I FOUND FRANCK'S Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" a very pleasant work indeed principally because it didn't sound at all like Franck. I entertain a notorious blind spot for the sinuous chromaticism, the endless dwelling upon the same melodic fragment in the later Franck, but this seemed a felicitous blend of Faure and Wagner, and though it goes on too long after it has made its point, it is an interesting and enjoyable piece. It was played, as the whole program was, with great technical and tonal excellence by the orchestra in top form. One final word: the bells Mr. Munch had sent over from France expressly for the Dies Irae of the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath in the Berlioz are stunning.

These hands lead the world's greatest symphony orchestras

Boston's 71-year-old symphony under Charles Munch makes European debut in May.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

... under the direction of Charles ... stand for ... world over.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 29 1952

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. At the 20th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" ..... Franck
"Bacchus et Ariane," 2d Suite, Op. 43 ..... Roussel
Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A ..... Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Charles Munch, betraying his recent long illness only by the lack of the familiar spring in his step as he approached and left the conductor's stand, returned yesterday to give us a superb, exciting and completely fulfilling afternoon of music.

It was the first time—saving his brief appearance a fortnight ago to conduct the meeting of the Friends—that Mr. Munch has conducted since October 27 when he was stricken by a virus with ensuing complications. In the interim the orchestra has had some notable conductors, men of great musicianship, leadership and authority who have given us some remarkably good concerts, but it was instantly apparent yesterday when the orchestra's regular conductor returned what has been missing all along: style, a visual style that truly projects across that gulf between all performers and audiences.

It may be argued that a musical audience should not be concerned with the visual; that music should communicate only through the ear. If this were true, however, there would be no point in in-person performance today at all considering the advanced quality of recordings and the more comfortable atmosphere of the home.

At is happens, one of the major attractions of the concert hall is the added sense of participation conveyed by watching. It is almost as interesting to watch the grace and beauty of two harpists choreographing highly esthetic movements of arm, wrist and hand as it is to listen to them (and let me take this opportunity to compliment Olivia Luetcke, the new second harpist and the first woman to be a regular member of the orchestra). It is almost as communicative to watch the fluent unanimity of the bowing of the string sections as it is to hear them. Indeed, even watching a violinist replace a broken string, tune up secretly and return unruffled to his part, as happened yesterday (along with the loud snapping of a harp string), is all part of the in-person experience. It is being there and hearing there and seeing there, and to deny sight has anything to do with musical experience is untenable.

ACTUALLY, Mr. Munch once remarked that he wasn't concerned with the visual (I was arguing for the more sightly appearance of the orchestra on Koussevitzky's risers), but whether he is or not he is the exemplification of the interesting, the attractive, the stylish figure on the stage. His back, like Koussevitzky's, is handsome; his movements are at once virile and manly but informed with infinite shades of grace, elegance, refinement, propriety. What I am trying to say is that he looks well in everything he does and in looking well conveys the additional and very important esthetic sensation of style.

While Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony has long been one of his most brilliant essays with the orchestra (and one of our most thorough-going musical pleasures), the program was more interesting for another hearing of Roussel's ballet suite "Bacchus et Ariane." You know, somehow, that this music is French, but it has a more universal quality; you would be hard put to pin down the French elements. The suite, a late work dating from 1932, five years before the composer's death, is a blend of contrapuntal and impressionistic devices in which dissonant harmonies are so subtly used the contemporary ear hardly aware they are there. With this, a pseudo oriental quality, a highly individual coloristic texture, an ample melodic inspiration and a powerful sense of climax, it makes a great effect. Although it has none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it is laid out along parallel lines and comes to just as exciting a conclusion.

I FOUND FRANCK'S Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" a very pleasant work indeed principally because it didn't sound at all like Franck. I entertain a notorious blind spot for the sinuous chromaticism, the endless dwelling upon the same melodic fragment in the later Franck, but this seemed a felicitous blend of Faure and Wagner, and though it goes on too long after it has made its point, it is an interesting and enjoyable piece. It was played, as the whole program was, with great technical and tonal excellence by the orchestra in top form. One final word: the bells Mr. Munch had sent over from France expressly for the Dies Irae of the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath in the Berlioz are stunning.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 30 1952

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
. . . under the direction of Charles Munch, has come to stand for musical perfection the world over.

These hands lead the world's greatest symphony orchestras

LOOK MAGAZINE

Boston's 71-year-old symphony under Charles Munch makes European debut in May.

MUSIC

Charles Munch Returns to Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Not since last October has this musical chronicler been so happy as when he sat down to write the sentence which follows: Charles Munch returned yesterday to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his long and unfortunate illness we were well served by various gentlemen, but Mr. Munch is the true and admired master of this orchestra, which yesterday sounded as it has not sounded since October. There was a basic passion in the tone and in the manner of playing which had been absent all these months. Its effect was immediate and unmistakable, and electrifying.

Orchestra and audience alike were elated to see Mr. Munch back on the Symphony Hall stage, for they rose in greeting upon his first appearance. Enthusiastic applause followed each performance, and at the end cheers were mingled with handclapping.

Mr. Munch chose a French program for this occasion: the Symphonic Piece which Cesar Franck evolved out of a portion of his oratorio, "Redemption"; the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Hector Berlioz.

Although Mr. Munch may have moderated the intensity of his gestures somewhat, there was no mark of illness upon any of his readings. Listening with closed eyes, one would not have perceived any difference in the heat of performance. This was especially evident in the most fiery score of the afternoon, the Romantic and incandescent "Fantastic" Symphony, which built up to the expected frenzy of excitement in the movement of the Witches' Sabbath.

Everything was absolutely clear, too, and if the tempo of the waltz seemed a little slower, one had but to read again the designation of the movement, allegro non troppo, to realize that the waltz should not race along. Mr. Munch placed the big bells used in the finale just outside the door at the back of the stage. This proved a good place, for the jangling overtones which can spoil the effect of the accompanying music were more or less absorbed off-stage, and the bell sound was more than usually pure and sweet.

Cesar Franck's chaste music, chromatic and perhaps Lisztian (rather than Wagnerian), had not been heard at these concerts in 30 years. This is understandable, for attractive though it is, such music is of a dead past. It exists in time but it does not live in this year of 1952.

From a purely musical point of view, Roussel's ballet suite was the high mark of the afternoon. Once again its authority of invention and its vitality and imagination proclaimed Roussel a great composer who has yet, nearly 15 years after his death, to find the recognition and the niche in musical history properly due him. While he may have learned much from Ravel about orchestration, the voice and the idiom are those of Roussel and no other, individual and distinguished and clearly of this turbulent age. Yet Roussel was no dealer in strong dissonance, no mere fabricator of pattern music. He was a modern and an artist to whom music meant color and emotion as well as structural theory.

[illegible] and around the tri[illegible] vocal line of his part with surety a[illegible]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 29 1952

Tanglewood Series Will Open June 30; Auditions Thursday

Lenox, March 28—Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 p. m.

The music center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until Aug. 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland assistant.

Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 20th program of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" ..... Franck
"Bacchus et Ariane," 2d Suite, Op. 43 ..... Roussel
Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A ..... Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Charles Munch, betraying his recent long illness only by the lack of the familiar spring in his step as he approached and left the conductor's stand, returned yesterday to give us a superb, exciting and completely fulfilling afternoon of music.

It was the first time—saving his brief appearance a fortnight ago to conduct the meeting of the Friends—that Mr. Munch has conducted since October 27 when he was stricken by a virus with ensuing complications. In the interim the orchestra has had some notable conductors, men of great musicianship, leadership and authority who have given us some remarkably good concerts, but it was instantly apparent yesterday when the orchestra's regular conductor returned what has been missing all along: style, a visual style that truly projects across that gulf between all performers and audiences.

It may be argued that a musical audience should not be concerned with the visual; that music should communicate only through the ear. If this were true, however, there would be no point in in-person performance today at all considering the advanced quality of recordings and the more comfortable atmosphere of the home.

At is happens, one of the major attractions of the concert hall is the added sense of participation conveyed by watching. It is almost as interesting to watch the grace and beauty of two harpists choreographing highly esthetic movements of arm, wrist and hand as it is to listen to them (and let me take this opportunity to compliment Olivia Luetcke, the new second harpist and the first woman to be a regular member of the orchestra). It is almost as communicative to watch the fluent unanimity of the bowing of the string sections as it is to hear them. Indeed, even watching a violinist replace a broken string, tune up secretly and return unruffled to his part, as happened yesterday (along with the loud snapping of a harp string), is all part of the in-person experience. It is being there and hearing there and seeing there, and to deny sight has anything to do with musical experience is untenable.

ACTUALLY, Mr. Munch once remarked that he wasn't concerned with the visual (I was arguing for the more sightly appearance of the orchestra on Koussevitzky's risers), but whether he is or not he is the exemplification of the interesting, the attractive, the stylish figure on the stage. His back, like Koussevitzky's, is handsome; his movements are at once virile and manly but informed with infinite shades of grace, elegance, refinement, propriety. What I am trying to say is that he looks well in everything he does and in looking well conveys the additional and very important esthetic sensation of style.

While Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony has long been one of his most brilliant essays with the orchestra (and one of our most thorough-going musical pleasures), the program was more interesting for another hearing of Roussel's ballet suite "Bacchus et Ariane." You know, somehow, that this music is French, but it has a more universal quality; you would be hard put to pin down the French elements. The suite, a late work dating from 1932, five years before the composer's death, is a blend of contrapuntal and impressionistic devices in which dissonant harmonies are so subtly used the contemporary ear is hardly aware they are there. With this, a pseudo oriental quality, a highly individual coloristic texture, an ample melodic inspiration and a powerful sense of climax, it makes a great effect. Although it has none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it is laid out along parallel lines and comes to just as exciting a conclusion.

I FOUND FRANCK'S Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" a very pleasant work indeed principally because it didn't sound at all like Franck. I entertain a notorious blind spot for the sinuous chromaticism, the endless dwelling upon the same melodic fragment in the later Franck, but this seemed a felicitous blend of Faure and Wagner, and though it goes [illegible] too long after it has made its point, it is an interesting [illegible] joyable piece. It was p[illegible] the whole program w[illegible] great technical and ton[illegible] lence by the orchestra in t[illegible] One final word: the h[illegible] Munch had sent over from [illegible] expressly for the Dies Ir[illegible] Dream of a Witches' Sab[illegible] the Berlioz are stunning.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
MAR 29 1952

Extend Berkshire Music Centre For Sessions Beginning in June

Boston—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Centre, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood announces several additions in the plans for the school, which will hold its 10th session for six weeks beginning June 30.

There will be a new and much enlarged scholarship policy which will award tuition grants from the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund to all active students in the advanced departments. The school's scholarship policy is now broadened to help make it possible for pre-professional students to be admitted on considerations of musical promise alone, without regard for their present ability to pay tuition.

Another development is the arrangement that advanced students may concentrate on chamber music or song repertory alone. An important new feature of the summer session will be an expanded department for general music students, music educators and amateurs. Called the Tanglewood Study Group, it will be headed by Ingolf Dahl and will carry into the field of contemporary music the collegium musicum idea of group performance for the pleasure of the participants. Students in this department who are not able to attend the full six-week session will be able to enroll for two or four weeks.

The Berkshire Music Centre is maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts. The faculty, in addition to 20 members of the Boston Symphony, will include Aaron Copland as assistant director and teacher of composition, Leonard Bernstein in charge of conducting and the student orchestra, William Kroll as head of the chamber music department while Gregor Piatigorsky is on leave of absence, Hugh Ross in charge of chorus and Boris Goldovsky of opera. Luigi Dallapiccola will again come from Italy to teach composition.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAR 23 1952

Tanglewood's Programs for Summer Listed

Programs for this summer's activities of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood have been announced by Charles Munch, musical director. Conductors in addition to Mr. Munch will be Pierre Monteux and Leonard Bernstein.

Concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Series A offers Beethoven's "Eroica" and Brahms' First Symphony on July 24; Cimarosa's Overture, "The Secret Marriage," Schubert's C Major Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring [Monteux conducting], July 26; Franck's "The Redemption," Bizet's C Major Symphony, Dallapiccola's chorus, "Savonarola," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" [both suites, with chorus], July 27.

Series B comprises Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, Schumann's Piano Concerto, Hindemith's "Metamorphosis" on themes by Weber, and D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, July 31; excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," with soloists [Monteux conducting], Aug. 2; Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Symphony No. 8, Debussy's "Iberia," and the American premiere of Honegger's "Danse des Morts" [with chorus], Aug. 3.

Series C lists Schumann's First Symphony, Swanson's Short Symphony and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony on Aug. 7; Copland's Third Symphony and Sibelius' Fifth [Bernstein conducting], Aug. 9, and Berlioz's Requiem, with chorus, orchestra, and four supplementary brass choirs, Aug. 10.

Mr. Munch will conduct all concerts listed above, except where otherwise indicated.

Chamber orchestra concerts by Mr. Munch in the smaller Theater are scheduled for Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons: Music by Bach and early French composers, July 5 and 6; Mozart, July 12 and 13, and Haydn and Schubert, July 19 and 20.

Subscription information may be obtained from Symphony hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MUSIC

Charles Munch Returns to Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Not since last October [illegible] musical chronicler [illegible] so happy as when he sat down to write the sentence which follows: Charles Munch returned yesterday to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his long and unfortunate illness we were well served by various gentlemen, but Mr. Munch is the true and admired master of this orchestra, which yesterday sounded as it has not sounded since October. There was a basic passion in the tone and in the manner of playing which had been absent all these months. Its effect was immediate and unmistakable, and electrifying.

Orchestra and audience alike were elated to see Mr. Munch back on the Symphony Hall stage, for they rose in greeting upon his first appearance. Enthusiastic applause followed each performance, and at the end cheers were mingled with handclapping.

Mr. Munch chose a French program for this occasion: the Symphonic Piece which Cesar Franck evolved out of a portion of his oratorio, "Redemption"; the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Hector Berlioz.

Although Mr. Munch may have moderated the intensity of his gestures somewhat, there was no mark of illness upon any of his readings. Listening with closed eyes, one would not have perceived any difference in the heat of performance. This was especially evident in the most fiery score of the afternoon, the Romantic and incandescent "Fantastic" Symphony, which built up to the expected frenzy of excitement in the movement of the Witches' Sabbath.

Everything was absolutely clear, too, and if the tempo of the waltz seemed a little slower, one had but to read again the designation of the movement, allegro non troppo, to realize that the waltz should not race along. Mr. Munch placed the big bells used in the finale just outside the door at the back of the stage. This proved a good place, for the jangling overtones which can spoil the effect of the accompanying music were more or less absorbed off-stage, and the bell sound was more than usually pure and sweet.

Cesar Franck's chaste music, chromatic and perhaps Lisztian (rather than Wagnerian), had not been heard at these concerts in 30 years. This is understandable, for attractive though it is, such music is of a dead past. It exists in time but it does not live in this year of 1952.

From a purely musical point of view, Roussel's ballet suite was the high mark of the afternoon. Once again its authority of invention and its vitality and imagination proclaimed Roussel a great composer who has yet, nearly 15 years after his death, to find the recognition and the niche in musical history properly due him. While he may have learned much from Ravel about orchestration, the voice and the idiom are those of Roussel and no other, individual and distinguished and clearly of this turbulent age. Yet Roussel was no dealer in strong dissonance, no mere fabricator of pattern music. He was a modern and an artist to whom music meant color and emotion as well as structural theory.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

up secretly and return un- to his part, as happened day (along with the loud ping of a harp string), is all of the in-person experience. being there and hearing there seeing there, and to deny has anything to do with al experience is untenable.

TUALLY, Mr. Munch once rked that he wasn't con- d with the visual (I was ng for the more sightly ap- nce of the orchestra on ssevitzky's risers), but ther he is or not he is the mplification of the interesting, attractive, the stylish figure the stage. His back, like oussevitzky's, is handsome; his ements are at once virile and ely but informed with infinite shades of grace, elegance, refine- ment, propriety. What I am try- ing to say is that he looks well in everything he does and in look- ing well conveys the additional and very important esthetic sen- sation of style.

While Berlioz' Fantastic Sym- phony has long been one of his most brilliant essays with the or- chestra (and one of our most thorough-going musical pleas- ures), the program was more in- teresting for another hearing of Roussel's ballet suite "Bacchus et Ariane." You know, somehow, that this music is French, but it has a more universal quality; you would be hard put to pin down the French elements. The suite, a late work dating from 1932, five years before the composer's death, is a blend of contrapuntal and im- pressionistic devices in which dissonant harmonies are so subtly used the contemporary ear is hardly aware they are there. With this, a pseudo oriental quality, a highly individual coloristic tex- ture, an ample melodic inspira- tion and a powerful sense of climax, it makes a great effect.

Although it has none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it is laid out along parallel lines and comes to just as exciting a conclusion.

I FOUND FRANCK'S Sym- phonic Piece from "Redemption" a very pleasant work indeed prin- cipally because it didn't sound at all like Franck. I entertain a no- torious blind spot for the sinuous chromaticism, the endless dwel- ling upon the same melodic frag- ment in the later Franck, but this seemed a felicitous blend of Faure and Wagner, and though it goes on too long after it has made its point, it is an interesting and en- joyable piece. It was played, as the whole program was, with great technical and tonal excel- lence by the orchestra in top form. One final word: the bells Mr. Munch had sent over from France expressly for the Dies Irae of the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath in the Berlioz are stunning.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 30 1952

CHARLES MUNCH, who returns this week after a long illness to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the regular Friday and Saturday concerf and also at the open rehearsal at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening at 7:30.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAR 30 1952

Munch Lists Tanglewood Programs

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, March 29—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5 to Aug. 10:

Chamber Orchestra concerts in the Theater, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons—July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed:

Series A: Thursday, July 24—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, July 26 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Sunday, July 27 — Franck Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savinarola"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B: Thursday, July 31—Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Schumann, Piano Concerto; Hindemith Metamorphosis; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Saturday, Aug. 2 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists). Sunday, Aug. 3 — Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus)—first performance in America.

Series C: Thursday, Aug. 7—Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4. Saturday, Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting)—Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

Berkshire Auditions Tuesday

Auditions for applicants to this summer's opera department at the Berkshire Music Center will take place in Carnegie Recital Hall on Tuesday between 1 and 4 P. M. The summer school will run from June 30 to Aug. 10 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Munch Will Conduct Bach

Pursuing his custom of presenting the two great Passion settings by Bach in alternate years in his Works, Charles Munch will conduct the Passion According to St. Matthew on April 16 and 12. It will be repeated on Easter Sunday, April 13, at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The orchestra will be joined by the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses, conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson. Soloists will be Eleanor Steber, soprano; Jean Madeira, contralto; Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, bass, and Edmund Hurshell, bass.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLF ELIE

... up secretly and return un- ... l to his part, as happened ... sterday (along with the loud ... napping of a harp string), is all ... of the in-person experience. ... s being there and hearing there ... seeing there, and to deny ... at has anything to do with ... usical experience is untenable.

ACTUALLY, Mr. Munch once ... marked that he wasn't con- ... d with the visual (I was ... arguing for the more sightly ap- ... pearance of the orchestra on ... Koussevitzky's risers), b u t ... whether he is or not he is the ... mplification of the interesting, ... the attractive, the stylish figure ... on the stage. His back, like ... Koussevitzky's, is handsome; his ... movements are at once virile and ... manly but informed with infinite ... shades of grace, elegance, refine- ... ment, propriety. What I am try- ... ing to say is that he looks well in ... everything he does and in look- ... ing well conveys the additional ... and very important esthetic sen- ... day sation of style.

While Berlioz' Fantastic Sym- ... phony has long been one of his ... most brilliant essays with the or- ... chestra (and one of our most ... thorough-going musical pleas- ... ures), the program was more in- ... teresting for another hearing of ... Roussel's ballet suite "Bacchus et ... Ariane." You know, somehow, ... that this music is French, but it ... has a more universal quality; you ... would be hard put to pin down ... the French elements. The suite, a late work dating from 1932, five years before the composer's death, is a blend of contrapuntal and impressionistic devices in which dissonant harmonies are so subtly used the contemporary ear is hardly aware they are there. With this, a pseudo oriental quality, a highly individual coloristic texture, an ample melodic inspiration and a powerful sense of climax, it makes a great effect. Although it has none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it is laid out along parallel lines and comes to just as exciting a conclusion.

I FOUND FRANCK'S Symphonic Piece from "Redemption" a very pleasant work indeed principally because it didn't sound at all like Franck. I entertain a notorious blind spot for the sinuous chromaticism, the endless dwelling upon the same melodic fragment in the later Franck, but this seemed a felicitous blend of Faure and Wagner, and though it goes on too long after it has made its point, it is an interesting and enjoyable piece. It was played, as the whole program was, with great technical and tonal excellence by the orchestra in top form. One final word: the bells Mr. Munch had sent over from France expressly for the Dies Irae of the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath in the Berlioz are stunning.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 30 1952

CHARLES MUNCH, who returns this week after a long illness to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the regular Friday and Saturday concert and also at the open rehearsal at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening at 7:30.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
MAR 30 1952

Munch Lists Tanglewood Programs

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, March 29—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 5 to Aug. 10:

Chamber Orchestra concerts in the Theater, Charles Munch conducting, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons—July 5-6, Bach and early French composers; July 12-13, Mozart; July 19-20, Haydn and Schubert.

The concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed:

Series A: Thursday, July 24—Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; Brahms, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, July 26 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Cimarosa, Overture, "The Secret Marriage"; Schubert, Symphony No. 9 in C major; Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Sunday, July 27 — Franck Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Bizet, Symphony; Dallapiccola, Chorus, "Savinarola"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suites 1 and 2 (with chorus).

Series B: Thursday, July 31—Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Schumann, Piano Concerto; Hindemith Metamorphosis; D'Indy, Symphony on a Mountain Air. Saturday, Aug. 2 (Pierre Monteux conducting)—Excerpts from Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung" (with soloists). Sunday, Aug. 3 — Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and Symphony No. 8; Debussy, "Iberia"; Honegger, "Danse des Morts" (with chorus)—first performance in America.

Series C: Thursday, Aug. 7—Schumann, Symphony No. 1 ("Spring"); Swanson, "Short Symphony"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4. Saturday, Aug. 9 (Leonard Bernstein conducting) —Copland Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 30 1952

Berkshire Auditions Tuesday

Auditions for applicants to this summer's opera department at the Berkshire Music Center will take place in Carnegie Recital Hall on Tuesday between 1 and 4 P. M. The summer school will run from June 30 to Aug. 10 at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

Munch Will Conduct Bach

Lloyd, tenor; Mack Harrell, bass, and Edmund Hurshell, bass.

Ignoring his custom of presenting the two great Passion settings by Bach in alternate years in Holy Week, Charles Munch will conduct the Passion According to ... on April 10 and 12. It ... repeated on Easter Sunday ... at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The orchestra will be joined by ... ers from Harvard and ... and the following solo- ... Grace Spencer, soprano; ... Lippincott, contralto; David

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 29 1952

SIC

...es Munch Returns ...ston Symphony

CYRUS DURGIN

...e last October has this ...ronicler been so happy as ...t down to write the sen- ...n follows: Charles Munch ...esterday to the conduc- ...of the Boston Symphony ... During his long and un- ...illness we were well ...various gentlemen, but ...is the true and admired ...his orchestra, which yes- ...ded as it has not sounded ...er. There was a basic ...he tone and in the man- ...ing which had been ab- ...ese months. Its effect ...liate and unmistakable, ...ying.

...and audience alike were ...e Mr. Munch back on the ...Hall stage, for they rose ... upon his first appear- ...usiastic applause fol- ...performance, and at the ...ere mingled with hand-

...h chose a French pro- ...his occasion: the Sym- ...e which Cesar Franck ... of a portion of his ...Redemption"; the Sec- ...from Roussel's ballet, ...Ariane," and the "Fan- ...phony of Hector Ber-

...Mr. Munch may have ...he intensity of his ges- ...hat, there was no mark ...on any of his readings. ...ith closed eyes, one ...ave perceived any dif- ...e heat of performance, ...pecially evident in the ...core of the afternoon, ...ic and incandescent ...ymphony, which built ...xpected frenzy of ex- ...the movement of the ...bath.

...was absolutely clear, ...he tempo of the waltz ...le slower, one had but ...in the designation of ...t, allegro non troppo, ...hat the waltz should ...g. Mr. Munch placed ...used in the finale just ...oor at the back of the ...proved a good place, ...ling overtones which ... effect of the accom- ...ic were more or less ...-stage, and the bell ...ore than usually pure

...nck's chaste music, ...nd perhaps Lisztian ... Wagnerian), had not ...t these concerts in 30 ...s understandable, for ...ugh it is, such music ...past. It exists in time ...ot live in this year of

...rely musical point of ...'s ballet suite was the ... the afternoon. Once ...ority of invention and ...nd imagination pro- ...ef a great composer ...nearly 15 years after ... find the recognition ...e in musical history ... him. While he may ... much from Ravel ...ration, the voice and ... those of Roussel and ...dividual and distin- ...clearly of this tur- ...Yet Roussel was no ...g dissonance, no mere ...attern music. He was ... an artist to whom ...color and emotion as ...ural theory.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 30 1952

MUSIC

Mass.

Auditions Scheduled For Tanglewood Opera Group

Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 P. M. An accompanist will be present.

The Music Center's tenth season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until August 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland, assistant director.

Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Adriadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL
30 1952

Audition For Opera Listed

Boris Goldovsky will hold final auditions for the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 2 p. m. Thursday in the Cleveland Institute of Music.

Goldovsky, conductor of the former Akron Civic Opera Guild, is well-known as an intermission commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Association Saturday afternoon broadcasts.

The Music Center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood June 30 for a six-week session under direction of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 30 1952

TANGLEWOOD OPERA AUDITIONS THURSDAY

Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday, from 1 to 4 p. m. An accompanist will be present. The Music Center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until August 10.

Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland, assistant director. Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

The New York Times
NOVEMBER 29, 1951.

EXPOSITION OF ARTS IS PLANNED IN PARIS

What Western World Has Done in Music, Ballet, Drama and Thought to Be Shown in May

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 28—An exposition of what the free creative mind has produced during this century in the arts will be held in Paris next May under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which includes leading intellectuals in the Western countries.

Under the title "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," some of the outstanding artists and intellectual leaders of our time will present a cavalcade of music, opera ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy during the month, according to Nicolas Nabokov, secretary general of the congress.

Mr. Nabokov said the festival would be an answer to the propaganda that has sought, and, to some extend, has succeeded "in planting in our own minds doubts of the validity, strength and vitality of our Western culture."

During the twentieth century, Mr. Nabokov said, "free creative imagination of the poets, painters and composers has produced an abundant flow of masterpieces in all the arts." At the same time, he added, as a by-product of political upheaval there has been a violent reaction against the free creative spirit.

Powerful political movements, he said, have tried to stifle free creation. "Narrow restrictive rules have sought to transform the artist into an instrument of the state, producing works tailored to the utilitarian needs of totalitarian regimes."

What has been done in the past fifty years in the free world will be shown in music by such organizations as the Vienna State Opera and Vienna Philharmonic, the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, R. I. A. S. Orchestra of Berlin, Orchestre de la Suisse Romande from Geneva, France's Conservatory Orchestra and National Orchestra.

Concert programs will present works of Debussy, Ravel, Schoenberg, Milhaud, Honegger and others, including some written by the Russian composers Shostakovich and Prokofieff and forbidden in the Soviet Union. Igor Stravinsky will conduct a program of his ballets and a concert of his music. Some of the outstanding conductors in the world also will participate.

Georges Balanchine's New York City Ballet will give performances. Two new ballets have been commissioned from the French composers Georges Auric and Henri Sauguet.

The Vienna Opera will give two performances of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" and negotiations are under way for a performance by an all-Negro cast of Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," with book by Gertrude Stein.

In art, a comprehensive exhibition of contemporary painting is planned. Works are being collected in Europe and America.

Some of the most important dramatic works of modern times will be staged. Two notable productions will be Kafka's "The Trial," staged by Jean Louis Barrault, leading French actor and producer, and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," with Sir Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh.

A series of afternoon forums led by noted writers and philosophers is planned. One of the forums will discuss freedom of the press.

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
Sunday, January 20, 1952

Boston Symphony, City Ballet Going to Paris Festival in May

By Paul V. Beckley

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance with three concerts at the Festival of the Arts at Paris in May, it was disclosed yesterday in a joint announcement by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston orchestra.

As the major American representative at the festival, which is sponsored by the Congress, the Boston Symphony will stay in Europe two weeks and also play in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Switzerland and other Fernch communities. The cost of this overseas trip for the 104-member orchestra is estimated from $150,000 to $175,000.

One of the principal motives of the Congress in sponsoring the spring festival, it was said, is to combat the current Communist party line in Europe which has been insulting Western art and culture as "decadent."

Mr. Nabokov is director of the exposition committee of the Congress and Julius Fleischmann of Cincinnati, its American chairman. Sidney Hook is chairman of the American committee of the Congress and has conducted negotiations with the American participants.

The American cultural invasion of Paris will be further accented by the inclusion of a number of American paintings in an exhibition of 200 contemporary works representative of Western culture assembled by James Johnson Sweeney, a former director of the Museum of Modern Art. A number of American poets and writers are also scheduled to address literary forums during the festival.

The Boston Daily Globe
FRIDAY, JAN. 4, 1952

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND EUROPE

In its 71st year of history-making, the Boston Symphony Orchestra continues to make history. Next Spring it will play for the first time in Europe.

The occasion is special. Since 1914 our Western world has been forced to remember what in years of tranquil prosperity it is so easy to forget; that a civilization, if it leave any heritage at all, does so not in money and guns, but in the arts, sciences, philosophy, and religion. The content of these is spiritual, although the word more commonly used to designate them is culture. Thus it is the Congress for Cultural Freedom which has invited the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Paris in May for three, possibly four, concerts in a month of "Masterpieces of the 20th Century," designed to show specimens of vital creative achievement in all the arts by peoples not under stultifying interference by State control.

When we consider what an extinguisher cap has descended on the arts in Russia since her revolution went sour, this point need not be labored.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have been chosen is striking but not startling. To begin with the most prosaic fact, the expenses of this trip, beyond what the orchestra itself earns in Paris and on tour in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Bordeaux, Strassbourg, and Zurich and by radio broadcast, are to be paid by the Cultural Congress without cost to our local supporters. A less prosaic fact is the repute for world eminence which the Boston orchestra has had, and, save for a short interval during and after the first World War, has maintained since the early years of this century.

This eminence is an historical process. It began in 1881 with imported European players and famous conductors; it continues now when at least half the players when they go to Paris will be seeing Europe for the first time. They go as a virtuoso orchestra, not indeed the first to be heard in Europe nor the only one in America, but the fact of the invitation speaks for itself. Most of the great European orchestras, especially those on the Continent, have been adjuncts of opera houses; the Boston orchestra has cultivated in its public an eager taste for music in its most advanced form, the symphony; and while distinguished soloists quite properly remain ornaments to many of its programs, it has nevertheless been a pioneer in the promulgation of pure symphonic performances.

The art of performance itself is today also in somewhat special case. For the past two decades the major works of musical literature, instrumental and choral, have had performances of grandeur never dreamed of by the composers who penned them during the past two and one-half centuries—an exemplification of the process by which artists, out of sheer inner necessity, create works beyond the immediate comprehension or capacities of most of their contemporaries, only [illegible] up by musicians in some later age to challenge and triumphantly achieve. [illegible] therefore, to stress [illegible] the works of contemporary composers [illegible] will be played in Paris and in the [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra and the classics of the recent repertoire.

Thus the coming visit to Europe [illegible] which [illegible] there can scarcely be a doubt, achieved a distinctive excellence in the American soul. We can scarcely be satisfied with a verdict like that has been rendered [illegible] after decades since the turn of the present century by eminent visiting European composers, conductors, and performers. We do eagerly await the high-level [illegible] critical appraisals which [illegible] certain to elicit.

As for cultural freedom [illegible] proof could we send to Europe than [illegible] out it the Boston Symphony [illegible] could not exist. Its very presence [illegible] soon-to-be in Europe, [illegible] dom is the life blood and vital [illegible] creative spirit.

UNCLE [illegible]

[115]

This Clipping From
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
APR 1 - 1952

X CONCERTS AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer, which a number of Hudsonians attend, will consist of six concerts in the smaller auditorium on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 5-6, 12-13, 19-20. Charles Munch will conduct and will draw his programs from early French music and from the works of Bach, Mozart and Schubert. The concerts in the Music Shed will be given Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for three weeks, July 24, 26-27, July 31, August 2, 3, and August 7, 9-10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 2 - 1952

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert of Season Here

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, presented the fifth and final concert of its current Providence season last night at the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. The evening was a personal triumph for Dr. Munch, back on the podium after an extended absence.

The program:

Honegger ..... Symphony No. 3
I. Grave.
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro marcato
Roussel ..... "Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Second Suite, Op. 43
INTERMISSION
Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico e passionato

The Honegger Symphony, completed last year in Paris, was a controversial opening number. It is difficult to comment on the work for several reasons, including the fact that about 100 late arrivals stooped in after the first movement and completely disrupted the continuity of the work. We understand fully that parking in the neighborhood is a problem, but after so long a time it would seem that a little planning would overcome it. Obviously, the end of the season is not the time to comment, but in this case the distraction was serious and damaging to the effect of a new and difficult work.

Honegger ends each movement of this symphony on the note "re." This device (only usually ending on "C") was a favorite of the so-called "atonal" composers of the thirties, whose music wandered all over the place and who pleaded unity because everything came out all right in the end. Perhaps the use of the device gives a clue to the work as a whole, because there were several other ways in which it looked backward—to the naturalist effects of the twenties—and in places to rhythmic devices which have been associated with Stravinsky even earlier than the twenties.

Even so, the work was acrid enough for the present and abstract enough to give even the sophisticated listeners in the audience many things over which to puzzle. There were some "boos" and "hisses" mingled with the applause at the end, which we found encouraging. All too often the enemies of "modern" music refuse to mingle with the friends of the same, but stay away and refuse to register their reactions publicly. The effect last night was honest, and good to hear.

The Roussel work which followed was published in 1932. It is a brilliant score, and an exciting one, tremendously advanced for 1932. In fact, some parts of it seemed more modern than anything in the Honegger Symphony, and in its lyric sections as well as in the brassy parts the idiom showed how a composer may often be in advance of his time and have to wait several years for audience experience to grow to accept the music. "Modern" in music is a relative term, and should be approached as such. The Roussel may have had a better reception than the Honegger, but it was not less difficult in idiom. The audience seemed to like it!

After these two works, Brahms seemed very familiar. While the playing was as excellent as a Boston Symphony performance always is, Dr. Munch kept requesting the

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 30 1952

MUSIC

Mass.

Auditions Scheduled For Tanglewood Opera Group

Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday from 1 to 4 P. M. An accompanist will be present.

The Music Center's tenth season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until August 10. Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland, assistant director.

Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Adriadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachu-

AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL
MAR 30 1952

Audition For Opera Listed

Boris Goldovsky will hold final auditions for the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 2 p. m. Thursday in the Cleveland Institute of Music.

Goldovsky, conductor of the former Akron Civic Opera Guild, is well-known as an intermission commentator of the Metropolitan Opera Association Saturday afternoon broadcasts.

The Music Center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood June 30 for a six-week session under direction of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 30 1952

TANGLEWOOD OPERA AUDITIONS THURSDAY

Auditions for applicants to this summer's session of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be held in New York City at Carnegie Recital Hall on Thursday, from 1 to 4 p. m. An accompanist will be present. The Music Center's 10th season will open at Tanglewood on June 30 and run until August 10.

Charles Munch will be director and Aaron Copland, assistant director. Major productions of the opera department in past seasons have included such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Mozart's "Idomeneo," Strauss' "Ariadne" and Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame."

Applicants planning to come to the auditions should, if possible, notify the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

The New York Times
NOVEMBER 29, 1951.

EXPOSITION OF ARTS IS PLANNED IN PARIS

What Western World Has Done in Music, Ballet, Drama and Thought to Be Shown in May

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 28—An exposition of what the free creative mind has produced during this century in the arts will be held in Paris next May under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, which includes leading intellectuals in the Western countries.

Under the title "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," some of the outstanding artists and intellectual leaders of our time will present a cavalcade of music, opera, ballet, drama, art, literature and philosophy during the month, according to Nicolas Nabokov, secretary general of the congress.

Mr. Nabokov said the festival would be an answer to the propaganda that has sought, and, to some extend, has succeeded "in planting in our own minds doubts of the validity, strength and vitality of our Western culture."

During the twentieth century, Mr. Nabokov said, "free creative imagination of the poets, painters and composers has produced an abundant flow of masterpieces in all the arts." At the same time, he added, as a by-product of political upheaval there has been a violent reaction against the free creative spirit.

Powerful political movements, he said, have tried to stifle free creation. "Narrow restrictive rules have sought to transform the artist into an instrument of the state, producing works tailored to the utilitarian needs of totalitarian regimes."

What has been done in the past fifty years in the free world will be shown in music by such organizations as the Vienna State Opera and Vienna Philharmonic, the chorus and orchestra of the Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome, R. I. A. S. Orchestra of Berlin, Orchestre de la Suisse Romande from Geneva, France's Conservatory Orchestra and National Orchestra.

Concert programs will present works of Debussy, Ravel, Schoenberg, Milhaud, Honegger and others, including some written by the Russian composers Shostakovich and Prokofieff and forbidden in the Soviet Union. Igor Stravinsky will conduct a program of his ballets and a concert of his music. Some of the outstanding conductors in the world also will participate.

Georges Balanchine's New York City Ballet will give performances. Two new ballets have been commissioned from the French composers Georges Auric and Henri Sauguet.

The Vienna Opera will give two performances of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" and negotiations are under way for a performance by an all-Negro cast of Virgil Thomson's opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," with book by Gertrude Stein.

In art, a comprehensive exhibition of contemporary painting is planned. Works are being collected in Europe and America.

Some of the most important dramatic works of modern times will be staged. Two notable productions will be Kafka's "The Trial," staged by Jean Louis Barrault, leading French actor and producer, and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," with Sir Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh.

A series of afternoon forums, led by noted writers and philosophers, is planned. One of the forums will discuss freedom of the press.

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
Sunday, January 20, 1952

Boston Symphony, City Ballet Going to Paris Festival in May

By Paul V. Beckley

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first European appearance with three concerts at the Festival of the Arts at Paris in May, it was disclosed yesterday ina joint announcement by Nicolas Nabokov, secretary-general of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston orchestra.

As the major American representative at the festival, which is sponsored by the Congress, the Boston Symphony will stay in Europe two weeks and also play in Belgium, Holland, Austria, Switzerland and other Fernch communities. The cost of this overseas trip for the 104-member orchestra is estimated from $150,000 to $175,000.

One of the principal motives of the Congress in sponsoring the spring festival, it was said, is to combat the current Communist party line in Europe which has been insulting Western art and culture as "decadent."

Mr. Nabokov is director of the exposition committee of the Congress and Julius Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, its American chairman. Sidney Hook is chairman of the American committee of the Congress and has conducted negotiations with the American participants.

